At night, on the moors of Scotland, a disguised wayfarer stood waiting for the horseman carrying the mailbags containing the death warrant. The disguised wayfarer, as the horse came by, clutched the bridle and shouted to the rider—to the man who carried the mail bags: "Dismount!" He felt for his arms and was about to shoot, but the wayfarer jerked him from his saddle and he fell flat. The wayfarer picked up the mail bags, put them on his shoulder and vanished in the darkness, and fourteen days were thus gained for the prisoner's life, during which the father confessor was pleading for the pardon of Sir John Cochrane.

The second time the death warrant is on its way. The disguised wayfarer comes along, and asks for a little bread and a little wine, starts on across the moors, and they say: "Poor man, to have to go out such a stormy night; it is dark and you will lose yourself on the moors." "O, no," he says, "I will not." He trudged on and stopped amid the brambles and waited for the horseman to come carrying the mail bags containing the death warrant of Sir John Cochrane. The mail carrier spurred on his steed, for he was fearful because of what had occurred on the former journey, spurred on his steed, when suddenly through the storm and through the darkness there was a flash of firearms and the horse became unmanageable and as the mail carrier discharged his pistol in response, the horse flung him, and the disguised wayfarer put his foot on the breast of the overthrown rider and said: "Surrender now!"

The mail carrier surrendered his arms, and the disguised wayfarer put upon his shoulders the mail bags, leaped upon the horse, and sped away into the darkness, gaining fourteen more days for the poor prisoner, Sir John Cochrane; and before the fourteen days had expired pardon had come from the king. The door of the prison swung open, and Sir John Cochrane was free. One day when he was standing amid his friends, they congratulating him, the disguised wayfarer appeared at the gate, and he said, "Admit him right away."

The disguised wayfarer came in and said: "Here are two letters; read them, sir, and cast them into the fire." Sir John Cochrane read them. They were his two death warrants and he threw them into the fire. Then said Sir John Cochrane: "To whom am I indebted? Who is this poor wayfarer that saved my life? Who is it?" And the wayfarer pulled aside and pulled off the jerkin and the cloak, and the hat, and lo! it was Grizelle, the daughter of Sir John Cochrane. "Gracious Heaven!" he cried, "my child, my saviour, my own Grizelle!" But

A MORE THRILLING STORY.

The death warrant had come forth from the King of Heaven and earth. The death warrant read: "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." The death warrant coming on the black horse of eternal night. We must die! We must die! But breasting the storm and putting out through the darkness was a disguised wayfarer who gripped by the bridle the on-coming doom and flung it back, and put His wounded and bleeding foot on the overthrown rider. Meanwhile pardon flashed from the throne, and, Go free! Open the gate! Strike off the chain! Go free!

And to-day, your liberated soul stands in the presence of the disguised wayfarer, and as He pulls off the disguise of His earthly humiliation and the disguise of His thorns, and the disguise of the seamless robe, you find He is bone of your bone, flesh of your flesh, your brother, your Christ, your pardon, your eternal life, let all earth and Heaven break forth in vociferation. Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!

'A guilty, weak, and helpless worm,

On Thy kind arms I fall;

Be Thou my strength and righteousness

My Jesus and my all."

SYLPH SOMERS.

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS OF THE STORY.

THE events are those of a century ago. The scene is in Ireland. Sylph Somers was the adopted daughter of Dr. Gilbert, a physician of Chester, England. The doctor had been arrested for presiding over a meeting at which seditious language was used, had caught jail fever and died in prison, making his adopted daughter heiress of all his property. After the doctor's death, Sylph went, by his advice, to Ireland and resided with the Denzilles, relatives of the doctor. Sylph had been converted under the preaching of John Wesley, and her residence with the Denzilles, who were a godless family, was distasteful to her. She left them, but as they had planned to gain possession of Dr. Gilbert's property, by marrying Sylph to young Denzille, they were irritated by her departure, and laying in wait for her as she left a religious service, they attempted to carry her off by force. Sylph was rescued by Capt. Vaughan, an English officer, who had been kind to her in Chester, and had helped her to gain access to Dr. Gilbert's prison. Sylph became Capt. Vaughan's affianced wife. Just then the Irish rebellion broke out, and Capt. Vaughan fought in one of the engagements. He was wounded, and Sylph attended to him. Both were captured by the insurgents, and Capt. Vaughan was condemned to be hanged. Among the insurgents, was Capt. Miles Rossiter, a young Irishman who had been sent to France to be trained for the priesthood, but had been disgusted with Romanism, became a soldier, and returned to Ireland to aid in the insurrection. He had years before been one of Dr. Gilbert's patients, and had fallen in love with Sylph, while under Dr. Gilbert's care. He now saw and recognized Sylph among the prisoners in the camp, and rescued her and Capt. Vaughan from the insurgents and secreted them in two farm-houses. Rossiter visited Sylph there, and offered her marriage, but was rejected. The insurgents were irritated by Rossiter's act, and their leader, Father Murphy, who was a priest, became his enemy. He had heard from Rossiter's mother, in confession, that Rossiter was no longer a Roman Catholic, and he therefore resolved on punishing him. Corny Fagan was an honest Irishman, Sylph's attendant. Hugh was Capt. Vaughan's servant; he had formerly been in the employ of Dr. Gilbert.

MILES was taken aback by Sylph's homily unexpectedly addressed to him, and he did not quite know how to understand it; whether as a sort of Methodist lecture from Sylph (for he had heard of her being of that sect, and also something of her doings as a leader in that body in and around Enniscorthy), or had Sylph's words, apart from all mere homily, a deep and soul-searching significance? After a moment's thought he felt that they had; for though the name of Christ had been upon his lips from early childhood, he knew that never had he by a living act made that sacrifice of self to the world's Redeemer, in which consists the very essence of religion.

"Perhaps you are right, Sylph," he said. "I am unworthy of you, and should never have dared to think you would be mine. And yet—and yet I cannot—heaven help me—endure the thought of leaving you. I feel you would not only have been the wealth and glory of my mortal life, but would have been the sacred magnet to draw me up, heart and soul, to the purer realities of a better world. Yes, Sylph, you would have helped me to rise to the higher possibilities of my nature. You would have been to me, in fact, as a 'Beatrice' to 'Dante.' But now, with a forlorn heart and a blighted soul, bereft of light and love, I shall pass on lonely to the grave, and the sooner I reach it the better."

Miles, thus speaking, sadly stooped his head towards the ground, as overburdened with the weight of his trouble.

"The name of her whom you have mentioned," said Sylph, "supplies the answer to your despondency, Mr. Rossiter. 'Beatrice' never was the bride of 'Dante,' and yet, enshrined in his heart, as the ideal of the pure, the beautiful, and the good, she was, through his whole life, a power to uplift him to all that was noble, true, and excellent. I do not pretend to have the qualities of a 'Beatrice,'" said Sylph; "far from it. Yet, if you will make me the starting point for your embodiment in thought of whatsoever things are pure and lovely and of good report—living thus only in your conception—you will never learn my human faults and frailties, Mr. Rossiter; and I shall be a more powerful attraction to your moral nature than if it had been possible for me to enter into a more pronounced relationship. And, yet, after all, I will not say this," she added, after a slight pause. "No; banish me from your thoughts, Mr. Rossiter, and—I entreat you to this—take to your soul's worship and delight, alone, the perfect ideal which your God sets before you. You will find it here," she added, taking a small book from the bosom of her dress. "It is a New Testament, Mr. Rossiter. The Gospels are God's revelation to us of His Son, who was and is, as you know, the embodiment of all perfection—is God made visible to man; and it is through Him alone the soul can rise to the full height and measure of its being."

Miles looked at Sylph with something of the same wonder that Doctor Gilbert had exhibited when she first conferred with him upon the same subject. He had perceived the outward loveliness of Sylph, and the exquisite charm of her disposition and mental endowments, and had been borne away into a delirium of delight; but now he saw in her a loftiness of soul and a moral and spiritual grandeur that inspired him with solemnity; and he stood spell-bound before her.

Sylph imagined that his pause and want of movement arose from a reluctance to accept her gift from early religious prejudice. So to overcome his scruples she added, "Do not refuse this book, Mr. Rossiter; whatever any body of men may say, the children of God (and we are all His offspring), have a right to read the will and testament of their Father. And if it be any recommendation to you, this little book has for years lain close to my heart, and for many and many a happy hour has been my companion and counsellor; and its leaves have been moistened with my tears. Nor would I part with it, did I not hope from what has passed this evening, that having been valued by me, you will prize it, and will seek to know from it the truth that has been as a well-spring of living water to my soul."

Miles took the book, pressed it to his lips, promised to make it his study, and then placed it in an inner pocket for safety.

After some further talk, the conversation turned upon getting Sylph and Captain Vaughan farther away from the rebel camp, as a measure expedient for their greater safety; Miles also expressing for himself an intention of withdrawing from the insurrection, and after passing through the English lines, to get back, if possible, to his post in the French army. "A soldier's life," he said, "is now, I feel, the only one possible for me. Without you as a motive, I could never bear the drudgery of preparation for the medical profession."

"Then enter the English army," suggested Sylph. "No," he replied; "that would be neither honorable for me, nor feasible. No; I will just go back to my old comrades and fight in the cause of 'The Enfranchised Peoples,' and in the forefront of the battle, too, where death reaps his most abundant harvest; and if I fall, I fall, content to die. The wine of my life is gone, and I care not to drain out for long its dregs."

"Be ready at any time to fly," he said, when parting from Sylph, soon after this disclosure of his intention, "and give from me the same counsel to your companion. I know not exactly when I can arrange for your escape, but it will be as soon as possible. Good-bye, Sylph, pardon me," he added, "for this familiar address, but pity me, I can bring myself to use no other. I will not long trouble you, however, with my rude manners," he added, with a faint smile; "soon Miles Rossiter will only be a name to you, faint and dim, upon tablet of your memory."

The words of Miles were prophetic, and his speedier fulfilment than he at all looked for.

Next evening he was lying in his tent upon outskirts of the rebel camp at the foot of Vine Hill, reading the sacred book which Sylph had given him, more, however, from curiosity, we fear, than from the association of the volume with Sylph, than from a real desire for Divine knowledge. In cursory and desultory perusal, his eyes fell upon this passage:

"And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child. And ye shall hate all men for my sake; but he that endureth unto the end shall be saved."

And, again, his glance came upon these words: "And fear not them which kill the body and are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."

And, again, in the same chapter, he read, "And not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father's permission."

"But the very hairs of your head are all numbered."

Miles had dropped the New Testament from his hand and was pondering these words, especially the last statement, envying the security of the man who could from the heart call God their Father, even a prayer had passed from his lips that God would make him an actual member of His household—when a messenger arrived at his tent door and told him that he was wanted for a consultation with the leaders on the hill.

Miles did not care to enter into any further relationship with these men, and yet he felt that to refuse their summons would go far to excite evil suspicion against him. He therefore told the messenger to inform the chiefs that he would be with them as soon as possible.

Taking his weapons with him, and leaving his own men behind, he was soon ascending the hill. The sequel proved he was moving to his doom, and that the message he received was only a ruse to get him from the protection of his own immediate followers. As he drew near the bar of chiefs in pretended consultation, he saw that his old opponent and denouncer, Father John Murphy, commander-in-chief of the rebel host, was among them.

Scarcely had Miles presented himself to the group of chieftains, reporting his obedience to their summons, when Father John, pointing to him, ordered his arrest; and before Miles could defend himself with either sword or pistol he was seized by the arms, and was in the iron grasp of two powerful men, chosen from among the rebels for this task because of their huge build and muscular development.

Miles was about to ask the ground of this treatment, and to utter his protest, when Father John anticipated him.

"Miles Rossiter," he said, with a voice of sternness, "did I not tell you to refrain from engaging in this our Holy War, and not to bring upon it the curse of heaven by your polluting touch as a blasphemer and an infidel?"

Early in that day the rebel forces had experienced their first severe check. Father John, not only a fiery leader, but a religious enthusiast, was fully persuaded in his fanaticism that the rebel cause was the cause of God, felt satisfied that the Israelites under Joshua of old were smitten by Ai because of an accursed thing in the camp, so must be in the present instance; that otherwise heaven would have accorded them an unbroken course of victory; and under this conviction he had come to the hill to establish an inquisition.

In conversation with the chiefs, the conduct of Miles in giving only a half-hearted support to the short, sharp, and decisive measures in operation at the Old Mill, and, indeed, his angry protest against the massacres, came up. And the mention of his name at once flashed upon the mind of Father John that he had discovered in him the Achan of the camp; and that Miles was the victim necessary to be sacrificed in order to propitiate offended heaven.

"You did say something of this kind," replied Miles to the insurgent priest: "but I have yet to know that your word, Father John, has in this patriotic outbreak an absolute authority. I am here, he it known, as the agent of France, and I hold a captaincy in her army. Here is my formal commission."

He drew it from his breast pocket. "Can you, Father John, show an equal warrant for the post of command which you have assumed in this struggle?"

The chiefs looked at Father John, wondering what reply he could make to this inquiry, but the burly priest was equal to the occasion. "Put up your lackey's paper, young man," he said contemptuously. "we don't acknowledge here the writing of an apostate and recreant government, false to the Catholic faith. I don't care to tell you, but know that heaven itself has set the seal of its approval upon the office of supreme command that I hold."

"How?" interrupted Miles.

"By blessing our national banner when under my leadership with unbroken victory," he answered. "That's my voucher, if it be needful, young man, that you should know it."

"Yes, yes, that's true, perfectly true," cried out the surrounding chiefs.

"No, not perfectly true," coolly interrupted Father John. "There has been a momentary check; but in God's mercy, only that, my friends; and its purpose is this, that we shall rid our camp of the man that defiles and troubles it."

"I deny your allegation, Father John," said Miles vehemently. "I am neither an apostate nor an infidel, and I challenge you to the proof."

"Nothing is easier than the proof, young man," said Father John, in measured tones. "Do not flatter yourself with the hope of escape through a subterfuge." Turning round to a man who stood near, in a low tone Father John gave him some directions; and then, resuming his former attitude, he said to those about him, "I am sorry that there will be a delay of perhaps five minutes in our proceedings, my friends. I hope, however, only for so long, and it is this young man's disingenuousness that makes it necessary."

During the interval of waiting sullen and stern silence was maintained; and Miles passed the time in questioning within himself what at its close would be the outcome. Had he been given his whole life to surmise, he would not have found out.

THE FIVE THOUSAND FED.

S.S. Lesson for April 16, Mark 6: 30-44. Golden Text, John 6: 35; Ps. 132: 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN this instance it was Jesus Himself who provided the rest. He knew just the moment when it was needed, and the apostles did not remind Him of the number of sick who were still unhealed, or of the hungry souls who sought for the blessed Gospel of the kingdom; they believed that JESUS KNEW BEST.

If we all lived near enough to God to be really guided by Him in all things, we should not need to make our own plans for rest or for work; God, who knows all things, would make them for us, and we should only have to fall into them. Then there would be no worry or vexation because a plan which we made for the very best has been frustrated; God only knows when we can best serve Him actively, and when by simple prayer, by learning, or by suffering. John the Baptist's time was not lost when he "was in the deserts until the day of his showing unto Israel" (Luke 1: 80). Elijah's time was not lost when he was by the brook Cherith, for then he was bearing the burden of his people in continual prayer to God; Paul's time was not lost while he was busy working with his own hands at the tent-making in Corinth. Let us abolish the idea that spiritual power is a material to be appropriated and used by man when and how he wills. Spiritual power is really the being possessed by the Holy Ghost and being at His disposal, not possessing the Holy Ghost as a power subject to us and at our disposal; the Spirit of God will possess only such as place themselves willingly in God's hands as clay in the hands of the potter, to work, to rest, to pray, or to suffer as He wills.

The Lord Jesus and His disciples "departed into a desert place by ship privately." Privately but not secretly: "the people saw them departing, and many knew Him, and ran afoot thither out of all cities, and outwent them, and came together unto Him." What should Jesus do? Should He say, "I have planned this rest, it is necessary for me and for my disciples, and if I cannot obtain it here I must go elsewhere?" No, they had had the little breathing time during the journey on the lake, and they must trust their heavenly Father for strength which would be taxed anew. When Jesus left the ship He spoke no word and showed no sign of discontent that the proposed time of rest was broken into. As He always did, so now, He forgot Himself, He "saw much people, and was moved with compassion toward them, because they were as sheep not having a shepherd." Had they not priests and Levites? Yes, truly; but shepherds had they none. God said of them in Ezekiel's time, "They were scattered because there is no shepherd," and He testified against these shepherds in office but not in heart, "The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away, neither have ye sought that which was lost; but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them" (Ezek. 34: 4, 5). No wonder that when Jesus came, the good Shepherd, with the true Shepherd's heart, that the sheep ran eagerly after Him. And it is true to this day that where there is true pasture, the sheep will come; and where there is the most of the good Shepherd's spirit and power, the needy souls soon find it out.

Jesus "began to teach them many things." What these things were we are not told, this only we know, that His audience did not grow weary, hour after hour they remained, although they must have been physically weary with their long run along the coast, always eagerly keeping the little ship in sight; they could not have stayed to seek provisions, and yet neither hunger nor fatigue thinned the audience; we hear of none going away. The disciples, not the multitude, were the first to think there was some need for refreshment. They came unto Him and said, "This is a desert place, and now the time is far passed: send them away, that they may go into the country round about, and into the villages, and buy themselves bread: for they have nothing to eat." How little knew the disciples of the power and the love of that Lord to whom they spoke! No, Jesus would not send them to buy, the Lord of creation was there to give, and His resources were there with Him. He made them an unexpected answer

"GIVE YE THEM TO EAT."

Chosen as they were to execute His will in the healing of both soul and body, to prepare His way and bring men in contact with Him, it ought surely to have occurred to them that He had the power to feed the people too. But their undeveloped faith never linked together the God who sent the manna to their fathers in the desert with this Jesus of Nazareth of whom they were the followers. They began to consider their own resources, the probabilities or possibilities of obtaining provisions. Probably it was with a very faint heart they made the proposition, "Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread and give them to eat?" It was not likely that they had so much money among them, but help was nearer than they knew, "How many loaves have ye? go and see. And when they knew, they say, Five, and two fishes," and Andrew added, "What are they among so many?" (John 6: 9.) Nothing without Jesus, but in His hand they were enough. But before Jesus could bless, there must be quietude, "He commanded them to make all sit down by companies upon the green grass. And they sat down in ranks by hundreds and by fifties." God does all things in an orderly way. "And when He had taken the five loaves and the two fishes, He looked up to heaven, and blessed." Every morsel which the people ate passed first through His hands, and He who made the whole world adapted the supply to the present need.

What a lesson for us! Why need we ever be in perplexity or in distress with our littleness of power or strength or knowledge. Let us only be sure that the circumstances in which we are placed are known to Him, and undertaken by Him because we trust Him, and are ready to do or suffer what He wills; and then God says, as He did by Moses, "Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which He will shew to you to-day" (Ex. 14: 13). Jesus "brake the loaves, and gave them to His disciples to set before them; and the two fishes divided He among them all." He multiplied the supply, but the disciples distributed. This is our little part. How utterly absurd it is for us to compare our resources, gifts, talents, opportunities, for instance, with those of others! The least, the feeblest, in the hands of Jesus can be made equal to the greatest needs. O to have more to do with Jesus Himself! Then every need would raise our courage in expectation of what Jesus was going to do; every perplexity would rejoice us as it did Paul when he said, "Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecution, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong" (2 Cor. 12: 9, 10.)

Most of our difficulties as Christians arise from having our eye on ourselves and not on Jesus. If we really believed that an Almighty Saviour stood always in the room, or in the street, or wherever it may be, close to us, ready to use His immeasurable resources in our behalf, only waiting to be relied on, how could we have one moment's anxiety? A missionary party were travelling in the wilds of Basuto land in South Africa; water was extremely rare and often much time was spent in seeking it when friendly natives were not at hand to say where it was to be found. At this time the natives were hostile. Night was coming on, the road was a mere track, and the native servants said, "We must push on, there is no water for us or for the beasts." The missionary lifted up his heart to God, and said, "No, we will camp here for the night, God cannot will that the poor wearied beasts should lose their little remaining strength in seeking water, He knows where it is." So he and his wife rested a moment and prayed, placing their case in God's hands. They then heard the cry, "The asses are lost, they have run away." The missionary and his wife put this new difficulty into the hands of God, and after pursuing for some time they saw the asses running on ahead, and in an instant said, "God is showing us where water is," and so it proved, a beautiful abundant fountain of water was springing up from under a rock, and there the Lord had led the weary beasts and shown His trusting servants how it answers to put their trust in God.

The multitude in the desert "did all eat, and were filled," i.e., they ate as much as their hunger craved; it was a good hearty meal, as one can well see by the quantity which was left, for it was considerably more than would have made five loaves and two fishes. "They took up twelve baskets full of the fragments, and of the fishes." And they that did eat of the loaves were about five thousand men." Our lesson is a very simple one, just to put our resources into the hands of Jesus, and thus make Him responsible to adapt them to the need we have. "But," you may say, "thus doing, I should feel I did nothing." Then, dear friend, for once you would feel the exact truth; our doing when it is any use, is just to let Jesus do, and to let Jesus be what He wills, all in all to us, all in all by us, all in all through us. Our duty is implicit, unquestioning obedience to Him, and implicit, unreasoning faith in Him. Then He is responsible for the consequences. He has so arranged our circumstances that our own resources can never suffice, either for our own souls, our families, our work for God, or anything else, just in order that we may always put our poor little provision into His hands, and that He may have the joy of manifesting Himself in our circumstances as the living, present, mighty Jesus.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President has Received a Deluge of letters, petitions, and memorials, sent with the view of influencing his decision on the Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill. A correspondent at Washington says the bill was first referred to the Secretary of State for his views, which were, it is understood, that the exclusion for so long a period as twenty years was a virtual violation of the treaty, and called for a veto. Those of the President's friends who have taken a special interest in the subject and have been anxious that he should sign the bill are as confident as ever that there will be no veto. It is understood that the cabinet is almost equally divided on the question, but an impression prevails in the country and especially in New York, that the President will veto the bill on the ground of the exclusion being for so long a period; but that he would consent to sign a bill excluding the Chinese for five or even ten years.

The Tariff Commission Bill was the Principal topic of discussion in the House during the past week. It was passed in the Senate on March 28 by a vote of 38 to 15, and was immediately taken up by the House. Mr. Kasson, who spoke in its favor, contended that the results of free trade had been uniformly disastrous, and in confirmation of his argument cited the fact that all the nations which had been bound to free trade policy by commercial treaties with Great Britain, had, without exception, refused to renew those treaties after their expiration, and he called attention to the fact that Canada is now enforcing a protective policy against the mother country as well as against the United States, and is rejoicing in consequent prosperity, while Ireland and British India, chained by England to a free trade policy, are languishing in distress and poverty. He admitted that the tariff needed revision, but protested against alterations being made precipitately, and urged the advantages of committing the whole subject to the hands of the commission as proposed in the bill. The most prominent speaker on the other side was Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky, who asserted that it is "the almost universal conviction" that the protective policy is a bad one and that the present tariff laws are especially vicious. He did not believe that Congress should virtually abdicate its constitutional functions in favor of a tariff commission, but that the ways and means committee should "immediately proceed to revise the tariff in the ordinary way." Mr. Carlisle declared that it is not the design of the friends of the bill to get rid of the "unjust and abominable provisions" of the tariff, but to postpone action, to create unnecessary officers, and to entail an expense of $200 a day during the next six or seven months. Only a languid interest was taken in the subject by the House, but Congressmen may rest assured that the matter is one of great interest to the voters, who are not disposed to be played with in the interest of the monopolies.

The Prohibition Bill in the Massachusetts Legislature was defeated, on March 29th, in the House, by a vote to pass it to a third reading. The vote was a tie, and Speaker Charles J. Noyes declined to vote. His reasons are understood to be that he thinks a presiding officer should be impartial, and not cast his influence for or against any measure. There are those, however, who believe that Mr. Noyes feared that a vote for or against the measure would prejudice his prospects for the gubernatorial chair, for which position he is an aspirant.

The Proceedings in the Case of Sergeant Mason have been examined by Judge-Advocate-General Swaim, who has pronounced upon them an adverse opinion. General Swaim says in his report on the case: "While Sergeant Mason cannot on the evidence be considered guilty of the specific offence of assault with intent to kill, as charged and found by the court, yet his conduct in recklessly discharging his musket at Guiteau's cell and his disorderly declarations made at the time, tended in a high degree to endanger the good order of the troops then present, as well as to disturb the public tranquillity, and the court should have so found as a lesser kindred offence to that alleged by making the necessary exceptions and substitutions in its findings. Other questions might be raised touching the validity of the conviction and sentence in this case, but those mentioned are deemed sufficient to justify setting the conviction and sentence aside, and it is so recommended." There is a general feeling that more lenity might have been wisely displayed toward Sergeant Mason, but the reasons assigned by General Swaim are too much in the nature of a legal quibble to satisfy the people. It is expected that some mitigation of the sentence will be granted by the President.

A Memorial to the House of Representatives urging it to concur in the Senate Bill for the commission of inquiry concerning the liquor traffic was adopted by the Board of Managers of the National Temperance Society, at their meeting on March 28th. The board also adopted a resolution and memorial earnestly protesting against the proposition embodied in a bill introduced in the Senate "to hereafter appropriate and expend exclusively as an educational fund the internal revenue taxes on the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits, as seeking to promote popular education by unrighteous means, as in effect providing an excuse for the continued legal protection of an iniquitous traffic which ought speedily to be abolished." The board also adopted a memorial to Congress praying that the pending bills to enable the people of the Territories of Dakota and New Mexico to form Constitutions and State Governments be so amended as to require in their respective Constitutions the proviso that the distilling, brewing, and sale of alcoholic liquors for drinking purposes shall be forever unlawful in the proposed new States.

The Remains of the Poet Longfellow were interred at Mount Auburn on March 26th. The funeral was, like the poet's life, quiet and unostentatious. A distinguished company assembled at the house, among whom were Ralph Waldo Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes, George William Curtis, the Rev. Dr. C. A. Bartol, Charles Eliot Norton, Professor Luigi Monti, Drs. Morrill Wyman, W. D. Howells, and Mrs. Louis Agassiz. The coffin was covered with black cloth, and the plate bore this inscription: "Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Born February 27th, 1807; died March 24th, 1882." On the coffin lay a spray of passion flowers. The services were conducted by Rev. Samuel Longfellow, a brother of the poet, and after the funeral a further service was held in the Appleton Chapel of Harvard College, when Dr. C. C. Everett, a son of the late Edward Everett, pronounced an eulogy. In concluding an eloquent speech, he said: "His spirit, as we trust, has been called to higher service. Yet he had given himself unto the world; he had breathed himself into his songs. In them he is with us still. Wherever they go, as they wander through the world, he will be with them. A minister of love, he will be by the side of youth, pointing to heights as yet unscaled, bidding him have faith and courage. He will be with the wanderer in foreign lands, making the beauty that he sees more fair. He will be with the mariner on the seas. He will be within the quiet beauty of home. He will be by the side of the sorrowing heart, pointing to a higher faith. When old age is gathering about the human soul he will be there to inspire courage. Thus will he point all to those two sources of strength that never fail, 'heart within and God o'erhead.'"

Thirty-five Lives were Lost at Memphis, Tenn., by the burning of the steamer Golden City, which plies between New Orleans and Cincinnati. The boat was approaching the wharf at Memphis, on the morning of March 30th, when the second engineer, Albert Kelly, discovered that a quantity of jute on board was on fire. The boat's bow was at once headed for the shore, and in four minutes afterward it touched the wharf, where the coal fleet is moored. A line was hastily thrown and made fast to one of the coal barges, but the current being swift the line parted and the burning steamer floated on down the river a mass of flames, with many of her passengers and crew aboard, who were unable to reach the shore and were lost. The fire was discovered at 4.30 A.M., when many of the passengers were asleep, or more might have made their escape before the current carried the steamer back into the river. The most distressing detail of the catastrophe is that Kelly, the second engineer, who gave the alarm, was burned to death. He went to his post when the fire broke out, and worked to get the steamer ashore, and when last seen he was standing with his clothes all on fire, his hand still grasping the lever, bravely giving his life to save the others.

The Importance of Temperance Principles in railroad employes has been recognized in a practical way by two powerful companies. The Erie Railroad Company decides to discharge every employe who is not a total abstainer, and the New York Central orders all its tenants who sell liquor to vacate their premises. It will be worth noticing whether the change will not reduce the number of accidents on those lines.

The Garfield Memorial Hospital Scheme is being pushed forward. A meeting called for the purpose of organizing a national board of lady managers of the association was held in Washington on March 29th. The meeting was opened by Senator Windom, who declared that a general hospital was greatly needed. He said that the monument which it was thus proposed to erect to the memory of General Garfield was more suitable to his character than would be one of marble or brass. The chairman of the committee on ways and means stated that almost enough money had already been raised to justify placing the hospital in active operation. Committees were appointed to perfect the organization by selecting an additional vice-president from each State and Territory; also to arrange for holding a Martha Washington tea party in the rotunda of the Capitol.

As One of the Tangible Results of Missionary work an interesting fact announced recently deserves notice. A young Zulu is in this country aiding Rev. Mr. Pixley, missionary of the American Board, in carrying a translation of the Bible through the press. He has united with the Congregational church in Auburndale, Mass. His grandmother was the first native convert of the mission.

A Peculiarly Distressing Fatality Occurred on the elevated railroad on March 25th. A little child named Marie Menzen, seven years of age, ascended to the Twenty-Third Street station of the Sixth Avenue road, in company with her father, who was returning from business to his home. As the two were entering a car the child dropped some candy she was carrying, and while stooping to pick it up was roughly pushed aside by some of the men struggling to get into the car. The child fell between the cars, the train was started, and she was cut to pieces under the wheels. The name of the man who pushed the child is not known, or it would be a pleasure to publish it, so that he might be held up to public execration; but people who travel by the elevated roads have frequent occasion to deplore the selfish disregard of other people's safety displayed by men who though attired as gentlemen are obviously without the primary elements of gentlemanly character. They push aside ladies and children without compunction, not because they are afraid of being left behind, but so that they may enter first and secure the best seats in the cars.

Photographing by Moonlight is an Achievement until lately regarded as impossible, but according to The Cleveland Leader, Richard Jahr, a young German photographer, has accomplished the feat. The subject was the Lake View Cemetery, where President Garfield lies buried. The photograph is described as peculiar. The sky is very white; the trees are black. It is claimed that this is the first picture ever taken by moonlight. It was thought that the moon's light was too faint to be used in photography, but it appears that it is available when the plate operated on is rendered extremely sensitive. Something like this occurs sometimes in the experience of eminent Christians. The soul God has rendered sensitive by trouble or by sickness often responds to influences others do not feel, and reflects beauties seldom seen (Jer. 24 : 7).

An Adder at Church is not a Common Spectacle in this country, though it would not occasion much surprise in tropical lands. It does occur here sometimes, however. A Connecticut journal says that very recently a meeting was held in a church in one of the hill towns of that State, where an adder was present. At the opening of the service a lady sat down to the cabinet organ and commenced playing a hymn tune. She had not played more than a few minutes when she saw an adder, three feet long, crawl from under the organ and remain motionless, with head upraised, as if listening to the music. In spite of her alarm, she retained enough presence of mind to continue playing until she could attract the attention of some gentlemen in the congregation, who speedily despatched it. The reptile had remained motionless, as if charmed by the music, from the time it emerged from its hiding place until it was killed. We are often surprised by seeing people at church whose power and influence are as injurious to the souls of men as the adder's poison is to the body, and we learn that they too are attracted by the musical parts of the service. For such we can only pray that the ears of their souls may be savingly opened to the sweetest sound the world has ever heard—the story of the cross (Psalm 58 : 4, 5).

An Indian's Revenge on his Enemy is Described in one of the Boston journals. It appears that among the Poncas was a half breed named "Comes-at-Rain." Several years ago he slew Yellow Breast, the father of Big Buffalo. The punishment awarded to Comes-at-Rain for his crime was that he should never again speak in council, should never receive notice or assistance or kindness from any member of the tribe. Comes-at-Rain led a dreary, loveless life, and as he grew old he became almost blind. During that cruel journey from Dakota to the Indian Territory, undertaken about four years ago, in obedience to the arrangements of Mr. Schurz and the Hayes administration, when so many of the poor creatures had to lie down and die, Comes-at-Rain with a pack of buffalo meat slung on his back was wearily groping his way with the rest. He had no pony, like some of the others, and his travel was painful. At last he came to a gully which in his semi-blindness he failed to see, and he fell in headlong. Big Buffalo happened to be near and saw the mishap befall his father's murderer. He did not exult in it but he stayed to see the old man scramble to his feet and then rode on. That night, after the tents were pitched Big Buffalo sent a message of peace to Comes-at-Rain, and in the morning one of Big Buffalo's ponies was sent to the blind old man with these words from the chief, "My people make presents to each other that they may become popular. It will not make me a great man in my tribe to give a pony to you, but it makes my heart happy to make you this present." If the criminal had not repented of his crime before, he certainly did then, when the coals of fire were heaped on his head. In the same way none feel more bitterly sorrow for sin than those who realize most clearly the love of God in Christ (Rom. 5 : 8).

A Wagon-Load of Misery Recently Passed through the streets of Ottawa, Kan. In the vehicle were a handcuffed thief, on his way to prison; his insane wife, who was being taken to an asylum; two children, going to the poorhouse, and a dead baby, bound for a graveyard. It had been found necessary to take them all together to the insane asylum, where the woman was to be confined, as she refused to be separated from her family. Then she was left behind, and the others taken to their respective destinations. It would be difficult to imagine a more sorrowful break-up of a home, yet the man and woman probably commenced their married life full of hope for the future. Sin had been at work, and misery is the natural result of its operation (Isaiah 8 : 22).

A Startling Discovery has been Made by two hunters in Gilmer County, Ga. They chased a fox into the woods, but lost it near the roots of an old hollow tree. They searched around for its hiding place but could not find it. They were, however, resolved on catching the animal, and believing that it had taken refuge in the tree they set to work to cut it down. It did not take long, and soon under the sturdy blows of the axe the old trunk fell with a crash. To their amazement, however, when the trunk split in its fall they saw revealed the skeleton of a man. The clothes and even the flesh were gone, and nothing remained with the bones but a powder-horn and a bullet-pouch. There was no way of identifying the remains, and they could only speculate on the strangeness of the discovery. Whether the man came to his death by accident or crime none could say, but a shudder was caused by the thought of what that old tree had hidden so completely for so many years while people passed by it and rested beneath it. The time will come when the secrets of men are revealed, and then good men will experience a similar sensation and understand the aptness of our Saviour's simile of "whited sepulchres" (Matt. 23 : 27).

A Remarkable Improvement in the Telephone is announced. An electrician of the New York Metropolitan Telephone Company, during a recent visit to Boston, witnessed a series of experiments which showed that the call bell may yet be dispensed with. As he sat in the room at some distance from the instrument he heard himself called by name and at first supposed some one was playing a trick upon him. After the phenomenon was explained he saw that it was the result of a wonderful discovery in electrical science. By using the carbon in a pulverized form instead of in the shape of a hard button, and by using a current four times as strong as before, the telephone is made to give forth as loud and articulate sounds as those of the human voice. In this way the voice from the telephone can be heard by any one near enough to hear the bell. It is expected that the new telephone will be used for talking between distant cities, as Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, New Orleans, and possibly San Francisco. How great an advantage this new invention will be, business men know and it will doubtless come into general use. People will have confidence in it and use it regularly who neglect to use that far grander, more blessed, power of prayer God has placed in our hands by which we can hold intercourse with Him (Psalm 10 : 17).

FRESHNESS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"My glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand."—Job 29 : 20. "I shall be anointed with fresh oil."—Psalm 92 : 10.

Job's Prosperous Condition—Mutability of all Worldly Affairs—I. The Excellency of Freshness—Seen in a Man's Devotions—Fusty Prayers—In Feelings—In Utterance—Sentences that Smell of the Lamp—In Labor—II. The Fear of its Departure—The Weekly Commemoration—Freshness Lost by Imitation—A Set of Paste Gems—The Alto Notes of the Perfectionists—Freshness Lost by Repression—How to Keep the Utterance Fresh—Dealers in Second-Hand Observations—III. The Hope of Renewal.

THE first text tells us of the renown of Job, and of the way in which the providence of God continued to maintain the glory of his estate, his bodily health, and his prosperity. He was for many days, months, years continuously prospered of God. Everything to which he set his hand succeeded. God had set a hedge about him and all that he had, so that none broke through to molest him. He grew richer, he grew more influential, he had more honor in the sight of his fellow-men each morning that he walked to the gate. In every way he was advanced from day to day, and that throughout a long stretch of years. His glory was fresh in him.

However, this did not last always, for Job in this chapter is telling us of something that used to be—something that was—something the loss of which he very sorrowfully deplored—"my glory was fresh in me." He found himself suddenly stripped of riches and of honor, and put last in the list instead of first, while his purposes and aims seemed all to miss their way, and he had no strength and no glory left in him. Now had he reached the winter of his discontent, and those who aforesaid did him homage became his assailants. So far as glory was concerned, he was forgotten as a dead man out of mind.

Now, brothers and sisters, this reads us a lesson that we put not our trust in the stability of earthly things. It is said of the world that God has founded it upon the floods. How, then, can we expect it to be substantial? Beneath yon moon, continually changing, what can we discover that abideth the same? Where the very light of heaven is waxing and waning, what is there but mutability? Change is written upon the face of all things. If, then, you have built your nest on high, reckon not too surely that you shall die in your nest, for the axe may fell the tree, and bring it down at an untimely date.

This is the respect that makes all mortal things inconsiderable to a wise man; he scarce will put them among his treasures, for they melt ere they are fairly counted, like a coinage of ice. They are but as the counters that a child plays with, having only an imaginary value. The things which are seen are shadows; the things invisible are the only substances. Reckon, then, at their fit price this transient glory of wealth, health, or fame. Lay up treasure "where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt," and seek for stability in other things than these. Get the feet of your joy upon the Rock of Ages, and reckon all else to be but sand at its very best.

David in the second text is talking, I think, about spiritual things, and he tells us with great joy that he should be anointed with fresh oil. He did not expect that his glory would depart, but he expected that it should be renewed. He did not reckon that the bow would lose its force in his hand, but that God would increase his strength from day to day. And if any of you here who are God's people have any fears about the future as to your soul matters—if you are alarmed with the fear that you will share the same lot which Job shared as to his temporal glory—I would remind you that Job even in temporals received at last twice as much as he had in his palmiest days, and that God can turn His hand one way as well as another, and brighten your prospects as well as darken them.

Prognosticate delight rather than despair. Even the lower springs shall continue to flow till you are beyond the need of them. Just now it is about spiritual matters that I want to speak; and if you have a fear that you must necessarily decline in these, I would remind you of the words of David, "I shall be anointed with fresh oil," and, yet further on, of his other words, "They shall still bring forth fruit in old age, to show that the Lord is upright." Never fall into the notion that a spiritual falling off is inevitable—there need be nothing of the kind; you may be fresh as the dew even unto the end.

The subject to-night will run in this way—First, the excellency of freshness: "My glory was fresh in me." Secondly, the fear of its departure. And, thirdly, the hope of its continuance, which hope is greatly encouraged by the words of our text: "I shall be anointed with fresh oil."

I. First, then, notice

THE EXCELLENCY OF FRESHNESS.

David had been anointed while still a youth to be king over Israel. He was anointed yet again when he came to the kingdom; that outward anointing with actual oil was the testimony of God's choice and the ensign of David's authorization, and oftentimes when his throne seemed precarious God confirmed him in it, and subdued the people under him. When his dominion waxed weak, God strengthened him and strengthened his servants, and gave them great victories; so that as a king he was frequently anointed with fresh oil. David's royal brow was crowned with fresh laurels again and again, and his throne was settled and established by the hand of the Lord. Not with the same old stale anointing, a repetition of that which had lost its force, but with oil fresh pressed from the green olive, namely, with a new blessing and a fresh blessing from God's right hand was David often anointed, as I trust you and I may be.

Freshness is a most delightful thing if you see it in another. It is a charm in nature. But, dear friends, spiritual freshness has a double charm. Sometimes we know what it is to have a freshness of soul, which is the dew from the Lord. You recollect when you were newly born again and first knew the Lord. How fresh everything was to you! The pardon of sin—how it sparkled! The righteousness of Christ—how brilliant! The idea of being a child of God—how novel and how delightful! To be joint-heir with Christ—how it almost startled you; it was such a new idea to your spirit. And oftentimes since then, when your soul has been in a lively condition, everything has been bright, charming, exhilarating—nothing flat, stale, unprofitable. Even though you heard the same things said again and again, yet, because your soul was fresh, they came to you with unusual power.

Your spiritual food, if you are healthy, is to you always fresh, like the manna in the wilderness, which was never stored a single night except for the Sabbath, but fresh and fresh it fell, and Israel gathered it and fed upon it there and then. Oh, it is a blessed thing to have your soul in a fresh state, filled with the ever-flowing living water. It is glorious to find everything about you fresh and new through the teaching of the blessed Spirit, so that you go from strength to strength, and like a roe or a young hart, leap from hill to hill. If we are now in the possession of it, may we always keep that freshness of soul and never lose it.

How that freshness is seen in a man's devotions. Oh, I have heard some prayers that are really rusty. I have heard them before so often that I dread the old familiar sounds. Some hackneyed expressions I recollect hearing when I was a boy. I even now hear the vain repetitions; old, worn-out, good-for-nothing, rubbishy expressions they were then; but they are brought out still by regular prayer-makers. Even where the words are new and original you will hear men pray in such a style as to matter that you say to yourself, "That prayer came out of Noah's Ark." As far as that man is concerned there is nothing at all in it of life, sap, or savor. It has been dead long ago, and hung up to dry till not a particle of juice remains in it.

But, on the other hand, you hear a man pray who does pray, whose soul is fully in communion with God, and what life and freshness is there!

It may be that his expressions are somewhat rough, but they touch you because they come from his heart. Some of the confessions and petitions are strange to you, perhaps, and yet you feel that they are such strangers as it behoves you to entertain at once. You are glad that such words and thoughts have passed through your spirit and blessed you. You feel that you can pray with such persons. Their prayers will go to heaven, for they came from heaven. God has inspired them, and their originality is a part of the seal manual of the Spirit.

And so, dear friends, it is well to have a freshness about our feelings. I know that we do not hope to be saved by our feelings; neither do we put feeling side by side with faith; yet I should be very sorry to be trusting and yet never feeling. Surely it would be a dead faith. It would be a strange thing to be a living child of God and to have no feelings. I will tell you about feelings as they strike me. Sometimes I have deplored the condition of my heart before God, and thought my feelings to be the worst that could be; but what a foolish judge I have been, for in a week's time I have wanted to have those despised feelings over again, and thought that now at last I had fallen into a worse state than before. I am persuaded that we are very poor judges of the value of our own inward feelings, and mayhap, when we are lowest in our own esteem we are really highest in the sight of God; and when we feel as if we did not pray, we are praying, and the heart may be wrestling with God more when it fears that it does not pray, than when you come down complacently out of your closet and say, "I know that I have had a good time, for I feel perfectly self-satisfied."

I hate the excitement which needs to be pumped up. There is a something delightful to my mind in coming to the throne of grace weeping—a something delightful in coming to the Lord's Supper full of joy and gladness; to come to either place cold and dead is horrible. There is something delicious in knowing that what you do feel is true, and comes up from the very bottom of your soul, and has a point and edge about it which proves how sincere it is. God keep us from stale feelings, and give us freshness of emotion.

I believe, dear friends, that there is a very great beauty and excellence in

FRESHNESS OF UTTERANCE.

Do not hinder yourself from that. How I long for it as a preacher. When one has day after day to stand before the same assembly and to talk of the things of God, one dreads lest he should be so monotonous and full of repetition that even the things of God should come to be a weariness to God's own people. I have often thought that if some brethren, who are very careful to say exceedingly well what they do say, would be a little more careless and speak as it comes, letting their heart flow over at their lips spontaneously, there would be a far greater freshness about their utterance than there is when every sentence smells of the lamp and reeks of midnight oil. God forbid that we should say a word against the deepest study and the profoundest research of God's word, but still we may get to be so much students that we scarcely speak like practical men who live among the people. By aiming at a very superior style we may fall into a thoroughly inferior one, and all our freshness may be gone.

I like, for my part, the wild bird's note. Men get the bullfinch and teach it to sing a few notes, and then the piping bullfinch is greatly prized. But I have finches outside my window any one of which will beat any finch in the world that only pipes a note or two, for they pipe much more melodiously, though they were never taught except of God and nature. There is a range of sweetness about their wild notes that a tutored bird cannot reach. Nature, pure and unsophisticated, is the best instrument for grace.

Now, you that have lately been converted, do not go and learn all the pretty phrases that we are accustomed to use. Do not go and sit down at the feet of your dear teacher in the class and feel that you must talk just like him. Strike out your own course. Be yourself. "But I should be odd," say you. All right; so is your pastor. You need not mind that. You will not be the only odd body about. Be encouraged by that. I think that a little of what people call oddness is just, after all, leaving God's work alone. All the trees that God makes are odd. The Dutchmen clip them round or make them into peacocks, but that style of gardening is not to our mind. And some people say, "What lovely tree!" I say, "What a horribly ugly thing it is." Why not let the tree grow as God would have it? Do not clip yourselves round or square but keep your freshness. There will be no two Christian men exactly alike if they do that.

FRESHNESS IN LABOR.

There should be a freshness, dear friends, about our labor. We ought to serve the Lord to-day with just as much novelty in it as there was ten years ago. I may even venture to say thirty years ago. Oh, I recollect the seriousness with which I went out to preach the first half dozen sermons I ever preached, and what a burden it was from the Lord and how I did go at it with all my might—very clumsily, but still with all my soul and spirit. And do you recollect when you began to teach the class or began to take your tract district? Did you not pray over it? It seemed almost too good to be true that you should be trusted with doing anything for your Lord and Master. And you did it, oh, so intensely, and therefore you had God's blessing. You did it well, though you blundered a good deal; for all your heart was in it, your motive was pure, and your faith was childlike. You blundered the right way, for you blundered with your heart and so blundered into other men's hearts. Your heart was serving God, even in the mistakes you made.

Now, perhaps, you can go round the district and you are pretty well half asleep over it; and you can teach the class, but there is not the vigor the force, the energy, the intense desire, the burden that there once was; perhaps not all the joy. You can stand up and preach, dear brother, and you have got pretty well accustomed to it; and the people have got accustomed to it too, and they can nearly go to sleep, and you can, too, and preach asleep. It is an easy thing to do, if you once learn the wretched art. There is a kind of somnambulism in preachers; they can talk in their sleep in a very precise way—much more wonderful than walking. You cannot say, "I sleep, but my heart waketh." The fact is that it is the other way up—"I wake, but my heart sleepeth," and it is a great pity when it comes to be so.

We should pray to God that we may do every thing freshly, just as if we had never done it before, only doing it with all the improvements which experience will bring to us. Pray with your children to-night as if it were your first prayer with them. Speak with them about their souls as you had never mentioned the subject before. Talk of Jesus as if you were telling news. Why, at you not? Is it not always glad tidings? Always news fresh from heaven? So God grant us grace that, when we come to be gray, and when we toiler with our staff for very age, yet still we may tell out the story, if with feebleness of utterance yet with juvenility of heart, feeling that we are bringing forth fruit still even to old age, for the Lord still anoints us with fresh oil.

II. Now, dear friends, in the second place, will dwell upon the fear of losing it—

THE FEAR OF ITS DEPARTURE.

I have heard some express the thought that perhaps the things of God might lose their freshness to us by our familiarity with them. I think that the very reverse will turn out to be the case if the familiarity be that of a sanctified heart. In other things "familiarity breeds contempt," but in the things of God familiarity breeds adoration. The man who does not read his Bible much is the man who has a scant esteem of it; but he that studies it both day and night is the very man who will be impressed by its infinitude of meaning, till he will be ready to cry, like Jerome, "I adore the infinitude of Scripture."

When we first of all commenced to break bread on every first day of the week, I heard some say that they thought that the coming so often to the table might take away the impressiveness of the holy feast. Well, I have scarcely ever missed

Sabbath now these twenty years, and I never was so impressed with the solemnity and the sweetness of the Master's Supper as I am now. I feel it to be fresher every time. When it was once a month I had not half the enjoyment in it; and I think that where friends have the communion once a quarter, or once a year, as in some churches, they really do not give the ordinance a fair opportunity to edify them. They do not fairly test the value of an ordinance which they so grossly neglect, as it seems to me. No; you may have more, and more, and more, and more of everything that Christ has instituted and ordained, especially more and more of Himself; and the more you have the more freshness there will be.

Yes, but we have had a fear sometimes that there will be a want of freshness about ourselves. Well, that fear is a very natural one. Let me tell you some points on which, I fear, we have good ground for alarm, for we do our best to rob ourselves of all life and freshness.

Christian people can lose the freshness of their own selves by imitating one another. By adopting as our model some one form of the Christian life other than that which is embodied in the person of our Lord we shall soon manufacture a set of paste gems, but the diamond flash and glory will be unknown.

Many godly people have a very deep sense of their corruption and inward sin, and this, together with a sorrowful spirit, combines to make them a rather gloomy race. Often deeply taught in other respects, they fail to rejoice in the Lord. Certain of these have formed a school, and they have set up a standard, and they judge everybody to be a deceiver or a mere babe in grace who cannot groan as deep down as they can. This is not wise. If you do that you will lose your freshness, for you will forever be scattering dust and ashes over all the joys of your life. Why should the children of the bride-chamber mourn while the bridegroom is with them? Let us be happy while we may.

There is another set of brethren who are always glad and happy, for they are healthy and competently provided for, and out of the way of temptation, and so

THEY BELIEVE THAT THEY ARE PERFECT; they also set up a standard, and they cut down everybody who cannot sing right up into the alto notes as high as they can. Well, you will get stale, too, brother, whoever you may be, for self-laudation never keeps fresh long together. When we have heard half a dozen brethren boast that they are nearly perfect, it is about as much as some of us can stomach. I cannot stand above two of them without feeling my pugilistic propensities set in motion. Poor fools, how have they persuaded themselves to hope that self-praise will be thought to be the height of piety? It is nauseous even to those of us who are prepared to make a measure of excuse for the fervid imaginations of the brethren.

Sometimes, in this pilgrimage to the Celestial City, I join company with a brother worker who laments that he has many difficulties in dealing with poor sinners. I say to him, "I am glad of that, for I have more difficulties than you; but I see that I am not alone in my anxieties." Another I meet with says that he has been so happy in meeting with souls that have found the Lord; and I reply, "Yes, and I am glad to see you, for I am happy, too, for I have met with many who have just found the Saviour." These changes and ups and downs are like the delicious vicissitudes of the seasons—they are not always autumn, not always spring, not always winter, not always even the plenitude of summer. So with our souls, we are never so long in one stay as to find monotony in life. No, the monotony is in death; the freshness is in life. These changes and varieties create a splendid freshness which we might not hope to have if we tied ourselves to some one man's chariot, and resolved that our experience should be uniformly like his.

Another way of spoiling your freshness is by repression. The feeble sort of Christians dare not say, feel, or do, until they have asked their leader's leave. I have known a little village chapel in which, when the preacher had delivered a sermon, the people did not know whether he was sound or not till they had asked the principal deacon; or they waited till they got outside and consulted a little knot of good old men and women who had to act as tasters for all the others, and give a verdict as to the orthodoxy of the performance. A few good souls thought the sermon to be very sweet; the man seemed to be preaching the Gospel, but they did not like to commit themselves to the tune till they had got the key-note; and when they had seen the brother that led them all, then they knew; and if he said that it was all right, why, then it was all right.

Now, dear friend, if you feel that God is blessing you in any religious exercise, mind that you are blest, and let other people who do not like to be blest go without it if they must; but, as for you, be blest when you can. Do not be ashamed to enjoy that which others despise. Sit down and quietly feast on the kernel while others are breaking their teeth over the shells. If you feel that you must sing, sing without stint! Why not? In the kitchen—in the parlor—sing. Never mind if remarks are made; do not worlwards sing to their own liking; why should not you? If sometimes you feel that you cannot sing, well, then, do not sing.

and be natural, as grace makes you natural—that is the thing. Let your mind have play, and do not feel as if you went about in fetters, bound to this and pledged to that. This is a successful way of keeping up freshness—to have got rid of repression, and to be free before God.

If we want to keep up our freshness, however, the main thing is never to fall into neglect about our souls. Do you know what state the man is generally in when you are charmed by his freshness? Is he not in fine health? Some of my dear friends were wont to call and see me when I was laid by some time ago, and I am afraid that they did not find much freshness about me then. On the contrary, they heard much the same old story—weary nights and painful days; I hope I did not display much impatience, but still the tendency is to give a good deal of telling out of what one had to endure. There is not much freshness about that. But a man is fresh generally when he is well, and everything is going right with his internal economy. Then he thinks fresh thoughts and uses fresh words, for all around him life is in its flowery age, and sparkles like the morn. I am sure that it is so with the soul.

Those of you who are workers for God may have a fear that you will lose the freshness of your utterances—a fear which haunts a good many of us. Now, that may happen to us by our own fault if there be a want of searching the word, if there be a want of fresh acquisitions of sacred knowledge, and it may happen to us again, if we are always gathering the thoughts of others, and do not think ourselves. Then we shall lose freshness, and become mere dealers in second-hand observations.

Many thoughtful brethren are afraid that they may lose it through age. It does happen to men as they grow old that much of the vivacity of youth departs; and we all know ministers who have lost much of their power to edify because their freshness and variety have gone. It is a sad thing that it should have to be so with any of us; but what a blessed thing it is if we can fall back upon that assurance, "I shall be anointed with fresh oil." Nature decays, but grace shall thrive. The Holy Ghost will renew our youth. The grace of God can give us freshness after nature has ceased to yield it; and it shall be a better freshness; not the dew of our youth, but the dew of the Spirit of the Lord. If Jesus Christ be preached, age becomes an important help in bearing testimony to His faithfulness and power to bless.

And so with you, dear friends. You think, when you have done addressing the class, "Well, I am pretty well spun out. I shall never be able to get another address." Shall you not? Read that—"I shall be anointed with fresh oil." And you that go out preaching in the villages, and often cry, "I do not know what I shall do for a sermon next Sunday," think of this and be consoled—"I shall be anointed with fresh oil." Fall back on that.

If you are called to speak to the same people for any length of time it will make the promise all the more dear to you, as you can plead it before God, "Lord, anoint Thy servant with fresh oil."

III. I close with the third point, which is this precious word which gives us

HOPE OF ITS RENEWAL.

Let us not think that we must grow stale and heavenly things grow old with us:

For, first, our God in whom we trust renews the face of the year. He is beginning His work again in the fair processes of nature. The dreary winter has passed away. The time of the singing of birds is coming on, and the sweet flowers are peeping out from their graves, enjoying a resurrection of glory and beauty. Now, this is the God whom we serve; and if we have been passing through our winter-time, let us look out for our spring. If any of you have been growing cold of late—if any of you have grown stale and mechanical, and have fallen into ruts, come, look up: look up and pray the great Renewer to visit you.

"Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove,
With all Thy quickening powers.

"He restoreth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake."

Moreover, there is an excellent reason why you may expect to have all your freshness coming back again: it is because Christ dwells in you. Do you not know it? Christ is formed in you the hope of glory; and, if so, your glory will be fresh about you, for He never grows stale. It is God that said of Him, "Thou hast the dew of Thy youth." Oh, the doctrine of the indwelling of Christ in the believer—let us never forget it! As long as that is a truth there is always a hope for us.

Then there is the other grand doctrine of the indwelling of the Holy Ghost. He dwells in you. If your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost, shall He not be always to you a fountain of new life—a spring of fresh delights? Why, it must be so. The Holy Spirit is not exhausted. His power is not even lessened in any degree whatever. Come, ye that sit in dust, begin to rejoice, for God the Spirit is still with you, and shall be with you—the Comforter whom Christ has given never to be taken away.

Oh, what a blessing it is to get right deep down into God's word, for that word also is ever new, and the source of new thoughts in those who feed upon it. This is the Book of yesterday, to-day, and forever; the Book which though many of its verses were written thousands of years ago, is as new as though it were only written yesterday. From the mouth of God the promises come at this moment, full of life and freshness and power. Come to it; it is all yours; every acre of this blessed land of Canaan is yours, and will yield you corn and wine and oil. There is not a star in the great firmament of Scripture but shines for you; not a text in all this mighty treasury of God but you may take it and spend it, and live upon the produce thereof. Therefore, while the word of the Lord is so fresh and so full, it cannot be that you shall be stale in thought and conversation. You shall be anointed with fresh oil.

God Himself is with you, and He is ever full. God Himself is with you, and He is ever living. God Himself is with you, and He is ever fresh, and He shall refresh your spirit. Wherefore come away; come away from all that is stale and flat, and from all the dead past, and enter into eternal life, where flowers forever bloom, and fruits forever ripen, and the fresh springs forever flow. Come and eat the new corn of the land, and drink the new wine of the kingdom; and the Lord make you glad in His house of prayer for Jesus's sake. Amen.

The First Lesson.

A Note of Warning.

MRS. PARKER AND MADELINE.

AMONG the most lasting impressions ever received by the human mind are those made in early childhood. In more senses than one "The child is father of the man," nor could any more solemn responsibility be entrusted to mortal or immortal than that which rests upon those to whom the nurture and formation of the youthful mind are committed. The influence of statesmen and orators, of divines and of heroes, even in the strength and plenitude of their powers, is completely lost upon that portion of society which is passing through the most susceptible period of life. The true rulers of society are, after all, the mothers of society, and there is no more beautiful type of the mild and beneficent rule of infinite love than that which is found in the home where a Christian mother reigns over the young hearts which Providence has committed to her.

Such a mother was Mrs. Parker. Before marriage she had formed a high estimate of the duties devolving upon the wife and mother, and her fervent prayer to God was that if she should be blessed with a family she might be enabled to train her children in the love and fear of God. She became the mother of a little girl, and as soon as the days of infancy were past, she made it the one great object of her life to train and instruct the little one in all good and holy things. A letter written to a friend of Mrs. Parker's when the little prattler was about four years old gives a good view of what was then going on:

"You cannot imagine what unfailing interest I find in the training of Madeline. When I tell her about Jesus and His love, her little face brightens with an answering intelligence and a deep feeling which show that to child, as to sage, that simple message is the one thing needful. She is learning to write; and no words could describe the thrill I felt when, a few evenings ago, she wrote for the first time the name 'Jesus.' I tried to make her understand that she had written

"The name to sinners dear,
The name to sinners given," and I was delighted to notice the effect of what I said upon her little heart. Young as she is, many of her questions baffle me. It is wonderful how the first stirrings of the mind give rise to inquiries which touch the very core of the profoundest subjects. I know that you, who have known and loved her mother so long, will join with me in earnest prayer that the seed sown may bear fruit unto life eternal."

The deep desires and fervent prayers of that mother did not ascend to heaven in vain. Madeline has already reached a beautiful womanhood and exerts all the influence which gifts and accomplishments, when united to personal attractions, always and everywhere command. That influence is used by Madeline to lead others to Him whose name she learned to lisp, with reverent love, at her mother's knee, and in whose service she finds a satisfaction infinitely purer and deeper than any which this world can give. So far from regretting that loyalty to her Saviour closes some of the paths of worldly pleasure against her, her language is:

"Had I ten thousand thousand tongues,
Not one should silent be;
Had I ten thousand thousand hearts,
I'd give them all to Thee!"

"MY UNCLE."

THERE are some relations we are immensely fond of, and visit with much frequency. There are other relations we care to hold no communications with.

It may seem strange to say that there is a third kind of relation whom men do not love and yet visit. It is that relation whom they call by the endearing title of "My uncle."

It is a relation whom men take good care to call upon when they are hard up. When money is short, and the cupboard is empty, and the children are crying, and the landlord is knocking, knocking, the very first thought with many, is not their nearest relation, but that comparatively distant one, "my uncle."

Strange to say, "my uncle" receives his relations with open arms, and supplies their needs with hard cash.

Perhaps I ought to say "my uncle" is slightly suspicious, and cares not to advance money without something in the shape of an equivalent. He is not, however, particular as to the kind of equivalent.

He will take a wedding ring, the working-man's tools, or the one bed of the house, if it so please his nephews and nieces. The only thing he insists on is that it is an equivalent.

Now, I have often thought that it might be an interesting and a profitable thing to scrutinize this relationship, and to show how it arises. Perhaps by so doing, some of my readers may be enabled to give "my uncle" the cold shoulder.

There are many ways of being introduced to "my uncle." As, however, I am only concerned with one, I will not even hint at the others.

The most effectual method of forming his acquaintance is, I am bold to say, through the public-house bar. The drink it is which is for ever ushering men and women into "my uncle's" presence. Were it not for strong drink, he would have but few relations. He would be sitting in his parlor, cold, pale, disconsolate, and lonely, were it not for the beers, the porters, the gins, the brandies, and all the other rubbish which men and women are continually tossing down their throats.

Would you like to be present at one of these interviews?

Here comes Susan Todd with something under her shawl.

There was a time when Susan came after dark, and even then would not venture within "my uncle's" doorway, were any one about. She has become more brazen now, and stalks in in the boldest way.

Poor Susan! She was once a simple country lass with cheeks ruddy, fat, and full. A merry, laughing girl, without a single anxious thought, she seemed. But soon after she married and went to the city, the roses vanished, the face fell in, and the laugh died away. Poor Susan!

"I've got a pair of shoes here, master. What'll 'ee give me for 'em?"

Susan's voice was rough, and her manner a trifle overbearing, but there was a tear in her eye in spite of it, as she drew forth a pair of baby shoes. Why did she so reluctantly part with them? Why did she press them to her lips before she relinquished her hold of them? Why did a spasm of agony cross her features as she dropped them into the man's hand?

Because they were her dead baby's shoes, her one dead baby, who years ago pined away and died. She had kept these little shoes back last of all, because they took the place of the dead little one.

How much it had cost her to sacrifice them no tongue could ever tell; how for hours she sat motionless with the little shoes in her hand, taking her last fill, picturing the little feet once more with in them, and almost feeling their little restless movements on her hands as of old.

"Susan, how came all this about?"

"Drink. It's only the drink. It's all the drink. What could it be else? I'd have had my baby here but for the drink. And now the drink has gone and took the shoes too."

"Yes, that's it."

Oh! men and mothers all, whose poverty drives you to the pawnshop, what brings that poverty too often? You know it well. It's the drink. By and by you will have nothing to pawn. What then?

CAPTAIN SOMERVILLE'S PROJECT THWARTED.

"A LETTER for you, sir," said a waitress, opening the door of a room in which sat two ladies and a gentleman.

"Where is it Mary?" said the elder of the two ladies. "Have not you brought it up?"

Mary shook her head with a comical look of suppressed merriment and said: "The man who has brought it is afraid to trust it to me, he says he must give it to Captain Somerville 'his own self.'"

"Let him come up then," said the lady.

In a few minutes Mary returned, ushering into the room a queer specimen of humanity. He was not a groom, nor an ordinary messenger, nor a corner loafer, but he had about him some of the marks of each character. A distinct smell of the stables accompanied him, but the neatness of attire, especially about the boots, on which the groom prides himself when he is away from his sphere of labor, was conspicuous by its absence. The man was not quick enough in his movements to suggest the idea of a messenger, but he had the attentive cautious air of responsibility messengers wear.

"Captain Somerville," said the man, in a strong Irish accent, "the boss told me to give you this, and a rale hard job I've had to do it, bedad!"

The interruption was not a pleasant one to Captain Somerville. He flattered himself he was making excellent progress in the enterprise that had brought him to his present quarters, and he dreaded ill news. He was one of those designing scoundrels who gain a livelihood by dishonorable means. The little property he inherited he soon squandered at the gaming table and in the betting ring, his reputation became so bad that his superior officer advised him to resign his commission and quit the army, and he found himself at thirty years of age, without money, burdened with debt and possessed of nothing but a quantity of fashionable clothing and expensive jewelry. He managed to live for a year on the money produced by the sale of his rings, studs, and chains, and then he was cornered. Then he consorted with others of his kind and subsisted on the fruits of some barefaced swindles, in engineering which he co-operated. Then the idea of marriage occurred to him, and casually hearing that a widow and her two daughters were residing in a quiet town not far from Washington, and that they were in affluent circumstances, he resolved to go down to the locality, get an introduction, and if possible marry one of the young ladies, and eventually control the widow's entire capital. He told only one of his associates of his wicked project, gave out to the others that he was going on a shooting expedition, and then started for the locality of his prey.

Captain Somerville's polite and well-bred manner favorably impressed the people of the quiet town, and his introduction to the widow's family was soon gained, and the Captain in a few days became a frequent visitor to the house. The young ladies had lived a quiet life, and the witty remarks and amusing stories their new acquaintance knew so well how to relate won him a welcome, and he flattered himself that in a short time he might propose marriage without exciting surprise. It was at this stage of his adventure that Miles was announced and the letter delivered.

Captain Somerville knew the man; he had often seen him receive commissions from the friend who alone knew of the matrimonial scheme. He opened the letter and its first words brought him to his feet. With a face ghastly pale and his eyes almost starting out of their sockets he read the letter. It was not long, but it was very serious. In a few words he was told that he was "wanted" by the detectives on a charge of forgery, and that he had better hasten to New York and thence to Europe without delay. Somerville knew he was guilty, but he believed no one suspected the crime, so well had he covered his tracks. But it was clear now that his liberty was in peril and no course was so good as the one his friend advised. With hasty apologies he left his intended victims, hurried to his hotel, and packing his scanty luggage left instantly for New York. He succeeded in crossing the Atlantic before the detectives suspected his flight, and it was not until the extradition warrant was applied for that the widow and her daughters learned the character of their guest and suspected his scheme. Then with sincere thankfulness they acknowledged the goodness of God in delivering them from the snare of the destroyer.

THE ELEPHANT "JUMBO."

SOME account of the noted elephant Mr. P. T. Barnum has purchased from the trustees of the Zoological Gardens, London, was given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 16th, with the narrative of the unsuccessful attempt to remove him from his abode in the Gardens. The following details, extracted from English newspapers recently received, are given this week, with the accompanying picture of the huge animal.

Jumbo is twenty-one years of age, stands upwards of eleven feet in height, and weighs about six tons. Seventeen years ago, when he was transferred from the Gardens at Paris in exchange for some other animals, he was only about the size of a Shetland pony. He is now the largest elephant in Europe, and, according to the testimony of African travellers, is a giant even among African elephants, who rarely exceed the height of ten feet.

Notwithstanding the unwieldy appearance and the huge bulk of Jumbo, he has been for years a universal favorite, and as gentle with children as the best trained poodle-dog, taking the proffered biscuit or lump of sugar with an almost incredible delicacy of touch, so that the most nervous child, having once overcome his alarm, never hesitated to hand a morsel to the waving trunk a second time. At times, however, when in his house, he displayed a very uncertain temper, and this induced the Zoological Society to sell him.

When Jumbo was very young he once broke his tusks by endeavoring to force upon a door. He also underwent an effective, but somewhat bold and adventurous surgical operation by Mr. Bartlett, the Superintendent of the Zoological Gardens, who performed it for the removal of an abscess in the jaws. Mr. Bartlett took the precaution to use an instrument affixed to the end of a rod or long-handle; but he managed this with such careful aim and skill of hand, that it was quickly done, causing but little pain; and the young elephant was immediately relieved of the suffering caused by the inflammation. A second operation of the same kind was found needful, at the other side of the jaws; and the intelligent beast this time willingly submitted to similar treatment.

The Secretary of the Gardens, in reply to the animadversions called forth from the public by the proposed removal of Jumbo from England, wrote to the London Times stating that for some time past Jumbo has been a source of anxiety, as elephants after a certain age are liable to periodical fits of excitement and rage. Under such circumstances the risk of an outbreak on the part of so huge and powerful an animal in the much-frequented gardens of the Society, is one which should not be lightly incurred. In the Barnum establishment, where twenty elephants are kept, an animal can be withdrawn and kept in seclusion, for which there is no adequate provision in the Zoological Gardens.

Jumbo was left in comparative peace for two weeks, a large box on wheels having been placed at the entrance of his house, so that he should be compelled to pass through it, and in this manner become accustomed to its appearance. An effort on the part of some of the Fellows of the Society to retain him on the ground of illegality of sale, caused a law suit in chancery, but the court decided that he is legally the property of Mr. Barnum, and that he must be despatched to America. The removal has now taken place and in a few days Jumbo will probably be added to Mr. Barnum's collection.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

SUMMARY OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS OF THE STORY.

ROLAND SEFTON was the managing partner in an English bank. Mr. Clifford, the senior partner, was an old man who usually lived abroad. Felicitia, Roland's wife, a niece of Lord Riversford, was an aristocratic young lady without fortune, but possessed of literary talent. They had two children, Hilda and Felix, whom Roland tenderly loved. In trying to increase his income, principally in order that his wife might not miss any of the luxuries to which she had been accustomed, he engaged in speculations which ended disastrously. To make up his losses he appropriated and sold certain securities valued at $50,000 belonging to Mr. Clifford, and $3000 intrusted to his care by old Marlowe, a deaf and dumb wood-carver whom he had made his friend. To escape the detection that would follow Mr. Clifford's return, he absconded. By the aid of the old wood carver and his daughter Phebe, to whom he confessed his guilt, he got safely away to Switzerland, the native land of his aged mother, who lived in his family and was known as "Madame," in allusion to her foreign birth. The news of his flight was received by his wife just as she was reading her first published work. Roland when parting from Phebe Marlowe sent by her a message to his wife, asking her to meet him at Engelberg in Switzerland, in six months. The appointment was kept. Felicitia, however, could not forgive him the disgrace he had brought on her and the children, and intimated that his death would be a good thing for them. With her approval an unknown Englishman who had died the day before in the village, was represented as Roland Sefton. Roland was the only person present when he died, and he placed in the dead man's pocket his own pocket-book, papers, and the portraits of his children to give a false identification. The man was accordingly buried as Roland Sefton, and the news of his death sent to England. Meanwhile Roland, dropping his own name and calling himself Jean Merle, resolved to support himself by wood carving. Felicitia's books became popular, and she was enabled to refund with interest all those whom her husband had wronged. He had been forgiven too by Mr. Clifford and the others, and every one except Felicitia supposed he was dead. Felicitia having held no communication with him for thirteen years did not know whether he was dead or alive. Roland's children grew up in ignorance of their father's crime. Felix became a clergyman, and sought in marriage Alice, the daughter of Canon Pascal. He obtained the consent of the canon, but Felicitia refused. She feared that the secret might some day be told, and she would then be blamed. Besides that Felix's father might yet be alive and return. One night while Felix was addressing a meeting in his church, an intoxicated man entered, and before all present said that he had taken to dissipation to drown sorrow occasioned by his losses through the dishonesty of Felix's father. Felix was astonished, and went to his friend, Phebe Marlowe, to ascertain if the man's statement was true, and she told him that it was. He then called on Mr. Clifford, his father's former partner, who told him that he ought to forgive his father.

The Grave at Engelberg.

FELIX sat down near to the old man, whose chair was in the oriel window, on which the sun was shining warmly. There below him lay the garden where he had played as a child, with the river flowing swiftly past it, and the boat-house in the corner, from which his father and he had so often started for a pleasant hour or two on its rapid current. But he could never think of his father again without sorrow and shame.

"Sin hurts us most as it comes nearest to us," said old Mr. Clifford; "the crime of a Frenchman does not make our blood boil as the crime of an Englishman; our neighbor's sin is not half as black as our kinsman's sin. But when we have to look it in the face in a son, in a father, then we see the exceeding sinfulness of it. Why, Felix, you knew that men defrauded one another; that even men professing godliness were sometimes dishonest."

"I knew it," he answered, "but I never felt it before."

"And I never felt it till I saw it in my son," continued the old man sadly; "but there are other sins besides dishonesty, of a deeper dye, perhaps, in the sight of our Creator. If Roland Sefton had met with a more merciful man than I am he might have been saved."

For a minute or two his white head was bowed down, and his wrinkled eyelids were closed, while Felix sat beside him as sorrowful as himself.

"I could not be merciful," he burst out with a sudden fierceness in his face and tone, "I could not spare him, because I had not spared my own son. I had let one life go down into darkness, refusing to stretch out so much as a little finger in help, though he was as dear to me as my own life; and God required me yet again to see a life perish for my hardness of heart. I think sometimes if Roland had come, and cast himself on my mercy, I should have pardoned him; but again I know my heart was too hard then to know what mercy was. But those two, my son Robert, who died of starvation in the streets of Paris, and your father, Felix, who perished on a winter's night in Switzerland; they are my daily companions. They sit down beside me here, and by the fireside, and at my solitary meals; and they watch beside me in the night. They will never leave me till I see them again, and confess my sin to them."

"It was not you alone whom my father wronged," said Felix, "there were others besides you, who might have prosecuted him."

"Yes, but they were ignorant, simple men," replied Mr. Clifford, "they need never have known of his crime. All their money could have been replaced without their knowledge; it was of me Roland was afraid. If the time could come over again—and I go over and over it in my own mind all in vain—I would act altogether differently. I would make him feel to the utmost the sin and peril of his course; but I would keep his secret. Even Felicitia should know nothing."

"It was partly my fault too. If I had fulfilled my duty, and looked after my affairs instead of dreaming my time away in Italy, your father, as the junior partner, could not have fallen into this snare. When a crime is committed the criminal is not the only one to be blamed. Consciously or unconsciously those about him have been helping by their own carelessness and indolence, by cowardice, by indifference to right and wrong. By a thousand subtle influences we help our brother to disobey God; and when he is found out, we stand aloof, and raise an outcry against him. God has made every one of us his brother's keeper."

"Then you too have forgiven him," said Felix, with a glowing sense of comfort in his heart.

"Forgiven him? ay!" he answered, "as he sits by me at the fireside, invisible to all but me, I say to him again and again in words inaudible to all but him:

"Even as I hope for pardon in that day,
When the great Judge of heaven in scarlet sits,
So be thou pardoned."

The tremulous, weak old voice paused, and the withered hands lay feebly on his knees as he looked out on the summer sky, seeing nothing of its brightness, for the thoughts and memories that were flocking to his brain. Felix's younger eyes caught every familiar object on which the sun was shining, and knitted them up for ever with the memory of that hour.

"God help me!" he cried, "I forgive my father too; but I have lost him. I never knew the real man."

On the same August morning when Felix was riding up the long lovely lanes to Phebe Marlowe's little farmstead, Canon Pascal and Alice were starting by the earliest boat which left Lucerne for Stansstad, in the dewy coolness of the dawn. The short transit was quickly over, and an omnibus carried them into Stans, where they left their knapsacks to be sent on after them during the day. The long pleasant walk of fourteen miles to Engelberg lay before them, to be taken leisurely, with many a rest in the deep cool shades of the woods, or under the shadow of some great rock.

The only impediment with which Alice burdened herself was a little green slip of ivy, which Felix had gathered from the walls of her country home, and which she had carried in a little flower-pot filled with English soil, to plant on his father's grave. It had been a sacred, though somewhat troublesome charge to her, as they had travelled from place to place, and she had not permitted any one to take the care of it off her hands. This evening, with her own hands, she was going to plant it again upon the foreign grave of Roland Sefton; which had been so long neglected, and unvisited by those whom he had left behind him.

That Felicitia should never have made a pilgrimage to this sacred spot was a wonder to her; but that she should so steadily resist the wish of Felix to visit his father's resting-place filled Alice's heart with grave misgivings for her own future happiness.

But she was not troubling herself with any misgivings to-day, as they journeyed onward and upward through the rich meadows and thick forests leading to the Alpine valley which lay under the snowy dome of the Titlis. Her father's enjoyment of the sweet solitude and changeable beauty of their pathway was too perfect for her to mar it by any mournful forebodings. He walked beside her under the arched aisles of the pine-woods bareheaded, singing snatches of song as joyously as a school-boy, or waded off through marshy and miry places in quest of some rare plant which ought to be growing there, splashing back to her farther on in the winding road, scarcely less happy if he had not found it than if he had. How could she be troubled while her father was treading on enchanted ground?

But the last time they allowed themselves to sit down to rest before entering the village, Canon Pascal's face grew grave, and his manner towards his daughter became more tender and caressing than usual. The secret which Phebe had told him of Roland Sefton had been pondered over these many weeks in his heart. If it had concerned Felix only he would have felt himself grieved at this story of his father's sin, but he knew too well it concerned Alice as closely. This little ivy-slip, so carefully though silently guarded through all the journey, had been a daily reminder to him of his girl's love for her old playfellow and companion. Though she had not told him of its destiny he had guessed it, and now as she screened it from the too direct rays of the hot sun it spoke to her of Felix, and to him of his father's crime.

He had no design to make his daughter miserable by raising obstacles to her marriage with Felix, who was truly as dear to him as his own sons. But yet, if he had only known of this dishonest strain in the blood, would he, years ago, have taken Felix into his home, and exposed Alice to the danger of loving him? Felix was out of the way of temptation; there was no stream of money passing through his hands, and it would be hard and vile indeed for him to fall into any dishonest trickery. But it might be that his children, Alice's children, might tread in the steps of their forefather, Roland Sefton, and pursue the same devilous course. Thieves breed thieves, it was said, in the lowest dregs of social life. Would there be some fatal weakness, some insidious improbity, in the nature of those descending from Roland Sefton?

It was a wrong against God, a faithless distrust of Him, he said to himself, to let these dark thoughts distress his mind, at the close of a day such as that which had been granted to him, almost as a direct and perfect gift from heaven itself. He looked into the sweet, tranquil face of his girl, and the trustful loving eyes which met his anxious gaze with so open and frank an expression; yet he could not altogether shake off the feeling of solicitude and foreboding which had fallen upon his spirit.

"Let us go on, and have a quiet dinner by ourselves," said Alice, at last, "and then we shall have all the cool of the evening to wander about as we please."

They left their resting-place, and walked on in silence, as if they were overawed by the snow-clad mountains and towering peaks hanging over the valley. A little way off the road they saw a poor and miserable hut, built on piles of stones, with deep, sheltering eaves, but with a broken roof, and no light except such as entered it by the door. In the dimness of the interior they just caught sight of a gray-headed man, sitting on the floor, with his face hidden on his knees. It was an attitude telling of deep wretchedness, and heaviness of heart; and though neither of them spoke of the glimpse they had had, they drew nearer to one another, and walked closely together until they reached the hotel.

It was still broad day-light, though the sun had sunk behind the lofty mountains, when they rolled out again into the picturesque, irregular street of the village. The clear blue sky above them was of the color of the wild hyacinth, the simplest purest blue, against which the pure and simple white of the snowy domes and pinnacles of the mountain ranges enclosing the valley stood out in sharp, bold outlines; while the dark green of the dense pine-forests climbing up the steep slopes looked almost black against the pale gray peaks rising up from among them, with silver lines of snow marking out every line and crevice in their crowded and fretted architecture. Canon Pascal raised his head, as if he had been entering his beloved Abbey in Westminster.

"God is very glorious!" he said, in a low and reverent tone. "God is very good!"

In silence they sauntered on, with loitering steps, to the little cemetery, where lay the grave they have come to seek. They found it in a forlorn and deserted corner, but there was no trace of neglect about the gray unpolished granite of the cross that marked it. No weeds were growing round it, and no moss was gathering upon it; the stonemason, telling the name, and age, and date of death, of the man who lay beneath it, was as clear as if it had just come from the chisel of the graver. He tears sprang to Alice's eyes as she stood before it with reverently bowed head, looking down at Roland Sefton's grave.

"Did you ever see him, father?" she asked, almost in a whisper.

"I saw him once," he answered, "at Riversford Towers, when Felix was still only a baby. He was as a finer and handsomer man than Felix will ever be; and there was more foreign blood in his veins, which gave him greater gayety and simpler vacancy than Englishmen usually have. I remember how he watched over Felicity, and waited on her in an almost womanly fashion; and fetched his baby himself for us to see, carrying him in his own arms with the deft skill of a nurse. Felix is as tender-hearted, but he would not make a show of it so openly."

"Cousin Felicity must have loved him with her whole heart," sighed Alice, "yet if I were in her place, I should come here often; it would be the place I loved to come to. She is a hard woman, father; hard, and bitter, and obstinate. Do you think Felix's father would have set himself against me as she has done?"

She turned to him her sad and pensive face, almost the dearest face in the world to him; and he gazed into it with penetrating and loving eyes. Could it not be best to tell the child the secret this grave covered, here, by the grave itself? Better rather to know the truth concerning the dead, than cherish hard and unjust thoughts of the living. Even if Felicity consented, he could not let her marry Felix ignorant of the facts which Phoebe had disclosed to him. Felix himself must know them some day; and was not this the hour and the place for revealing them to Alice?

"My darling," he said, "I know why Felicity never comes here, nor lets her children come; and so why she is at present opposed to the thought of Felix marrying. Roland Sefton, her husband, the unhappy man whose body lies here, was guilty of a crime; and died miserably while a fugitive from our country. His death consigned the crime to oblivion; no one remembered it against her and her children. But if he had lived he would have been a convict; and she, and Felix, and Hilda would have shared his ignominy. She feels that she must not suffer Felix to enter our family until she has told me this; and it is the mere thought and dread of such a disclosure that has made her ill. We must wait till her mind recovers its strength."

THE GREAT PYRAMID PROPHECY

ABOUT 1882-3.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

The Building of the Pyramid According to Josephus—Why was it Built?—Mr. John Taylor's Theory—Dr. Seiss's Explanation—Its Testimony Needed—Its Site Peculiar and Suggestive—Its Perfect Plan—Its Relation to the Solar Year—To the Terrestrial Axis.

JOSEPHUS, the ancient historian, says that the Great Pyramid was built under the superintendence of "the children or descendants of Seth." In that case the heaven-born wisdom displayed in its construction is accounted for by the fact that to this chosen race, this godly line, was entrusted the understanding necessary for the accomplishment of so great a work. Some writers think that the Shepherd Prince Philites, who so mysteriously controlled and influenced King Cheops, was none other than Melchisedec, priest of the Most High God and king of Salem (or Jerusalem), mentioned in Gen. 14:18. Dr. Seiss, however, is of opinion that this kingly priest Philites was the ancient Job. The view that this wonderful Pyramid was erected under the instructions of a Seth-descended, heaven-taught Architect is confirmed by the absence of idolatrous carvings or inscriptions from it, although Egypt was full of the worship of idols and animals, and temples were erected and sacrifices offered to them.

The question, "Why was it built?" has been freely discussed of late years by men of science as well as from a Biblical standpoint. For thousands of years not a clue seemed to have been discovered leading to a correct solution of the problem, but since the publication of Mr. John Taylor's book in 1850, "The Great Pyramid—Why was it Built?" the proofs were accepted that it possessed scientific features, and scores of minds have been busily engaged in investigating still further the wonderful secrets of the time-honored fabric. Especially has this been the case since Professor Piazzi Smyth, Astronomer Royal of Scotland, with his accomplished wife, visited Egypt in 1864, and spent months in obtaining most accurate measurements of almost every part of the Pyramid. As a result, we may safely say that any theory as to its having been built for sepulchral purposes has been abandoned.

The view maintained by Professor Smyth and Dr. Seiss in his "Miracle in Stone" and by others is that the Pyramid was built not only for scientific purposes, but for chronological and prophetic also. Thus it is held that the object for which the Great Pyramid was erected, was to treasure up in its stone pages a record of Divine wisdom relating to meteorological, astronomical, chronological, and other important truths. Further, that this storehouse of knowledge was kept purposely sealed until the times we are living in, for the reason that it was to be a "witness unto the Lord of Hosts" (Isaiah 19:19, 20).

This view that the Pyramid is to be "a witness unto the Lord of Hosts" according to Isaiah 19, apparently implies that a time would come when its witnessing testimony in the earth would be needed. In other words, a time would come when not only God's Holy Word would be set at naught, but men would even deny the very existence of God Himself. A time of rank infidelity would set in, and men would laud science and the so-called wisdom of men, and demand tests of the most rigid character, ere they would accept any proposition whatever. Under these circumstances the Pyramid speaks as a witness, in language they may understand and seem most to admire—that of scientific truth; but coupled with this is testimony for God. The infidel is thus met, as it were, upon his own ground and defeated. The Christian, too, is strengthened by this additional testimony. The fact of its revelation being made now also confirms the conviction that we are living in the last days—a truth that has been ascertained and proclaimed from numerous other standpoints in harmony with the Word of God.

In pointing out some special features in the work of the Pyramid's Oriental architect, with the best aids which modern science affords, we notice in the first place, that the site chosen for the point of erection was eminently inconvenient for constructional purposes, as the rocky outcrop of the Ghizeh Hill had to be cut down and levelled, but it was essential to the grand design, it being in the 30th parallel of latitude, the very parallel which has to the north and south of it an equal distribution of terrestrial semi-surface, while the Pyramid's site itself is the very point on the earth's surface about which the dry land, or man-inhabitable portion of the globe, is equally arranged, and is also on the best line for meridional zero which could be chosen for all nations. This stands a remarkable fact, unaccounted for by any other building, ancient or modern.

Secondly we find that this structure was designed and built in its entirety on a plan so scientifically perfect, that the sum of the measured four sides of the base bears, within the nearest possible practical approach, the same relation to the measure of its vertical height that the circumference of a circle bears to its radius. We find, moreover, that a certain standard measure was used in the construction of all the expressional features of the Pyramid. That standard was a cubit of 5 x 5 pyramid inches, and when one side of the square base is measured, it is found to contain this cubit 365 times with a fraction plus, thus giving our sidereal year of days, and the plus fractions of the four sides giving in their sum the equivalent of one day in four years, or showing leap year in the cycle of four years, such cycle being indicated in the four pyramidal sides.

Now here is a feature derived from astronomy, a science not generally known with any approach to exactitude by the men of that time, but absolutely essential to chronometric structure meant to be revealed in future ages, and consequently expressed in the measurement of this vast monument, positively, and in the most enduring manner.

Thirdly, we discover that this huge pile of solid masonry was built to a microscopic nicety accurately squared, and astronomically oriented. Nearer investigation reveals a still more impressive fact, viz., that the vertical height of this Pyramid, which has already spoken in its practical manner of the time of the earth's revolution around the sun, in its annual orbit, speaks likewise of the radius of that orbit; for the vertical height, as measured in terms of any linear measure, when multiplied by its own indicated numbers, is raised to the ninth power, gives, in the same terms, the mean distance of the sun from our earth.

This is a marvellous fact, for in the time of Herodotus, which was many years after the erection of the Pyramid, the distance of the sun from the earth was supposed to be something less than a hundred miles, and through successive centuries of increasing knowledge the distance increased also, until, in the eighteenth century, the estimate had overpassed the truth in a statement of 95,000,000 of miles as the sun-distance, and it is only within a very few years that the error in observation has been so far corrected as to give results between 91,000,000 and 93,000,000 of miles. But the architect of the Great Pyramid indicated by the peculiar properties of its vertical height as above mentioned, long ages before man began to make scientific effort, that the sun-distance is 91,837,497 miles—a distance to which the most recent science-measure now closely approaches.

Fourthly, it appears that the cubit of 25 pyramid inches bears an exact relation to the only true and unchanging standard in the knowledge of man, viz., the polar axis of the earth, of whose semi-length or distance from the earth's centre to either pole this sacred cubit of the pyramidal architect is the ten-millionth part precisely.

Fifthly, it is ascertained that the pyramid inch is critically the five hundred-millionth part of the earth's axis-length, and that when the length of the diagonals of the base is found in such inches, their sum exactly expresses the precession of the equinox in an inch to a year—namely, 25,827 years.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British Administration is Beginning to admit that its Irish legislation has failed. In the House of Commons, Mr. Forster said during a debate that it was true the Coercion act had not done a great deal, but declared it had done something. It had prevented many outrages and murders by enabling the authorities to lock up those who otherwise might have committed such acts of violence. There were, he said, signs of hope. But outrages must be stopped. If they were not it would become his duty and the duty of the House of Commons to have stronger measures still. An urgent appeal was made to Mr. Forster to liberate Mr. Dillon, M.P., whose health is reported to be suffering from confinement, but Mr. Forster said in reply that he could not release Mr. Dillon on account of the state of his health, but that the doors of the prison were open to Mr. Dillon if he would leave the kingdom. This reply was received with cries of "Shame!" from the home-rule members.

A Murder Supposed to have been Committed by Land League agents is reported from Ireland. Arthur Herbert, a justice of the peace, was shot dead on Thursday while returning from the Castle Island Petty Sessions. He was the person whose expression of regret that the police had not fired upon a riotous mob was some time ago a subject of discussion in the House of Commons. Since his murder eleven lambs that belonged to him have been maliciously stabbed. Six persons have been arrested on suspicion of being concerned in the crime. The correspondent of the Tribune cables that "the Fenian outrages in Dublin for the moment are more disturbing than other features of anarchy, but the Government have discovered a mass of useful information which may surprise the agitators in the United States."

The Nihilists are Again Active in Russia.—Terrorist placards have made their appearance on the walls of St. Petersburg. One, which is of the most violent character, declares that Alexander III. is now condemned to death definitively and without appeal, as he is the incarnation of all the horrors of autocratic government and all the vices of his ancestors. These threats have made a very painful impression at Gatschina.

The Egyptian Difficulties are Reported to be again nearing a crisis. The British Government, it is stated, has succeeded in inducing the Powers not to permit exclusive Turkish intervention in Egypt. If anarchy arises, England and France may do more than Turkey. An Indian contingent is expected on the line of the canal, and Cairo will be seized. Private letters indicate that Arabi Bey's influence is waning. He must soon sink or do something desperate. The Powers are fully prepared for all contingencies.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have been Invited to visit London and conduct evangelistic services in different parts of the city. A cable message says: "An invitation signed by 300 persons, including the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Earl of Aberdeen, Samuel Morley, member of Parliament; Canons Farrar and Fleming, the Rev. Charles Spurgeon, and 273 other clergymen, has been forwarded to Messrs. Moody and Sankey, who are still laboring at Glasgow, asking them to spend a year in London in evangelical work.

A Revival of Religion has Resulted in Brisbane, Queensland, Australia, from the labors of Messrs. Harrison and Isaacs, two evangelists from the training college of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Dr. Lamson, the American Physician now lying in an English prison under sentence of death for the murder of his brother-in-law, has been respited by the English Government in deference to the personal wish of President Arthur. The President requested that Lamson's execution might be delayed until certain evidence could be sent from this country to England. The evidence in question tends to show that Dr. Lamson is a man of unsound mind; that he is an opium habitué; that he habitually takes large quantities of aconite and other deadly poisons, and always recommended them recklessly when consulted. The most important testimony is that of Rev. Irving McElroy, Rector of Christ's Church, Rouse's Point, N. Y., who entertained Dr. Lamson when he was in this country last. Dr. McElroy says: "I have always known him to be a kindly, courteous, open-hearted intelligent gentleman, a fine linguist, a skilful musician, and a thorough surgeon and medical practitioner. I believe him incapable of wilfully harming any person, and especially any person to whom he was attached. I honestly believe that all the aconitine he is reported to have purchased was bought for his own use, and that if he administered any to his brother-in-law he did so to relieve his sufferings, and gave him, carelessly, the quantity he had been in the habit of using for himself. Knowing Dr. Lamson as I have, I do not believe him capable of wilful crime of any kind, and least of all of the horrible murder of a loved wife's brother, who in his opinion as a medical man was very near death's door."

A Russian General was Assassinated by Nihilists in the streets of Odessa on March 31st. A brief telegram states that General Strelnikoff had been made Military Procureur of the Kieff Tribunal and had been sent to Odessa to conduct the proceedings against the Nihilists. He was shot with a revolver while sitting on the boulevard at Odessa. The ball penetrated the head and came out through the forehead. General Strelnikoff died immediately. Two assassins who were stopped while fleeing from the scene in a carriage, offered violent resistance and with their revolvers and poignards wounded three persons. They were finally overpowered and conveyed to a police station. A third assassin escaped. The Czar, on being apprised of the murder, ordered that the two assassins who were arrested be executed within twenty-four hours.

Christian Workers are Sorely Needed in India. The Rev. Jacob Chamberlain, a Presbyterian missionary, writing from Mandanapalle, India, tells us of whole villages coming over to Christianity, and adds: "There is a tremendous upheaval going on all through India at the present time, and I fear that Hinduism is going to fall to pieces before the Church of Christ is ready to seize the fragments of the ruins and build up the temple of the Lord."

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Initials.—In a letter written by Rev. R. M. Offord to a contemporary, the following amusing remarks occur on the initials of the great preacher: Mr. Spurgeon has thoroughly earned the title given him by an admiring friend who suggested that the preacher's initials certainly stood for Clear Headed Speaker, to which we might add, Can Handle Sermons. They who have heard him often know that the truths he proclaims Come Home Succinctly, a fact that as one Cannot Help Seeing, is due in measure to his wonderful stock of what, for the occasion, we will call Common Horse Sense.

A New Version of the Egyptian Difficulty has been furnished in a lecture on the Egyptian crisis delivered last week by General R. E. Colston, who has been serving on the general staff of the army. He charges that the incubus of debt is driving Egypt to despair; that the foreign bondholders did not advance more than one half of the money to the late viceroy that they claim, and that they, through the French and English controllers, are draining the country of its money to pay interest at usurious rates, in some cases as high as twenty per cent. He claims that the army is patriotic, and in pressing for a readjustment of the financial liabilities amounting to $500,000,000, it is really acting in the best interests of the nation. The accounts we have hitherto received have come through England or France, though it is contended that General Colston, having served in the Egyptian army, may have been influenced by his associations with it in coming to the conclusions he has formed.

A Roman Catholic Young Lady Recently went to one or two of Mr. Moody's services and was spoken to about her soul by one of the workers. At the prayer-meeting, on November 8th, this Christian friend related some of the particulars of the interview, and said: "This young lady believed that penance was the way to obtain salvation. I pointed out to her the passage in John 3: 16—'Whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' After some very earnest talk she was brought into the light, and gave herself to Christ. I am certain that she will be instrumental for much spiritual good in her home. Pray for her!"

The King of Italy and Protestant Ministers.—During the recent visit of King Humbert of Italy to Naples, the nine Protestant ministers of that city begged the favor of an interview. The young monarch granted their request, and received them with marked courtesy. He was surprised, however, when one was presented to him as a Methodist, another as a Baptist, the third as a Presbyterian, and the fourth as a Waldensian, etc. "I do not understand," said the king, "how you can all be ministers of the same Gospel and yet have so many distinctions. Perhaps one of you will be so good as to explain this to me." The Waldensian minister promptly replied: "In your Majesty's army there are many regiments wearing different uniforms and called by different names; nevertheless, they are all under one commander-in-chief and follow one flag. In like manner we Protestants are divided into various denominations, but we know only one chief—Jesus Christ; and we follow but one banner—namely, that of the Gospel of our crucified and risen Lord." The king listened attentively, and then said: "I thank you for this clear explanation. You wish me to understand that while there are differences among you on minor matters, there is unity in all that is essential."

MAJOR JAMES H. COLE, THE CHICAGO EVANGELIST.

MAJOR JAMES H. COLE.

DURING the past five weeks a very interesting and solemn scene has been witnessed night after night in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. The large congregation assembled in the immense building has sat listening with rapt attention to the earnest appeals, interesting anecdotes and lucid Scriptural exposition of Major Cole, whose evangelistic labors have been signally blessed in this country and across the Atlantic. No sign of weariness or inattention was visible at any meeting, no matter how late the hour. A deeply solemn influence prevailed, and though there was little of the excitement which usually characterizes special services, there was a gravity and earnestness manifest throughout the meetings which showed that the work, though not loud, was deep.

Major Cole's sermons, if his familiar talks can be properly so designated, were models of simplicity, and he spoke with the ease and point with which a man talks with his friend. Every listener seemed to stand alone with the speaker, and to be almost irresistibly impelled to accept as personal to himself the apt illustrations, the cogent reasoning, and the close application with which Major Cole stormed the fortress of unbelief and indifference. There was no pretence of rhetorical effort, but every man was made to realize that his duty, his interest, and his only right course was there and then to seek Christ and give his heart to God. It was rather the argument of a business man, a plain common-sense statement of a case by a man to his equals, than the lecture of a master to his disciples; and its strength consisted in its singularly clear and vigorous presentation of the case. It reminded the critical hearer of a lawyer arguing a cause before a jury, when the advocate was not only thoroughly convinced himself of the justice and strength of his case, but was also assured that the jury he addressed was composed of sensible men who did not need to be bullied, or warned, or threatened, but only needed to be enlightened as to facts and their bearing on the points at issue.

Nor were the songs without their influence on the audience. In these Major Cole joined, and it is impossible to describe the thrilling effect of the sweet harmony of voices as he and his wife and daughter sang the beautiful melodies with a tenderness and expression never heard from a hired professional choir. As the grand old words of invitation, "Whosoever will," rang out in refrain from the lips of it was easy to notice how eyes glistened in the ranks of listeners, and how sinners were moved by the words so tenderly and earnestly sung. Altogether the services have been a pleasant novelty in revival work, and one, the influence and results of which, are likely to be permanent and increasing. Three hundred souls were brought in to the kingdom as the fruit of the services, two hundred of whom have been added to the Tabernacle Church; but we are much mistaken if those numbers represent more than a small part of the good done. The seed Major Cole sows is of a kind that does not take kindly to thorny ground. It does not grow prematurely, but is likely to take root in the soul and stay there, silently spreading its roots and doing its work until the man finds there is neither peace nor happiness for him anywhere but in Christ. Major Cole is a man who is doing solid work for the Master; he is well known in the East, the West, and the South, and wherever he has labored there are evidences to-day of the seal God has set on his service. Many of our readers are already well acquainted with him personally, and they, as well as those who have not yet had the advantage of listening to him will be pleased to have some account of him and his work.

It was in 1836 that the future evangelist was born. His father was the Rev O. C. Cole, a Methodist minister still laboring at Cape Vincent, N. Y. His mother was a godly woman, earnest and faithful. She went to her reward last Easter morning. Major Cole often mentions as a remarkable fact that she was savingly converted under the ministry of Mr. Ingersoll, the father of Colonel Robert Ingersoll, whose blatant ribaldry and shallow atheism are doing so much harm among the youth of our great cities. A sound religious education laid the foundation for future usefulness, but the prayers offered by pious parents were not answered in Major Cole's youth. He commenced a business career, and his quick intelligence and clear business sagacity soon gave him a recognized position in the commercial world, and his associates predicted for him a brilliant success.

When the war broke out he was in business in Michigan, but he immediately withdrew himself, as so many other patriotic young men did in that day of national trouble, from the pursuit of gain, and enlisted in the army. He entered as a private, but before the close of the war he attained the rank of major. At one of his recent meetings a gentleman who had served as a colonel in the Southern army, after listening to Major Cole's address, made his way to the platform and heartily shaking the speaker's hand, said, "Major, we were once against each other, we are now with each other and for the kingdom of Christ." "Yes," said Major Cole, "we are recruiting now, and would to God they would all enlist."

It was not until after the war was over and Major Cole was settled in business in Chicago that he was converted to Christ.

A SAD PASSAGE IN HIS LIFE.

to which he now recurs with mingled sorrow for its humiliation, and gratitude to God for deliverance, preceded the great change. He was prospering in business, he was happily married, and the home was enlivened by the tones of a child's voice and the patter of little feet, when anxiety about his health clouded the otherwise clear sky of his prospects. Profuse nightly perspirations and other ominous symptoms occasioned alarm, and he sought medical advice. The prescription given him relieved the trouble, but it led to one still more terrible even than the one it remedied. He was ordered a mixture of cod liver oil and whiskey. This he took regularly, and was delighted to observe the beneficial change it produced in his physical health. He gained strength continually, and it was not long before he felt justified in discontinuing the medicine. But he did not discontinue it altogether; he had contracted a liking for the whiskey and he continued to take that without its nauseous accompaniment. His excitable nervous temperament craved the stimulant, and in a short time he stood aghast at the revelation that he was a slave to liquor.

Then came the fierce struggle which only those who have passed through it can adequately appreciate. Major Cole described it graphically at one of his services. The habit, he said, continued to grow upon him in spite of resolutions, in spite of the entreaties of his friends, even after the tearful face of his wife silently reproached him. By the death-bed of a beloved sister he made a new vow of reformation, and yet before her remains were placed beneath the sod he was again intoxicated. One very pathetic incident affected him deeply. He overheard his little child praying for him. "Oh, dear Jesus," said the little pleader, "won't you keep my dear papa who has made me so happy. Oh, dear Jesus, papa's a drunkard, won't you save him?" The father listened and went away determined that he would drink no more; but this vow, like those that had gone before, was soon broken, and that very night he returned to his home in the same state of degradation as on other nights. Then despair seized upon him. It was only as he began to realize tremblingly that in God alone was there hope, that light broke upon him. He saw that the ways to emancipation and to the salvation of his soul were one and the same.

A MIDNIGHT STRUGGLE.

One night he sat alone in his room. On the table before him were two strange companions. Major Cole knew them both well, one only too well, the other as yet only partially. They were, a bottle of whiskey and a Bible. The Bible lay open at the third chapter of John, and he was reading over and over again the sixteenth verse. The tortures of the drunkard's appetite were gnawing his heart, and there sat the poor enslaved man fighting it with the word of promise. It was such a struggle as John Bunyan had in his mind when he wrote of Christian's battle with Apollyon. Major Cole intuitively perceived that he had reached a crisis in his fate, and he was tortured with the struggle within him. Four long hours the conflict lasted, once the cork was drawn and more than once the trembling hand grasped the bottle for the potent draught. But it was not poured out, and just as the midnight hour struck, the bottle was seized and thrown through the open window on to the stones beneath, and the man stood free, emancipated by the power and love of God.

During this period of enslavement Major Cole's business had not suffered. His constitution was strong, and however drunk he might be at night, the next day found him busy and active and successful in his office. He was now a new man, and he determined, while continuing in business, to give to Christian work all the time he could spare. At the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association and in devotional meetings he found his opportunity, and while never thrusting himself to the front he was frequently called to the position of a leader by his associates, and received invitations from pastors of churches to conduct Bible-readings and devotional meetings; he was also active in Sunday-school work. It was his connection with this last department that led to his emancipation from

THE TOBACCO HABIT.

Major Cole was walking to his office smoking his cigar as he went, when he met a boy belonging to his Sunday-school. He was urging him to a more regular attendance, etc., and as he talked with him the wind carried a cloud of tobacco smoke from the major's cigar into the boy's face. He saw instantly that the boy was unfavorably affected by the accident, and that his appeals to him had lost much of their force, by the boy's sense of the incongruity of the habit with the Christian profession of his teacher. Major Cole turned back and went home, and there on his knees he begged of the Lord, who had delivered him from the curse of liquor, to liberate him from this other slavery. He had been a regular user of tobacco for twenty-five years, but from that day to this he has neither smoked nor chewed.

In 1871 Major Cole went to Waukegan, Ill., with Major Whittle and the late Mr. P. P. Bliss, to assist them in evangelistic work, and during the services it was laid upon the souls of all three that it was their duty to consecrate themselves wholly and entirely to the Lord's service. Major Cole at that time was carrying a large quantity of real estate, and when he returned to Chicago he made it his first business to dispose of it all. The market was rising, and he was urged to hold for a few months that he might obtain better prices. But his resolution being taken he would consent to no delay, and sold out for such prices as he could get. He then invested the proceeds in such ways as involved no necessity for personal attention, and gave himself up wholly to the work of Christ. He entered into it with all the ardor of his soul, yet always carefully watching and examining himself so that in caring for the vineyards of others his own should not be neglected. This duty led to his making the principal subject of his prayers a petition for more faith. That prayer was answered in a way that he did not expect. It was only two years from the time he had left the real estate business and invested his capital, before every dollar invested was swept away. Major Cole said God was teaching him to exercise faith in the same way as his elder brother had taught him how to swim. He had asked his brother, when they were boys together, to teach him that accomplishment, and after standing on the bank for some time watching the motions of his brother, he timidly thured into the water. His brother helped him some time, and then taking him into deep water left him, with the words, "Now swim, or you will be drowned." So he had asked for faith and now he was placed so that he must live by faith. At first he was often troubled by doubts and apprehensions, but he received much encouragement.

A PRESENT OF A BARREL OF FLOUR
 One of the most remarkable of these encouraging tokens of God's love. One morning Mrs. Cole told him that she needed money to purchase a barrel of flour, but the major had to confess that he could not supply her, for he had not so much money in the world. He was troubled, and he could not rest. Then came the thought, "I am trusting God for the salvation of my soul, and can I not trust Him in this smaller matter?" He accordingly laid the case before God in prayer, and then went to fulfil an engagement to speak at a village seven miles from Chicago. The service over, he accepted an invitation to dine with a friend at a restaurant in the neighborhood. As he sat there dinner an acquaintance entered and put into his hand a card on which was written, "When you find the bottom of your flour barrel send me a postal card with your full address." Major Cole being made no mention of the incident of the morning, was curious to trace out the origin of this strange offer. He discovered that his acquaintance in the course of business held a large quantity of flour, and having been previously unsuccessful in debt, and having vowed before God that if he was ever able to pay his debts he would give up check gambling and consecrate a portion of his gains to the Lord, he was desirous of fulfilling his vow. As he thought the matter over, the name of Major Cole was pressed on his mind, and he was irresistibly impelled to offer this barrel of flour, though why he knew not. From that day to this Major Cole has committed his whole way to the Lord, and as he wrote in his pocketbook then, so now he has found the promise of Phil. 4:19 abundantly and faithfully kept.

WORK AS AN EVANGELIST
 Major Cole's work commenced in its public character in November, 1874, though he had previously on many occasions actively labored at revival services, especially those conducted by Major Whittle and Mr. P. Bliss. In that month he was at Molines, Ill., and there a blessed work of grace was witnessed. Four weeks were spent there and the popular newspapers bore testimony to the spirit of wonderful harmony and union prevailing and to a number of dissipated and reprobate characters reformed. Thence Major Cole went to Rockland, and afterward to Baraboo, Wis., at the latter-named place in connection with Mr. John V. Swell. In March of 1875 Major Cole went to Louisville, Ky., by invitation, where he labored with Major Whittle and Mr. P. P. Bliss in a long series of services with the most blessed results. Soon after the conclusion of these services Major Cole went to Europe, and held services in London, Liverpool, Londonderry (Ireland), Gloucester, Chester and other cities. An important feature in the English work was the children's services; those held at Bow Road Hall and at the Victoria Theatre, London, being especially successful. A congregation of from 9000 to 10,000 children was by no means an uncommon gathering, large numbers attended the inquirers' meetings, and many conversions took place. Messrs. Moody and Sankey were then laboring in England, and Mr. Moody urged Major Cole to commence work among the young men of Liverpool. In complying with this request Major Cole was abundantly blessed, and among the most interesting conversions recorded were those of young men who had fallen under the power of the intoxicating cup. The major could speak from his own sad experience to these men in a way that went to their hearts, and having trodden the same path could point them to the only sure way of escape.

SALVATION OF A SCOFFER.
 At one of Major Cole's meetings in Liverpool a Christian friend called the speaker's attention to the fact that a notorious scoffer was present, and Major Cole accordingly directed his remarks pointedly toward that class of hearers, and at the conclusion of his address asked that the hymn commencing, "Stay, thou insulted Spirit, stay," should be sung. It was done, and no sooner had the last note of the music died away than the scoffer was seen to rise. He said that he and his brother had attended these and other meetings for the avowed purpose of turning them into ridicule; they were both atheists. Their mother, he said, was a Christian. He was in great distress, but said he knew that for such as he there could be no hope. Conversation and prayer followed, and at length light broke in on his soul. His cry then was "Wonderful! wonderful! that Jesus should save me. It is a miracle, a miracle!" He then went out in all haste to search for his brother and try to bring him under the same influence.

At Glasgow a large meeting was held of Christian workers in connection with Major Cole's services, when many interesting testimonies were given. Among these was that of the Rev. Dr. Cairns, especially remarkable from the fact that the caution and moderation which are prominent characteristics of Scottish character are strongly developed in Dr. Cairns. He said he had felt great pleasure and thankfulness in being associated with Major Cole in Berwick, and he could say the same in behalf of the whole evangelistic committee of that town. No impression made during the whole period of religious awakening had been more interesting than those connected with Major Cole's visit. They had meetings which quite surpassed those held in any other place he had seen in the profound impression made by the singing and addresses.

Similar testimonies were given at Perth, York, and other places, and so urgent were the requests Major Cole received to continue his work, that he abandoned his long cherished desire to visit the continent of Europe, and spent all the time he had at his disposal in Great Britain. He returned to America amid the kindest wishes of his British friends, and their earnest prayers for his continued usefulness.

Since Major Cole's return he has conducted special services in many parts of the country, of which one of the most remarkable was that at Adrian, Mich., where he now resides. There the meetings were held in the Grand Opera House, which was crowded nightly by an audience of 1500 people, and as many more went away unable to obtain admission.

Major Cole in leaving Brooklyn carries with him the warmest regards of his many friends and larger numbers than are known have reason to bless God that he was led to visit the city. Dr. Talmage thus writes of his work: "I commend this evangelistic trio to all whom I may know. There is in their singing a pathos and power different from any music I ever heard. They are thoroughly consecrated to gospel work. They live the gospel as well as sing and preach it."

"WON'T SHE BE GLAD?"

THIS was Ned Trevor's exclamation when, with shaking hand, he affixed his name to an oblong piece of paper. The writing was not good by any means. Neither was the signature very legible. There were, moreover, several smudges. Yet for all this, when Ned surveyed his clumsy handiwork he could not help exclaiming, "Won't she be glad?"

Ned Trevor had signed the pledge.

A very tough customer had Ned proved. A long siege had he required. Though wept over, talked over, prayed over, and scolded, it all seemed in vain. Wife, master, friends, and benevolent strangers, had tried their best, and failed. But just when hope was dying out, and Ned was about to be given up as a hopeless case, he flourished the pen, dipped it into the ink, made some noble smudges, scrawled his name, and, almost in the same breath, said, "Won't she be glad?"

And he was right. Ned Trevor's wife was glad.

Now, when Ned uttered these words, several thoughts were flitting about in his mind. But as he is not sufficiently educated to express himself on paper, and since it would be a pity that his thoughts should be lost to the world, I have volunteered to write them down for him.

Strongly, clearly, and in the foremost rank, there stood out this thought: "What a bad time she has had of it lately!" Bad tempers, small supplies, foul words, late hours, boots in bed, and a thousand other like inconveniences—to put it mildly—made up the picture which was photographed on Ned's brain, when he thought of the "bad time" his wife had had. He hadn't treated her at all as a true and lawful husband should. When he didn't ignore her, he would treat her as a sort of slave, or beast of burden. How the drink soured him, to be sure.

Then, alongside of this thought, there was this other one: "What a good time she'll have now!" What the beer had done, total abstinence would undo, of course. He didn't need any arguments to prove that if he kept the beer out, he would be able to keep in the sunshine. It was as clear as daylight, that by taking away the charge, the gun could not go off. It was only a thought, no doubt. A rosy flash, that was all. But he was sure of the truth, nevertheless, that his wife would be the very first who would feel the good effects of his temperance pledge. She would have as good a time now as hitherto she had had a bad one.

Then, there was a vague, misty, ill-defined sense of the help she would be to him, floating about in Ned's mind. He would find no opponent in her. She would put no temptation in his path. There would be no clinging to her own half-pint. By sympathy, by active assistance, by example, by the brightness of the home, by prayer, Ned's wife would strive to keep open the precious spring from which her home gladness was to flow. Ned knew his wife well enough to be certain she would never destroy by any neglect or carelessness the gladness her husband's abstinence would give her.

I think there was peeping out of Ned's brain this thought too, in connection with his expression, "Won't she be glad?"—"What a glad time I shall have." With the wife all smiles, it would be strange if he didn't smile too. Smiles beget smiles, especially the smiles of one's wife, and especially when the smiles have been in the past infrequent and rare. And then, to think that it was by an action of yours that the smiles were created! Who wouldn't smile under such circumstances as these? Surely there are no moments in life so sunny and radiant as those in which by some step in the right direction, you chased away the frowns and gloom, and called up a smile on another's face. To give pleasure is to receive pleasure.

I don't think I am mistaken, but I think there was another thought still in Ned Trevor's mind—"I'll take good care she remains glad." Her happiness should be something more than a flash, a momentary thing. As far as he was concerned, it should last. She should never have cause for weeping on his account. He would keep sober. He would continue to give the public-house a wide berth. He would never again touch the misery-making stuff. His pledge should not be a temporary thing, and merely for the sake of a little breathing time. It should be a lasting resolution. God helping him, he would keep on being a teetotaler, and so keep the wife's smiles ever going.

You seem, Ned, to be very delighted at the thought of making your wife glad, and I honor you for it. But I know something that will make her more glad than ever. Only give up the old life altogether, and accept the salvation of the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will make her heart dance for gladness. Let her see you a saved man through the precious blood of the Redeemer, and she will want no higher joy on earth. She is glad of your total abstinence, because she hopes it will prove to be a step to the salvation of your soul.

Then, not only will she be glad, but the angels of God will be glad too. "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth."

And don't you think the blessed Lord will be more glad than all?

"He shall see of the travail of His soul, and shall be satisfied."

EASTER MORNING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday Morning,
April 9, 1882.

"Come, see the place where the Lord lay."—

VISITING any great city we are not satisfied until we have also looked at its cemetery. We examine all the styles of cenotaph, mausoleum, sarcophagus, crypt, and sculpture. Here lies buried a statesman, yonder an orator, here a poet, out there an inventor, in some other place a great philanthropist. But with how much greater interest and with more depth of emotion we look upon our family plot in the cemetery. In the one case, it is a matter of public interest; in the other, it is a matter of private and heartfelt affection. But around at which we halt this morning, there are gathered all kinds of stupendous interest. At this sepulchre, I have to tell you, in this sepulchre there was buried a King, a Conqueror, an Emancipator, a Friend, a Brother, a Christ. Monarch of the universe, but bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, and sorrow of our sorrow, and heart of our heart. "Come, see the place where the Lord lay."

It has for surroundings, the manor in the suburbs of Jerusalem, a manor owned by a wealthy gentleman by the name of Joseph. He was one of the court of seventy who had condemned Christ, but I think he had voted in the negative, or being a timid man, had been absent at the time of the casting of the vote. He had laid out the parterre at great expense. It was a hot climate and I suppose there were broad branched trees and winding paths underneath them, while here the waters rippled over the rock into a fishpool, and yonder the vines and the flowers clambered over the wall, and all around there were the beauties of kiosk and arboriculture. After the fatigues of the Jerusalem court room, how refreshing to come out in these suburbs botanical and pomological.

I walk a little farther on in the parterre and I come across a cluster of rocks, and I see on them the marks of a sculptor's chisel. I come still closer and I find that there is a subterranean recess, and I walk down the marble stairs, and come to a portico, over the doorway an architecture of fruits and flowers chiselled by the hand of the sculptor. I go into the portico and on either side there are rooms, two, or four, or six rooms of rock; in the walls, niches, each niche large enough to hold a dead body. One of these rooms of rock is especially wealthy with sculpture. It was a beautiful and a charming spot. Why all this? The fact was that Joseph, the owner of that parterre, of that wealthy manor, had recognized the fact that he could not always walk those gardens, and he sought this as his own last resting place. What a beautiful plot in which to wait for the resurrection!

Mark well the mausoleum in the rock. It is to be the most celebrated tomb in all the ages; Catacombs of Egypt, tomb of Napoleon, Mahal Taj of India, nothing compared with it. Christ had just been murdered and His body must be thrown out to the dogs and the ravens as was customary with crucified bodies, unless there be prompt and effective hindrance. Joseph, the owner of the mausoleum, begs for the body of Christ, and he takes and washes the poor and mutilated frame from the blood and the dust, and shrouds it and perfumes it.

I think embalment was omitted. When in olden times they wished to embalm a dead body, the priest with some pretension of medical skill would show the point between the ribs where the incision was to be made. Then the operator would come and make the incision, and then run for his life else he would be slain for violating the dead body. Then the other priests would come with salt of nitre and cassia, and wine of palm tree, and complete the embalment. But I think in this case embalment was omitted lest there be more excitement and another riot.

THE FUNERAL

advances. Present, Joseph, the owner of the mausoleum; Nicodemus, who bought the flowers, and the two Marys. Heavy burden on the shoulders of two men as they carry the body of Christ down the marble stairs and into the portico and lift the dead weight to the level of the niche in the rock, and push the body of Christ into the only pleasant resting place it ever had. These men coming forth close the door of rock against the recess. The government, afraid that the disciples will steal the body of Christ and play resurrection, put upon the door the seal of the Sanhedrim, the violation of that seal, like the violation of the seal of the United States Government, or of the British Government, always followed with severe penalties.

A regiment of soldiers from the Tower of Antonio is detailed to guard that mausoleum. At the door of that tomb, took place which decided the question for all graveyards and cemeteries. Sword of lightning against sword of steel. Angel of God against the military. The body in the crypt begins to move in its shroud of fine linen and slides down upon the pavement, moves through the portico, appears in the doorway, comes up the marble steps. Christ having left His mortuary attire behind Him, comes forth in the garb of a workman as I take it, from the fact that the women mistook Him for a gardener.

There and then was shattered the tomb so that it can never be rebuilt. All the trowels of earthly masonry cannot mend it. Forever and forever it is a broken tomb. Death that day taking the side of the military received a horrible cut under the angel's spear of flame, and must himself go down at the last—the King of Terrors disappearing before the King of Grace. "The Lord is risen." Hosanna! Hosanna!

"O weep no more, your comforts slain,
The Lord is risen, He lives again."

When one of the old Christians was dying he said he saw on the sky and he said: "I cannot understand what that is I see against the sky; it is the letter 'V.'" A Christian standing beside him said: "I know what it means; that letter 'V' stands for 'victory.'" I gather up all these flowers to-day, and I strew them over the graves of your Christian dead in the letter "V" for "victory," "R" for "resurrection," "T" for "triumph," "H" for "Heaven." "The Lord is risen." Hosanna!

I. While standing around the place where the Lord lay, I am impressed with the fact that mortuary honors cannot atone for wrongs to the living. If they could have afforded Christ such a costly sepulchre they could have afforded Him a decent earthly residence. Will they give a piece of marble to the dead Christ when they might have given a soft pillow to the living Christ. If they had put half the expense of that mausoleum in the making of Christ's life on earth comfortable, the story would not have been so sad. He wanted bread; they gave Him a stone. Christ, like every other benefactor of the world, was better appreciated after He was dead. Westminster Abbey and monumental Greenwood are to a certain extent the world's attempts by mortuary honors to atone for neglects to the living. Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey an attempt to pay for the sufferings of Grub Street.

I go into that Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey and there I find the grave of Handel, the musician from whose music we hear to-day, as it goes down reverberating through the ages. While I stand at the costly tomb of Handel I cannot forget the fact that his fellow-musicians tried to destroy him with their discords. I go a little further in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey and find the grave of John Dryden, the great poet. Costly monument, great mortuary honors, but cannot forget the fact that at seventy years of age he wrote about the oppressions of misfortune and that he made a contract for a thousand verses, sixpence a line. I go a little further on in the Poets' Corner and I find the grave of Samuel Butler, the author of "Hudibras." Wonderful monument, costly mortuary honors. Where did he die in a garret.

I move further on in the Poets' Corner and find the grave of a poet of whom Waller wrote "An old schoolmaster by the name of John Milton has written a tedious volume on the fall of man. If its length be no virtue, it has none." I go a little further on in the Poets' Corner and I find the grave of Sheridan. Alas! for Sheridan. Poet! Sheridan! Magnificent mortuary honors. What a pity it was he could not have discounted the monument for a mouthful of something to eat!

O, unfilial children, give your old parents le tombstone and more blankets, less funeral and more bedroom. Five per cent of the money now expended at Burns' banquets would have made the great Scotch poet comfortable and kept him from being almost harried to death by the drudgery of an exciseman.

Horace Greeley, outrageously abused while he lived—going out to his tomb was followed by the President of the United States and the leading men of the army and the navy. Some people could not say bitter enough things about him while he lived, all the world rose up to do him honor when he died. Massachusetts is trying to-day at the tomb of Charles Sumner, to atone for the ignominious resolutions with which her legislature denounced the living senator. It is too late. The costly monument at Springfield, Illinois, cannot pay for Booth's bullet. Costly mortuary honors on the banks of Lake Erie—honors that cost between $200,000 and $300,000—cannot pay for the assassination of James A. Garfield.

DO JUSTICE TO THE LIVING.

All the justice you do you will have to do this side the gates of the necropolis. The dead cannot wake up to count the number of carriages in the procession, or see the polish on the Aberdeen granite, or to read the words of epitaphal commemoration. Costly mausoleum of the gentleman in the suburbs of Jerusalem cannot atone for Bethlehem's manger and Calvarian cross and Pilate's ruffian judiciary.

II. Again: Standing in this place where the Lord lay, I am impressed with the fact that floral and sculptural ornamentation are appropriate to the places of the dead. We are all glad that the short time of the Saviour's inhumation and sculpture. I cannot quite understand what I see in the newspapers where amid the announcements of obsequies the friends request "send flowers." Why, there is no place so appropriate for flowers as the casket of the departed. If you means allow—I repeat if your means allow—there be flowers on the casket, flowers on the bier, flowers on the grave. Put them on the brow; it means coronation. Put them in the hand; it means victory. Christ was buried in the parterre, Christ was buried in a garden. Flowers are types of resurrection. Death is sad enough anyhow. Let conservatory and arboretum do what they can in the way of alleviation. Your little girl loved flowers while she was alive. Put them in her hands, now that she cannot go forth and pluck flowers for herself. On sunshiny days twist a garland for her still heart.

Brooklyn has no grander glory than her Greenwood, nor Boston than her Mount Auburn, nor Philadelphia than her Laurel Hill, nor Cincinnati than her Spring Grove, nor San Francisco than her Lone Mountain. What shall I say of the country graveyards where the vines have fallen down and the slab is aslant and the mound is caving in, and the grass is the pasture ground for the settler's cattle. Are your father and mother of so little account you have no more respect than that for their bones? Some day gather together and straighten up the fence and lift the slab, and bap the mound, and tear out the weeds and plant the shrubs.

After a while, you yourself will want to lie down the last slumber. If you have no regard for the bones of your ancestors, your children will have no reference for your bones. Do you say these relics are of no importance? You will see of how much importance they are when the archangel takes out his trumpet. Turn all your graveyards into gardens.

III. Standing in this place where the Lord lay, am also impressed with

THE DIGNITY OF UNPRETENDING OBSEQUIES.

Joseph that day was mourner, sexton, liveryman—had the entire charge of all the occasion. Four people only at the burial of the King of the universe. Let this be consolatory to those who through small means, or lack of large acquaintance, have but little demonstration of grief at the grave of their dead. It is not necessary. Long line of glittering equipages, two rows of silver handles,asket of costly wood, pall bearers scarfed and loved are not necessary. Christ looks out from heaven at a burial where there are six in attendance and remembers there are two more than He had at His obsequies.

Not recognizing this idea, how many small properties are scattered in the funeral rites, and widowhood and orphanage go out to the cold charity of the world. The departed left enough property to have kept the family together until they could take care of themselves, but it is all absorbed in the funeral rites. That went for crape which ought to have gone for bread. A man of small means can hardly afford to die in one of our great cities! Funeral pageantry is not necessary. No one was ever more lovingly and tenderly put into the grave than Christ, but there were only four in the procession.

IV. Again; standing in this place where the Lord lay, I am impressed with the fact that

YOU CANNOT KEEP THE DEAD DOWN.

The seal of the Sanhedrim, a regiment of soldiers from the Tower of Antonio to stand guard, floor of rock, roof of rock, wall of rock, niche of rock, cannot keep Christ in the crypt. Come out and come up He must. Came out and came up He did. Prefiguration. The first fruits of them that sleep. Just as certainly as you and I go down into the grave, just so certainly we will come up again. Though you pile up on the top of us all the boulders of the mountains you cannot keep us down. Though we be buried under the coral of the deepest cavern of the Atlantic Ocean, we will rise to the surface.

Ah! my friends, death and the grave are not what they used to be to us, for now, walking around the spot where the Lord lay, we find vines and flowers covering up the tomb, and that which we called a place of skulls has become a beautiful garden. Yea, now there are four gardens instead of one: Garden of Eden, Garden of the World's Sepulchre, Garden of the Earth's Regeneration, Garden of Heaven.

Wake up, my friends, this day, this glorious Easter morning, with all these congratulations. If I understand this day, it means peace toward Heaven and peace toward earth. Great wealth of flowers have been brought by the rich and brought by the poor, brought by all classes of people. Bring more flowers. Wreath them around the brazen throat of the cannon, plant them in the desert until it shall blossom like the rose, braid them into the mane of the war charger as he comes back. No more red dahlias of human blood. Give us white lilies of peace. Strew all the earth with Easter garlands, for the resurrection we celebrate this morning implies all kinds of resurrection,

A SCORE OF RESURRECTIONS.

Resurrection from death and sin to the life of the Gospel. Resurrection of apostolic faith. Resurrection of commercial integrity. Resurrection of national honor. Resurrection of international good will. Resurrection of art. Resurrection of literature. Resurrection of everything that is good and kind and generous and just and holy and beautiful. Nothing to stay down, to stay buried, but sin and darkness and pain and disease and revenge and death. Let those tarry in the grave forever. "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men."

"Christ, the Lord, is risen to-day,
Sons of men and angels say.
Raise your songs and triumphs high,
Sing, ye Heavens, and earth reply.
Love's redeeming work is done,
Fought the fight, the battle won.
Lo! the sun's eclipse is o'er;
Lo! he sets in blood no more."

HOW I TRIED TO EARN MONEY.

"DID I do wrong when I married?" How often I have asked myself the question! My wife is one of the best of women, and it was not because I did not love her that in the time I am writing of, I felt occasionally a regret that we had ever met. No woman could have loved a man better than she loves me; no man could have had a more tender, a more devoted wife. It was because our love was so strong, so unselfish that I writhed under the trouble that oppressed me.

We were married in 1856, and settled in a city in a Western State. I was employed in a confidential position, and my employers had a high opinion of my capacity and my industry. They were Christian men, not wealthy, but keen business men, ever ready to undertake any enterprise that had in it a promise of profit. Their business was run on strict business principles; they paid every one of their employes his full market value, and they expected of each an equitable return of labor. They were not hard men, but they were not sympathetic men. I had, however, a great respect for them, and was proud of their confidence. They opened a branch office in another city in 1856, and they placed me in charge of it, and gave me an increase of salary. I was then earning sufficient to support a wife, and I had saved enough to furnish a small house. I remember well the joy that filled my heart as I walked away from the office on the day I received my new appointment, and went straight to the home of the girl I had loved from childhood.

She was one of a large family, and I knew well that beyond some linen for household use and her own clothing, her father could give her nothing. But I was young and strong, and we were both frugal in our habits and I was sure we could "make both ends meet." I found my betrothed's father, told him of the improvement in my position, and begged his consent to our marriage. He heard me quietly, and after asking a few questions, agreed that after I had taken and furnished a modest home, we should be married. That was pleasant work—the fitting up a nest for my little bird, as I used to call her. When it was complete she and her father and mother came to see it and were delighted, and a month later we were married.

The first year of our married life was very happy. We saved a little money for a rainy day, and looked forward to the future with light hearts. God gave us a child, the dearest little girl, we thought, that ever brightened a home, and we were full of gratitude to our Heavenly Father for all His mercies. Another year passed, and at its close we found that every cent I had earned and all the little hoard had been swept away. It had been saved for a rainy day, and the rain had come and melted it. My wife had been seriously ill. Medical expenses had taken much, and I had been obliged to employ a woman to nurse my wife and manage the house, and, though it had not been so comfortable as when my wife performed the duty, it had cost twice as much as then. But we looked forward hopefully to the future, and were especially thankful that the threatened life had been preserved.

It was at the end of the fifth year of our married life that the pinch really came. Family expenses had increased; the cost of clothing and educating our children, increased now both in size and number, had pressed heavily upon us, and we were in debt. I had seen my wife toiling all day like a slave to keep the house clean and neat, for we could not afford help, and then when the poor creature was so tired she could scarcely sit up—right, she brought out her work-basket and stitched and patched and darned far into the night. Oh! it was hard to watch her weary looks and know that I could give her no relief.

One night I could bear it no longer, and wrote to my employers to ask for an increase of remuneration. The business was increasing under my management, and I was doing as much work as two men. The reply was disappointing. They admitted that my lot was a hard one, but they could not admit that they were responsible for it. They said they conducted their business on "business principles," and never paid more than market value for labor. And they hinted that if the remuneration was insufficient I had better resign, as they had an unmarried man who would take my place thankfully at the same salary. I could not dispute the justice of their mode of stating the case, but, oh, how I wished they would have helped me, if only for my wife's sake.

Then temptation came. Of course I could not resign my position, for we were living from hand to mouth, and had nothing to support us while I might be without employment. But I might do more work. An unscrupulous man lived near us, who had received no education, but had been able to work up a considerable business. He knew nothing of book-keeping, and I had occasionally in a friendly way, helped him in a difficulty. He now proposed to me that I should go to his office every Sunday and post up his accounts for the week. He was in a distant city, and he wrote from there making the offer, proposing liberal remuneration and begging me to write my reply.

I shall never forget my struggle with my conscience that day. But I conquered; my conscience was at last silent, thought not at ease, and when I went home I sat down to write, accepting the proposal. My wife's pallid looks gave me fresh nerve, and I began my letter. I had so far overcome my scruples as to regard the offer as a piece of good fortune, and as such I told my wife of it. But she saw no good fortune in it. She was horror-stricken. Laying her hand on my arm, and looking sorrowfully into my face, she begged me not to entertain "such a wicked scheme." No good, she said, could come of breaking God's law. But my resolution was taken, and in spite of her protest the letter was written and sent, and I entered on my duties.

The money I gained certainly helped us, but my wife's spirits drooped and I cannot describe the unutterable weariness of the ceaseless round of labor. During the two years that I worked seven days in the week, I aged ten years, and at the end I fell sick. For a long time my life was despaired of, and the physicians said the unrelaxed strain had put me in serious peril. My conscience too smote me as I lay hovering between life and death, and I knew that if I died my soul would be lost. But through God's goodness I recovered, and as I left my sick bed my first act was to relinquish my Sunday work. I knew not how I should earn my livelihood, but I was resolved that come what would, there should be no more Sabbath-breaking.

Before I had wholly recovered, one of my employers came to see me. His kindness was a surprise, and he had nothing to say about "business principles," which surprised me still more. He came to congratulate me on prolonged life and to offer me the increased salary for which I had asked two years before. The firm had employed, while I had been ill, the unmarried man of whom they had written before, and he had defrauded them of a large sum of money and spent it in dissipation. They now were in a condition to appreciate honest service, and having ascertained the cause of my illness and how my difficulties had led to sin and sickness, they had come to the conclusion that business principles might advantageously be subordinated to some better rule of life and they accordingly offered me a salary larger even than I had asked for. Some years have passed since then, and I have prospered, but even if adversity came I should never be tempted again to commit sin for the sake of gain. I never forget how my wife's warning was fulfilled, "No good could come of breaking God's law."

Mrs. Rossiter in Camp—Father Murphy Requires Her to Testify Against Her Son—Her Evidence—A Voluntary Witness—An Eavesdropper—His Fatal Testimony.

MRS. ROSSITER—like her neighbors—had been attracted from her home to the camp by the glad news, which had travelled far and wide, that the holy war for native land and Mother Church had been triumphant, under the leadership of her parish priest, Father John Murphy. It was the duty, she felt, of every woman who accounted herself a mother in Israel to support the bold Churchman, who had so miraculously faced disciplined English soldiers with untrained men, and had wrested from them the prize of victory.

"Shure the best we have is his due," she said. "He has proved himself the chosen vessel of the Lord; and the least that we can do is to lay at his feet our willing offerings."

She and a dozen of her neighbors having set out in company from their homes, had come with their gifts an hour before Miles's arrest; and hence Father John was aware of her presence in the camp at the time when he charged Miles with infidelity and apostasy, and had clear demonstration of her complete devotedness to him.

Pressing her way through the crowd around Father John, and aided in this by the man who had come for her, it was not long before she stood upon the cleared space, in front of the chiefs in session, and, in sudden and breathless terror, saw Miles in the grasp of the two powerful men who still firmly held him.

She had not set eyes on her son for several days before this, and had been full of anxiety about him. Giving forth a cry of mingled joy and startled fear, she made towards him.

Rising from his seat and stretching forth his hand, Father John imperiously motioned her back, and forbade her to advance a step further. "Honor Rossiter," he said, "your intention is affectionate and natural. The impulse of a mother is to embrace her child—but, forbear! The curse of God is upon that young man—and to touch him would be pollution."

"The cause we have taken up, as having for its object the uprooting of all heresy and schism in the land, is the cause of God's Holy and Apostolic Church, and the promise of Christ is 'The gates of hell shall never prevail against her.' The truth of this assurance we have proved, Honor Rossiter. Our enemies have been as chaff before wind, and as the stubble before the devouring flame."

"But there has been a strange and sudden change in the tide of victory. A disastrous reverse has befallen us; our men, who once fought like lions, this morning fled like hares. The brave, who stood their ground disdaining to fly, have met a sanguinary death. The wail of widows and of orphans is heard in our midst. The shout of victory is hushed in the sleep of death; and how has this come to pass, think you, Honor Rossiter?"

"Has God become unmindful of His pledged word? Has He deceived us by assurance He did not mean to keep? No, it is impossible that He should lie! The solution of the mystery is this: there is an Achan in our camp, a blighting, pestilent Achan, and there he is—your apostate son, Miles Rossiter," and with arm outstretched he pointed towards him.

"Again I deny it," exclaimed Miles, "I protest I am no apostate, and I challenge you to the proof!"

"You must not disturb the proceedings of the court, young man," responded the president; "it cannot be allowed; but since you have repeated your language, I will also repeat mine. The proof of what I say is easy, and your subterfuge will not avail you. Will the testimony of your own mother, young man, be sufficient to refute and confound you?" asked Father John, raising his voice, but speaking with a cool and stern deliberation. "I had hoped to be able to spare her the dreadful ordeal, but in your unfilial wickedness you seem bent upon forcing upon her this agony. Confess at once your guilt, Miles Rossiter, and spare your mother this suffering."

"I cannot confess," answered Miles; "not, Heaven knows, that I have no sins to answer for, and for which Christ the only Mediator and Advocate will atone and obtain forgiveness, but I am free of the guilt with which you charge me."

"O perverse child of the Evil One," said the fanatic priest, "why do you persist in your contumacy, and why do you compel me to put a burden upon your poor mother which she will find it hard to bear? But I know that seeing what I do is only a last resort when all other methods fail, she will not be recreant to duty," said Father John, looking approvingly upon her. "Honor Rossiter, as a true Catholic and a faithful daughter of the Church and as one who feels bound to submit to the will of her spiritual guide and director without yielding to the weaknesses of a mother's love, answer, as before God, the questions I will now put to you."

Miles's mother, anticipating in her thoughts the nature of the inquiries about to be addressed to her, with bloodless lip and blanched cheeks, and eyes that spoke unutterable entreaty, looked at Father John for pity and release, but he was inexorable.

"Honor Rossiter," said Father John, "did this wretched son of yours, Miles Rossiter, ever say in your hearing 'That the Holy Roman Church was in corruption and error, has fallen from God's light and truth, and has, in fact, become no true Church of Christ at all.' Answer, I charge you, as you will have to answer for your soul at the last day, without favor or fear."

Amid the breathless and trembling silence of hundreds around her, the heart-broken Mrs. Rossiter had to admit that words like these had fallen from Miles.

"You have heard her answer," said Father John, glancing first at the surrounding multitude, and then turning a fuller look upon the chiefs beside him.

"Thank you for your fidelity," he said, again addressing Mrs. Rossiter. "You have replied fearlessly and well; but I am sorry that it will be necessary to ask you another question. Did Miles Rossiter, your son, ever say, in your presence, that the priestly office—the office to which he was dedicated in early years, and by you his mother—was a superstition, a spiritual tyranny, and a cheat?"

Mrs. Rossiter gave a faint and husky affirmative, and then, sinking into a dead swoon, she fell as one lifeless to the ground.

Miles made a rush and tried to shake off the grasp of those who held him, that he might speed to his mother's assistance, but the men who held him were on their guard and powerful, and he could not get free. He begged and entreated for a few minutes' indulgence, but Father John warned the two men who held Miles to be firm to their duty—so that agitated and burning with indignation, he had to submit to his rough-handed arrest, and merely look on while others administered that help to his mother which he wished to minister.

Notwithstanding many efforts at resuscitation, Mrs. Rossiter remained in a state of complete unconsciousness. Her eyes were closed, her face was ashy pale, her pulse ceased, and even her heart was scarcely felt to beat. Some, indeed, believed that she was certainly dying, while not a few pronounced her already dead.

This was Miles's own conviction, as, from a little distance, he caught sight of her through an opening made by the crowd for fresh air to reach her.

His eyes flashed fury, and raising his voice aloud, he cried out: "Father Murphy, you have killed my mother. You may call your work this day rightful and religious, but I call it foul murder; and I pray Heaven to avenge your crime!"

Several, indignant at this speech, were meditating immediate violence upon Miles, but Father John restrained them. "Don't rob justice of her victim," he said, "He will soon come under her power, for his fate is sealed. But mark the fellow's perversity and lies."

"All here will bear me witness that I pleaded with him not to impose a task upon his mother which I feared she could not bear; but in his indifference and hardness of heart he would have he speak, though he knew it would be agony. It was because of his stubbornness and disingenuousness that I had to put my inquiries to this poor woman I could not help myself; I was but the innocent occasion of the questions, however; he was the depraved and efficient cause of them. And yet ignoring this, this black-hearted apostate, when his mother dies under the pain which he himself inflicted, has the audacity to seek to fasten upon me his unnatural crime."

Miles then, in his own powerful style, gave a description of the condition of Catholicism in ante-revolutionary France, and declared that his revulsion of soul from all this lying legend and spiritual corruption and death was very remote indeed from apostasy.

He spoke, for the most part, to men whose minds were prejudiced against him, and yet truth is so powerful that even such minds cannot wholly resist it; and Father John had the sagacity and the mortification to see that his theory of there being a heaven-cursed Achan in the camp, and that Miles was that Achan, and that, as such, in order to propitiate Heaven, he should be immolated, was fast becoming, in the thoughts of those about him a very doubtful proposition. Even Miles himself was getting hopeful to escape the doom that threatened him; but he was not to live. Inexorable death was not to be disappointed of its prey.

A discussion was being carried on by a group of men, not far from where Father John sat in judgment, some giving it as their opinion that the charge of blasphemy and apostasy brought against Miles had failed, and others contending that it was fully established, when a man of lithe build, dark eyes and black hair—a thorough Celt—stepped out from the crowd, and stood between Miles and the chiefs in session, and asked to be allowed to make a statement.

"Certainly, Barty McCann," said the president priest. "That is, if what you have to say has to do with the case before us, which I take for granted it has, from your intelligence."

"Yis, your riverence. I think you will say what I have to swear agin this man has to do, and that a grate dale, wid the business on han," replied Barty, making a bow. "Indeed, if I ain't very much mistaken, it'll put the finish on it."

"Then proceed with your evidence," said Father John. "I'll not say, mind and speak the truth, Barty, for I'm certain you'll keep to it."

"I thank yer riverence fur yer good opinion o' me," answered Barty, making another low bow, "and it'll be me ondeavor both now and iver to deserve it."

"I don't think this man," said he, turning round and looking sharp at Miles, "I don't think this man will deny, that last evenin' when it was gettin' dusk he left the camp alone and thravell'd it to farmer Dunn's dwellin'. It makes, however, no difference whether he admits it or not," he added, "fur I swear that wid me own two eyes I seen him, yer riverence, fur I thracked him."

"Yes," answered Miles, "what you intimate so far is quite true. I did go from the camp last evening, and to where you say. I had a private reason for it, but what is there in that to condemn me? As an officer it was my privilege to go if I chose."

"Oh! you'll soon see what it has to do with it," replied Barty, with a self-confident air, "p'raps a grate dale sooner indeed than ye'll like, me man. But never mind, now, only answer me another question."

"In Mr. Dunn's house, and in his little parlor in the right hand gable, did ye, or did ye not, howld a long meetin' wid the woman whose life we give back over there?" and Barty pointed toward the spot where Sylph had knelt asking to die with Captain Vaughan.

Miles's cheeks flushed a little at the mention of his interview with Sylph, but he did not see how his visit to her, prompted by love, could compromise his safety, so he answered, "It is mean, and besides, a breach of discipline for any man in the ranks to pry in this way, and dog the movements of an officer, but it makes no matter in my case. I admit that I was for some time in the company of the lady that has been referred to," said Miles,

'and to show how innocent our meeting was, it was held in a room with the window open."

"Exactly so," remarked Barty, with a spiteful curl of the lip, "exactly so. The window, shure enough, was open. From what tuk place here the mornin' afore this wan—prisoners, that ought to lie, gittin' off through this man's schemin'—I kep' ne eye on 'im, yer riv'rance. Hidin' from view behind walls and hedges, yer riv'rance, I followed him from the camp to Mr. Dunn's house, and I seen him, from the bottom uv a dhry ditch in a field nigh hand to the house, yer riv'rance, enther he parlier that I was just now tellin' ye of. I seen him and the lady in close chat, she sittin' and him standin' right agin the winder, and they war talkin' and talkin', yer riv'rance; their tongues goin' at it fast as two flails thrashin' out the corn."

"Sez I to meself, 'there's sum goin's on there that's not altogether right and square, and, bedad, sez I, I'll know about it.' So, yer riv'rance, I crep' along the bottom o' the ditch, on me face and han's, and round be a hedge that turned up forinist wan side o' the house, and from that I crep on into a little garden, and keepin' out o' sight behind sum flower bushes, I got on to the gable end o' Mr. Dunn's house—the wan, ye undherstand, this man has confess'd to. And, I lay me down on dher the open winder. That has been owned to, as ye'll mind, and h'ard every word that passed between this man and the heretic woman."

CHRIST WALKING ON THE SEA.

S. S. Lesson for April 23, Mark 6:45-56. Golden Texts, Matt. 8:27; Is. 43:2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Lord Jesus, although He allowed the interruption of His proposed scheme of rest for His disciples, did not therefore dispense with it. No sooner were the twelve baskets of fragments gathered up from the miraculous feeding of the multitude, than "He constrained His disciples to get into the ship . . . while He sent away the people." One might have thought that such a simple service as the sending away of the people might easily have devolved upon the disciples; but Jesus knew better than they did how to recruit exhausted strength, and moreover He had a power over the multitude which they had not. Those who have had experience know well that an undisciplined throng of hearers is no easy thing to manage; and special dangers accompany the gathering of many together. A sudden panic, a rush from one side, and many may be crushed or injured, or a spirit of insubordination, and untold mischief may arise. But those whose minds are stayed on God know His mighty power to control a multitude, however vast, and only seek to bring them under thorough faith in God.

"When He had sent them away, He departed into a mountain to pray." As man, our beloved Lord was as consciously powerless as any of us can be. He said, "I can of mine own self do nothing; as I hear, I judge" (John 5:30); thus we see Him taking much time to hear His Father's will, that He might do it. This was His refreshing both of soul and body. O how it lifts us above all possibility of fear as well as all possibility of failure, when we are quite sure of the will of God! We know that He must deny Himself and be untrue to Himself if He called us to do or to endure anything for which He did not give us the needed strength and grace; therefore we can count absolutely upon Him in the most impossible circumstances, provided only that we are SURE ABOUT HIS WILL.

"How are we to be sure?" is the question which meets us on every hand. How was Jesus sure? He took pains to ascertain His Father's will; He spent much time in prayer, even when He had the most to do. "But," you say, "I do pray constantly for guidance." Perhaps when you pray, you rack your own brain to get an answer, look over your circumstances, make an inventory of the possibilities and probabilities, until you weary yourself to find the door, like the men of Sodom who were struck with blindness. And all this comes from want of confidence in God. If you were quite real in asking Him to show you your way, you would be quite calm and not try at all to find it out yourself; you would only renounce your own choice about it, and then wait quietly for an indication of His will. "But suppose it does not come in time, and a thing must be decided?" Then let man's "must" give way to God's "must." Man says you must decide; God says, "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye" (Ps. 32:8). Does not this imply, "Thou must not go forward without guidance?"

"And when the even was come, the ship was in the midst of the sea, and He alone on the land." The day was far spent when the question had arisen about the feeding of the multitude. It is not likely that this or the sending them away could have occupied less than two or three hours; for, counting women and children, there must have been about a thousand persons served by each of the twelve apostles. Thus the Lord Jesus continued most of the night in prayer while the disciples were in the ship in the midst of the lake. We have seen already how quick was the hearing of Jesus in response to a disciple's cry. Now we see that His sight was equally quick. He saw them toiling in rowing although they were not near the shore but far out "in the midst of the sea," and "the wind was contrary unto them."

We all know something of contrary winds, of the temptation to say with old Jacob, "All these things are against me." But while the winds were thus against the disciples, Jesus was praying. He who had once before stilled the winds and the waves, was even now pleading their cause, but they knew it not. Do we know it? Does it take off the edge of trial to know that He is keeping His hand upon the mainspring, and that nothing happens without His leave? Are we really calm under all circumstances, because we know that He careth for us? "About the fourth watch of the night He cometh unto them, walking upon the sea, and would have passed by them." A cry from the disciples stopped His progress; alas it was not a cry of recognition, but of fear, "they all saw Him, and were troubled." What is this?

TROUBLED AT THE SIGHT OF JESUS!

Yes, there was a reason for it which we shall find out just now. "Immediately He talked with them, and saith unto them, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." Even now they were not fully satisfied, though the presence of Jesus was there, though they heard His voice they continued troubled. "He went up unto them into the ship; and the wind ceased." But instead of being overwhelmed with love and adoration toward Him, "they were sore amazed in themselves beyond measure, and wondered."

What was the cause of it? "They considered not the miracle of the loaves; for their heart was hardened." They had looked upon the multiplying of the bread and fish upon the mountain as an exception, a special intervention of the Lord's power, which they could not expect to see exerted at all times on their behalf; and this was what grieved Jesus and brought them into such hardness of heart. They had not learned that the only hindrance to the exercise of God's power at any time on behalf of His children is simple unbelief. Why were not all the widows in Israel succored in the time of Elijah? Why was only the widow of Sarepta nourished? "Because of their unbelief." Why was the man at the pool of Bethesda the only one healed out of the many sick who lay there, when the great Healer was at hand. O it was nothing else but, "because of their unbelief." How little do we understand our God! How often do we just miss marvellous deliverances! How often should we see the arm of our God made bare, if we looked upon every difficulty simply as an opportunity for Him to manifest His power!

Peter appears to be the only one of the disciples who did battle with his unbelief; he said, "Lord, if it be Thou, bid me come unto Thee on the water." And he said, "Come." It was warrant enough for Peter: "He walked on the water, to go to Jesus." Water becomes solid ground, and impossibility becomes possible when Jesus says to us, "Come." All our life ought to be, and may be, just a walking, step by step, upon the water, wherever Jesus bids. We are called constantly to be supernatural, and to do supernatural things. To deny ourselves, to love our enemies, to rejoice in tribulation, to turn men from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God; all this is supernatural. But when Peter "saw the wind boisterous he was afraid." Had he forgotten the storm on the lake, when Jesus had arisen from His sleep and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, "Peace be still"? Alas! Peter's faith was not sufficient for the emergency; no sooner was his eye on the winds and waves, than the sea ceased to bear his weight, "and beginning to sink, he cried, saying, Lord, save me." And Jesus did save him. But it would have been more to the glory of God if Peter had continued to have confidence, and continued to walk on the water. When the Lord Jesus stretched out His hand and caught him He said unto him, "O thou of little faith, whereof didst thou doubt?" (Matt. 14:28-31). How unlike His words to the centurion and the Syrophenician woman! It was only on Peter's return with the Lord to the ship that the disciples knew that it was He; then they "worshipped Him, saying, Of a truth Thou art the Son of God."

How strange that again and again the disciples knew not Jesus; here on the lake, on the way to Emmaus, and on the evening of the resurrection; and yet the multitude who were looking for blessing and succor at His hands knew Him as soon as they had landed on the shore of Gennesaret! Disciples have preconceived notions about Jesus, whereas the poor and needy know only what He has done for others, and what He is able to do for them. "They ran through that whole region round about, and began to carry about in beds those that were sick, where they heard He was." They would do anything to bring the sufferers in

CONTACT WITH JESUS.

God give us the like zeal in bringing souls and bodies in contact with His mighty power! O how terribly indifferent we are for the most part, how easily discouraged! The mighty One, who was manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil, is close at hand to deliver; they know it not, we know it, and yet keep silence because we count upon their unbelief instead of counting upon the power of the Holy Ghost to overcome that unbelief. O God deliver us from this blood-guiltiness! This people of Gennesaret were wrought up to such a pitch of excitement that the strangest scenes were to be witnessed; streets lined with beds and chairs, wagons bringing in sick people from the outlying farmhouses, it was like a great out-door hospital. The numbers seem to have been too many for anything like an individual undertaking of their case, but they all besought one privilege, "that they might touch, if it were but the border of His garment; and as many as touched Him were made whole." Contact with Jesus was the one thing they needed, and this and this alone can bring life and healing, strength and rest, to the sick, the oppressed, the tempted, and the unsaved ones who are everywhere around us.

The Total Abstainer as a Good Samaritan.

Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston, thus writes in the current number of the Watchword: "And it came to pass as a certain man journeyed from the cradle to the grave, he fell among saloon-keepers, who robbed him of his money, ruined his good name, destroyed his reason, and then kicked him out worse than dead. A moderate drinker came that way, and when he saw him he said: 'He is but a dog; they served him right. Let him die; he is a curse to his family.' And also a license-voter came that way, and when he saw him he said: 'The brute! Put a ball and chain on his leg and work him on the street.' And a fanatic teetotaler came that way, and when he saw him he had compassion on him, and raised him up, assisted him to his home, and ministered to his wants and to the wants of his family; got him to sign the pledge, and started him on his journey in comfort and happiness. Whom, think you, was the greater friend to humanity—the saloon-keepers, the moderate drinker, the license-voter, or the fanatic teetotaler?"

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Arthur sent to the Senate on Tuesday, April 4th, a message vetoing the Chinese Bill. The President, in explaining his motives for his action, reviews the negotiations which led to a modification of the Burlingame Treaty and calls attention to the clause which requires that any limitation or suspension of immigration shall be reasonable. On this point the President said: "The examination which I have made of the treaty and of the declarations which its negotiations have left on record of the meaning of its language, leaves no doubt in my mind that neither contracting party in concluding the treaty of 1880 contemplated the passage of an act prohibiting immigration for twenty years, which is nearly a generation, or thought that such a period would be a reasonable suspension or limitation. I regard this provision of the act as a breach of our national faith, and being unable to bring myself in harmony with the views of Congress on this vital point the honor of the country constrains me to return the act with this objection to its passage." The President also considered the bill contrary to good policy, as well as a breach of faith, and suggested that a suspension of Chinese immigration for a shorter period might be tried as an experiment. An attempt was made to pass the bill over the President's veto, but it failed, the requisite two thirds not having voted in the affirmative. The vote was, yeas, 29; nays, 21.

The Reorganization of the Cabinet was Completed on Thursday, April 6th, by the list of nominations sent by the President to the Senate. Among them was that of Senator Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, to be Secretary of the Interior in place of Mr. Kirkwood, and that of Mr. William E. Chandler, of New Hampshire, to be Secretary of the Navy instead of Mr. William H. Hunt. Senator Teller's nomination was taken up without reference, and immediately confirmed. Mr. Teller is fifty-two years of age, having been born in Allegheny Co., New York, in 1830. He removed to Colorado in 1861, and when in 1876 Colorado was admitted to the Union, Mr. Teller was its first Senator. He was originally a Democrat, but since 1853 he has been in the Republican party. He is chiefly known in Congress by his persistent advocacy of the silver coinage. Mr. Teller figured in 1880 as an advocate of the third term. Mr. Teller is not regarded as a friend of the Indians, and is reported as having expressed the conviction that they have already received more kindness from the Government than they deserve. By these changes the South loses the only representative it had in the cabinet. Mr. W. H. Hunt, of Louisiana, whom President Garfield called to his cabinet in the interest of the South, is now nominated by President Arthur to be Minister to Russia.

Mr. William E. Chandler, whom the President nominated for Secretary of the Navy, is forty-seven years of age. He was born at Concord, N. H., and studied at Harvard. He was elected to the State Legislature in 1862, and was twice chosen Speaker of the House. President Lincoln in 1865 appointed him Judge Advocate-General for the Navy Department, and subsequently he was made First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. During the campaigns of 1868, 1872, and 1876 he was Secretary of the National Republican Committee. In 1877 he wrote several public letters criticizing President Hayes's action in regard to the South Carolina and Louisiana Governments. At the Chicago Convention in 1880 he supported Mr. Blaine, but voted for Garfield on the last ballot. In March, 1881, he was nominated for Solicitor-General, but his confirmation was defeated by Attorney-General MacVeagh, Senator Cameron, and all the Democratic Senators. The nomination of a friend of Mr. Blaine's for a cabinet position has occasioned much comment.

The Southern Floods Still give Cause for serious anxiety. An Associated Press telegram from New Orleans states that the water has moved southward with such fearful rapidity that the sugar is threatened with as much destruction as has afflicted the northern portion of the State. The Government commissioners have telegraphed to Secretary Lincoln that calls for relief come to them much more quickly than they expected, also that they must in consequence apply for 400,000 rations. They also state that they may be compelled to ask for still further aid, although the water is slowly receding in the northern part of the State. A report from Morgan City, La., says, under date of April 5th: "During the past twenty-four hours the water has risen two and a half inches, and it is now over the steamboat wharf. There is no land in sight, except the old war fortifications, upon which the few cattle left have taken refuge. From the Ricohoc plantation, six miles above Pattersonville, one vast sheet of water is over nearly every inch of the ground to the Gulf of Mexico. The business houses here are nearly all closed. The water in the town ranges from two to eleven feet.

Mr. Sawyer's Services in the Hall of Cooper Union are still conducted with success on Sunday evenings. It is estimated that there is a general attendance of over three thousand persons. Inquirers' meetings are held after the service in the Annex Hall, which is crowded by earnest seekers. Every Tuesday evening Mr. Sawyer holds a service of song, and on Friday a Gospel Temperance service, both of which have been used of God to the salvation of souls and the reclamation of many abandoned characters. The prayers of Christians are desired that the work may continue to enjoy God's blessing.

The Mass Meeting held at Cooper Union New York, on April 3d, to demand the release of the Irish-Americans imprisoned by the British Government, was of a most enthusiastic character. The vast building was crowded almost to suffocation, and a large assembly gathered in the open space between the Cooper Union and the Bible House to listen to addresses by well-known speakers. The speeches were chiefly of a denunciatory character, and President Arthur and Mr. Lowell, our Minister at the British Court, were severely blamed. Various schemes were advocated to effect the release of the naturalized men. Congressman Robinson, who openly advised the burning of London, and General Roger A. Pryor, who suggested that British citizens resident in this country should be "locked up for an equal length of time," were among the speakers. It was noticeable, however, that no attempt was made to show that the men imprisoned were worthy of being made the cause of an undertaking so gigantic as that of war with England. This is the more remarkable because it is claimed by friends of the administration that some of the suspects hold bogus papers of naturalization, purchased in London, while others have merely resided here long enough to obtain papers and have then returned to Ireland to assist in the cowardly assassinations and cattle mutilations ordered by the Land League. We cannot expect the British Government to allow naturalized American citizens to break British law with impunity any more than we would allow British subjects here to break our laws. It is now twenty years since Mr. Seward wrote to the British Government claiming our right to arbitrarily arrest British subjects when the interests of our Government demanded it. This is precisely what has been done in Ireland.

The Suicide of Mr. Cornelius J. Vanderbilt at his hotel in New York on Sunday, April 2d, caused much surprise among his friends and acquaintances. It was said that for the first time in his life his affairs were so straightened out as to leave him free from anxiety on the score of property. His protracted suit with his brother, Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, had resulted in the acquisition of a considerable sum of money, part of which was placed in trust. This, with the sum of $200,000 left him by his father, which was also in trust, yielded an annual income of $35,000. It was asserted by his intimate friends that during the few days prior to his suicide he had experienced a return of his youthful passion for gambling, which had already so disastrously affected his prospects, and that the night before he killed himself he spent in a gambling resort, losing heavily. It is not extraordinary that such a life as his had such an ending.

An Unusual Spectacle was Witnessed in a Jewish synagogue in New York last Sunday. The Protestant Episcopal Church of the Incarnation of which Rev. Arthur Brooks, D.D., is rector, was destroyed by fire recently. Immediately after the fire Dr. Gottheil, the rabbi of the beautiful Jewish Temple Emanu-El, on Fifth Avenue, waited on Dr. Brooks, and in the kindest and most courteous manner possible placed the building at his disposal for the Sunday services. The members of Dr. Brooks' congregation had intended hiring a concert hall or theatre for meeting until their church could be rebuilt, but when Dr. Gottheil's offer was made known, it was unanimously resolved to accept it. Many Hebrews were present at the Sunday service, and at those held during Passion week. To thoughtful minds the scene and the associations it called up were very impressive, and we may hope that some of those Jewish friends who heard the gospel of "the Nazarene" proclaimed within those walls might be moved by the Holy Spirit to recognize in Jesus the Messiah of whom their own prophets wrote.

The Record of Services Performed by the Working Women's Protective Union of New York, shows how much good may be done by energetic disinterested effort. The chairman at the recent annual meeting of the Union said that it was established as a place of refuge for working women, whether for advice in any time of trouble; whether for employment when needing the means by which she might earn a livelihood, or for protection from any threatened wrong by the withholding of wages due. A matron of much experience is in constant attendance at the rooms of the union ready and willing to hear and advise, or act in behalf of any poor working woman; and a lawyer is ready at certain appointed times to afford the various remedies of the law. All these provisions are maintained for the use and benefit of working women without any fee or cost to them, of any kind. During the existence of the institution there had been received 243,649 applications of various kinds; 41,944 employments had been furnished free of charge; 8093 complaints of fraud had been investigated, and, when needful, had been prosecuted in the courts, and $26,703.58 had been recovered and paid over to them.

A Burglar Surrendered his Tools at Jerry McAuley's new mission in Thirty-Second Street, New York, a few nights ago. He and some companions were about to rob a Fifth avenue mansion, but it was found that one of the party had no revolver, and he was sent away to get one. While he was on his errand, one of the men who were waiting for him went into the Cremorne Garden, and after staying there some time came out and, attracted by the lights over Jerry McAuley's place next door, he entered. He listened to the earnest appeals of the speakers and to the testimonies given by men whose lives had been changed through Jerry McAuley's instrumentality. He was deeply moved, and when an invitation was given to those who desired prayers, he arose, and taking from his pockets a complete set of burglar's tools he handed them to Mrs. McAuley, and kneeling down prayed earnestly for salvation. When his companions came in search of him to go to the Fifth Avenue rendezvous, they found him, his face suffused with tears, pleading with God for mercy. He was at length enabled to realize God's pardoning love in Christ. Many remarkable conversions have occurred since the new mission was opened, and Mr. and Mrs. McAuley are much encouraged by these tokens of God's blessing.

The Killing of Jesse James, the Leader of the band of Missouri bandits who effected the robbery of the train in the Blue Cut last September, by a member of his own gang on April 3rd, is one of those singular cases of retribution which God allows to take place occasionally as a warning to transgressors. These robbers were noted as the boldest, fiercest gang in the Union, and their attacks were so skillfully planned and so daringly executed that they were invariably successful. The results of their robberies from banks and trains aggregated above a quarter of a million of money. The band is now broken up, and in tracing the end of one after another of the men, it is noticed that no less than seventeen of them have been shot, and in the majority of the cases the fatal bullet was fired by some treacherous companion, or by the officers of the law through the information of a false friend. Now Jesse James has fallen by the hand of a man to whom he extended hospitality and to whom he presented the very weapon used in his killing. In the whole history of the band it cannot be found that more than one of them has died a natural death. God has warned men that this is the natural tendency of crime (Prov. 11 : 19-21).

A Railroad Company's Idea of Compensation does not appear to have been satisfactory to the other party to the contract according to the facts alleged in a suit in one of the Massachusetts courts. It is stated that a young man lost both his legs in an accident on the Grand Trunk Railroad, and the company proposed as compensation to take him into their employment. He was taught telegraphing and became an expert operator. But the young man claims that the company knowing he could not easily obtain an engagement elsewhere, took advantage of his position and refused to pay him more than forty dollars a month. As may be supposed he was unable to live on such a sum and now brings suit for damages, alleging that the company, while keeping the letter of their bargain, violated its spirit. This case has its parallel in spiritual concerns. All the promises of happiness Satan makes those who serve him he invariably fails to fulfil, but there has never been a case in which those who have trusted in the promise of Jesus, have complained that it has not been abundantly fulfilled (Mark 10 : 29, 30).

The Snow Avalanche which Fell on the town of Genoa, Nev. on March 16th caused the loss of ten lives. The first warning of the catastrophe was a rumbling sound like that of an earthquake. It was half-past five o'clock in the morning and those persons who were out of doors suspecting what was about to happen raised a cry of alarm and rang the bells. The slide came down the gorge slowly but with terrific force and swept everything before it. No obstacle seemed to check the moving mountain of snow until it spread out and lost its force on the nearly level piece of land on which Genoa is built, fully a quarter of a mile from the base of the mountain. In its track could be seen broken lumber, splinters of furniture, pine and fruit trees, hay, clothing, kitchen-ware, and bedding distributed through a body of snow and ice from 10 to 50 feet in depth and several acres in extent. The houses were carried many yards from their original location before they were finally demolished. Of those who were killed, some were crushed by the falling timbers while others were suffocated in the snow. A lady was found alive and almost unhurt, while the infant she clasped to her breast was killed. Two German visitors were sleeping that night in one of the houses ; of these one escaped without injury while the other who lay by his side was so hurt by a falling tree that when rescued no hope was entertained of his recovery. It is impossible to read the narrative of the disaster without being appalled by it. Yet the people seem to have lived under the shadow of it without serious concern. In the same way the world is now living careless of the inevitable destruction surely coming (2 Peter 3 : 4-7).

A Conflict Between a Deer and a Wild Cat was witnessed last week by a gentleman residing in Potter County, Penn. He was out in the woods when a fine deer bounded past him on the full run and on its back was fastened a huge wild cat. He followed the strangely assorted couple, and when he reached them the deer was dead and the cat was feasting on its flesh. The cat had evidently dropped on its victim from the limb of a tree, severing a large vein in the deer's neck, and had ridden it to its death. He killed the cat, which was a very large, fierce specimen. Those who have worked for Jesus among sinners have often seen cases of which this incident is a type. Young men and women, gentle, intelligent, refined, seemingly very near the kingdom of God, are kept out and driven to ruin and death by some vile, sinful habit or weakness which at first had little power over them, but which eventually obtains too firm a grip to be shaken off (2 Peter 2 : 14, 15).

A Wife's Persistent Pleading with the Governor of Arkansas for her husband's pardon was successful two weeks ago. She had during several months given all her time to this one object and her joy when she finally received the coveted document may be imagined. Her husband had been sentenced to seven years in the penitentiary and had served less than one year. The devoted woman's disappointment was almost heart-breaking when she received a telegram from the penitentiary, on the day after her return, stating that her husband was dead. The man had gone where the Governor's act of clemency, important as it was here, could not benefit him. If he sought God's pardon through the blood of Jesus with the same patient earnestness as his wife sought that of Governor Churchill, we may be sure that he did not fail to receive it (Isa. 55 : 7).

A Man sat on a Jury Empanelled to try his own case in the New York Court of Common Pleas recently. The action was brought to recover the value of goods obtained by false pretences and, by a curious blunder of the clerk, the name of the accused man was included in the jury panel. No one noticed his identity, and the man actually took his seat with the other jurors and listened to the speech of the counsel for the State. This contained some very serious charges, and ex-Judge Dittenhoefer, who appeared for the defence, was annoyed at his client being absent while such charges were being made. Glancing round the court he saw, to his amazement, the accused man sitting unmoved in the jury-box. The case was, of course, immediately stopped and sent over for the next term. On being reprimanded by his counsel for the impropriety of his conduct the defendant coolly replied, "Well you see, Judge, I was called, and I was willing to serve, for I guess I know more about the case than any of the other jurors." That was doubtless true, but had the man intended to observe his oath that very knowledge might have insured his conviction. At the great assize none will be more ready to admit their guilt than those who know themselves best, and had not God Himself found a ransom every man must have stood self-condemned before the divine judgment seat (Rom. 3 : 19).

A HOME QUESTION AND A RIGHT ANSWER.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"From that time many of His disciples went back, and walked no more with Him." Then said Jesus unto the twelve, Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered Him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God."—John 6 : 66-69.

An Effect and a Token of Grace—I. Why did the Saviour Ask the Question?—It was a Time of Defection—Of Defection Among Disciples—On Account of Doctrine—They Went Back—Open Defection—II. The Question Itself—One of Them Would go Back—All of Them Might do so—It Would be Specially Sad—Apostasy Contagious—The Following Must be Voluntary—III. Peter's Threefold Answer—He Thinks it Impossible—No Life Apart from Christ—The Son of God.

BRETHREN, we believe that the righteous shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall wax stronger and stronger. We also believe that he that believeth in Christ "hath everlasting life," and consequently must live for ever. The living water which Christ gives a man shall be in him a well of water springing up unto everlasting life. Our Lord has said of His sheep that they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of His hands. Yet we know that if any man draw back the Lord will have no pleasure in him, and we are sure that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Therefore we very heartily sing the verse in one of our hymns :

"We have no fear that Thou shouldst lose
One whom eternal love could choose ;
But we would ne'er this grace abuse,
Let us not fall ! Let us not fall !"

We consider that it would be an abusing of this grace if we were to grow careless, presumptuous, and high-minded, and imagine that for ourselves personally it would not be possible to become apostates, or even to turn aside a little from the right way. We believe the truth of the final perseverance of the saints, concerning the true people of God, but the question comes to our heart, Are we such? Is there in us the incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth forever? And how are we to know that we are such but by this very perseverance, which, while it is an effect of grace, is also one of the most certain tokens of it, for there is not the true grace of God in the heart where there is no perseverance in grace even unto the end. "He that endureth to the end shall be saved ;" but what if we should only have the transient gleams of temporary illumination, and should relapse into a thick Egyptian night? Here is cause enough for holy fear.

Come, then, brethren, trusting in the immutable grace, and love, and power of God ; let each man, nevertheless, examine himself, and let this be a time of heart-searching. First, the reason for the question : Why did Christ ask of the twelve, "Will ye also go away?" then, secondly, the question itself ; and, thirdly, the answer which Peter most fitly gave to it, which, I doubt not, he gave in the name and on the behalf of all his brethren. The like reply we would also give—"Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God."

I. First, then,

WHY DID THE SAVIOUR ASK the twelve this question? He would not have caused them needless pain ; he had a wise reason for trying them with such an inquiry.

It was, first, because it was a season of defection. "From that time many went back, and walked no more with Him." You will find, I think, that in all churches there are times of flocking in, when many fly to the church like doves to their windows ; but happy is that church which never has a time of flying out, when numbers who have been tested fail, and are no more to be found. Churches have summers, like our gardens, and then all things are full ; but then come their winters, and, alas, what emptyings are seen ! Have we not all seen the flood when the tide has come up far upon the beach, and have we not all marked the ebb when every wave has seemed to fall short of that which preceded it? Such ebbs and floods there are in the history of the kingdom of Christ.

One day, "The kingdom of God suffereth violence, and every man presses into it;" at another time men seem to be ashamed of the Christian faith, and they wander off into a thousand delusions, and the church is diminished and brought low by heresy, by worldliness, by lukewarmness, and by all sorts of evils. Often may the chronicle run thus: "Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled." It is well, then, at times when those that did run well are hindered, that the Master should say to those who for awhile remain steadfast, "Will ye also go away?"

Alas, what numbers swim with the tide! How few can swim against the current! How readily are men seized with panic, and run for it with might and main if they see others hastening from the battle. How few can hold the bridge like Horatius in the brave days of old! Well may the Saviour ask the question of us to-night, for we are as frail and fickle as others. Well may He ask it now, for worse times than these may be drawing near,—“Will ye also go away?”

It was a time, too, of

DEFECTION AMONG DISCIPLES.

I call your attention to the use of that word here. "From that time many of His disciples went back." Disciples? Yes, not merely camp-followers; not the mob that hung upon His skirts for the sake of the loaves and fishes; but some of His disciples went back. Those of nobler spirit, who had listened to His words, and for awhile had professed to call Him "Master and Lord;" even some of these deserted the standard. Their name remains; they are called "disciples" still, though they have gone back. And this sets forth the grievous guilt of such men and women as enter into the church, and then after awhile turn aside to false doctrine or to sin; they depart with their prince's regimentals upon their backs, and carry the livery of Christ into the service of Satan.

The memory of your profession will stick to you through life; it will stick to you throughout eternity. If you are a wolf in sheep's clothing some flecks of the wool will hang about you long after you have dragged the fleece over your head. Damnable apostate shall be your brand, even when you are cast away from the face of God forever. Oh, that none of us might ever earn such a title, by being reckoned among the disciples that went back and walked no more with Jesus! Yet, when disciples fall away, it is time to ask other disciples, "Will ye also go away?"

And the defection in this case was on account of doctrine. Our Saviour had done nothing that could vex His followers; He had not even spoken sharply to His disciples. Far from it. He had simply preached the glorious truth that He is the food of the new-born life; but this they did not understand, and so they would listen no farther and would not stay to ask an explanation; they went back at once, as if horrified at what they heard. The truth was too hard for them, it was not to be borne with. "It is a hard saying. Who can bear it?" A true disciple sits at the feet of his Master, and believes what he is told even when he cannot quite comprehend the meaning, or see the reasons for what his Master utters; but these men had not the essential spirit of a disciple, and consequently when their instructor began to unfold the innermost parts of the roll of truth, they would not listen to His reading of it. They would believe as far as they could understand, but when they could not comprehend they turned on their heel and left the school of the Great Teacher.

Further, it is worthy of notice that this question was put because many were not only going away from Christ, but they were going back. Read the words. They "went back and walked no more with Him." They did not go off to the right or to the left, making some slight departure from the straight road; but they turned deliberately round and went back, reversing their course, and retracing their steps. Of course in consequence of this, they were very soon what they used to be. The reclaimed drunkard went back to his cups; the cups were soon full again, and he was soon wallowing in drink, like a sow in the mire. The man who had lived a lascivious life, and for a time had cast it off to put on the garb of morality, went back, and you saw him once again in the house of the strange woman. "The dog has returned to his vomit." The reformed liar was again false, the thief was again pilfering, the swearer was again profane.

What a fool! What a multitude of fools in one is such a man! If his course was wise, why did he leave it? And if it was wise to leave it, why has he gone back to it? If it be right to go back to it, why did he not always continue in it? For this unmitigated folly his blood will be upon his own head. But when we see rational men act thus, even men of whom we hoped better things, we need not be surprised that we also are put to a stand with the personal question, "Will ye also go away?"

In the case before us the defection from Christ was for we read, "They went back, and walked no more with Him." They once walked with Jesus in the public streets, but now they will have no more to do with Christ. When Jesus preached—these constant hearers, where were they? When He worked a miracle—these admiring lookers-on, where were they? They had ministered to Him of their substance; no more supplies come from them. They had often asked Him to explain the word when He had spoken in public; they desire no more secret interviews. They had asked Him also to teach them how to pray. But they no longer care to be found upon their knees. They are not hypocrites enough to keep step with Him when their hearts are not with Him. They are, at least, decent enough to walk no more with Him now that they have gone back to their sins.

Alas, we know some that used to walk with Christ, who at this time walk no more with His people, for their hearts have gone away from Christ. The Sabbath is ignored; the house of God is forsaken; the Bible is put away; prayer is a thing neglected and perhaps despised. They walk no more with Christ, for they prefer a broader or a smother road. If anybody mentions to them what they used to be, they slink away, and seem to say, "Never mention it again: we wish it to be ignored." I remember a household where the sons and daughters all professed to be converted to Christ; but some of the young people were fond of amusements that were not consistent with the profession of religion, and, when they were found in such engagements, what did they do? Why, they blushed a little, but by-and-by they boldly averred that they had never been converted, that they were forced into it by persuasion, and hurried on by excitement to do that which their better sense led them to regret. Their excuse was as false as their former profession. They knew that they acted of their own accord, and that they willingly professed Christ. Alas, just as willingly when they came in the way of temptation they forsook Him.

Ah, apostate, it is all very well to say that you were persuaded, and all that; but you know that you did deliberately confess your faith, or you would never have been baptized by us; you did deliberately seek membership with the church of God, or you would not have been received; and on yourself must be the responsibility of it. If you have gone back from Christ you yourself must bear the shame in time and eternity. But when any do thus openly sever themselves from the companionship of the Crucified One, well may the question pass from heart to heart, "Will ye also go away?"

II. Now,

THE QUESTION ITSELF.

The Master pressed it upon the disciples—"Will ye also go away?"

He might well press the question, for one of them would certainly do so. He said, "I have chosen you twelve!" Not many—twelve. "I have chosen you." A very prudent chooser; much better able to judge than any of His ministers. "I have chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil." Are our pastors and elders likely to make a better selection? Is it likely that the percentage of deceit is less among us than in the apostolic college? I would not like to say—it would be wrong to say—that one out of every twelve of church members is a Judas. What right have I to say it? But if I were called upon to depose that I am certain that they are not, I dare not make so bold an assertion.

I fear that the average of mankind in any place would in all probability be much the same as in our Lord's day, and possibly there may be a worse state of things in London than in Judea and Galilee. Still, if we conceive our case to be improved, yet a measure of danger exists. Is it true in the case of only one member of this church that he will betray Christ? If it be, then let the question begin at the pulpit, and go round to the youngest member, "Lord, is it I?"—a question suitable for this table, for at this table of fellowship it was asked by every one of the twelve, "Lord, is it I?" Certainly, some among us—some one among us—will deny or sell his Master. God grant it be not I! Let each one breathe that prayer.

Besides, the Master knew that all of them might do so. All of them might go away from Him; apart from His grace, indeed, all of them would. There stood Peter, this very Peter who gave such a bold answer to the question; and the Master knew that there was enough in Peter to have made him as faithless as Judas if it had not been for His upholding grace. Ah, brothers, when we see others fall to-day, let us say, "It may be my case to-morrow!" Is there not the same heart, the same nature, the same tendency to sin? Have we not the same weakness? Are we not exposed to the same temptations? Is there not the same devil craftily searching out our infirmities, that he may work upon them?

ARE WE NOT ALL IN DANGER?

Moreover, he put the question to them because if they turned aside it would be specially sad. I do not read that Jesus said anything about those that had gone back already. He alludes to them by the use of the word "also," but He does not seem to have run after them to beg them to return. He knew what they were, and knew that they were best apart from Him. When the chaff was blown away it was only the fulfilment of John the Baptist's words, "His fan is in His hand, and He shall thoroughly purge His floor;" so He suffered the chaff to go to its own place. But when the Master looked at the twelve, then He said with holy care and anxiety, "Will ye? Will ye also go away?" As much as to say, "If ye go away who have been with me from the beginning, who have been chosen by me to be eye-witnesses of my life, if ye that have been near my inmost heart, and shared my trials and my joys—if ye go away it will be sin indeed."

Friends, if any of us turn aside what excuse shall be made for us? I say deliberately that if I go away from my Master I can expect nothing but the hottest wrath of God forever. Unhappy, unhappy wretch, to have preached to such multitudes, if I deny my Lord! Condemned out of my own mouth a thousand times over! I shall be a mark for all the arrows of vengeance. And what shall I say of my brethren behind me, the deacons and elders of this church? If they go away from Christ and forsake Him after their brave professions, who shall apologize for them? You will be sinners above all the sinners of your time. Oh, may it never be, for if one of the twelve shall do it, it will be the greatest sin of all. It will grieve the heart of the Master, it will open the mouths of blasphemers, it will afflict the saints, it will disgrace the apostates, and bring down upon them infinite condemnation.

And yet, do you know, when others are turning aside, the question had need be asked, for apostasy is very contagious. When backsliding and apostasy become fashionable you may ask even the twelve, "Will ye also go away?" As I have seen, in my short experience, minister after minister turning aside to novelties of doctrine, and especially into the deep pit of modern thought, into which the abhorred of the Lord do fall, I have thought of one and of another, "Will ye also go away?" As men that I have spoken with, and prayed with, and trusted in, have one by one apostatized from the faith of God's elect, I have been staggered and astounded; surely this fashionable sin has a fascinating influence over many minds, and would delude, if it were possible, the very elect. How few stand to the landmarks in this age of wandering! How few are found approved in the day of trial! The question is one that must of necessity be pressed home, "Will ye also go away?"

And, to conclude this part of our subject, our Saviour, I think, asks the question because He wishes His following to be always perfectly voluntary. We sometimes speak of "the sweet compulsions of grace." But let it be always understood that this is by way of metaphor and figure, for none can truly walk with Jesus unwillingly. The want of will would be fatal. There is an influence which the grace of God exerts upon the will, by which the unrenewed will is led captive; and yet as soon as it is a renewed will it becomes emphatically free. It ceases to be a will if it has no determining power; the grace of God gives it that power to a high degree.

Those who truly follow Christ do not follow Him because they are forced to do so.

GRACE HAS NO SLAVES;

it rules a kingdom to which the Son has given true liberty. Christians are not dragged after Christ. They yield most sweetly to the charms of His love, to the force of the truth which He teaches, and the love which He manifests. They gladly serve their Lord and Master. Jesus seems to say, "If you do not serve me so, you may go." Will you go? Christ does not want anybody to profess to be a Christian who does not wish to be a Christian. He does not want one to come to this table because he thinks it to be a law, and a custom, by which he is bound; he wants you to come because you delight to do so. He does not desire any minister to preach the gospel because he is paid for it, or because he would lose caste among godly people if he did not. He wants no slaves to grace His throne. No, no; if ye will to go, go; but if you will be to cling to Him, then will He give you grace still to follow Him, even to the end.

There is a constant winnowing going on in all churches, and this drives away the light and chaffy ones. There is a fan at work upon this floor. Some abide year after year, and yet turn out to be of no account. The Lord goes on sifting, but certain of the chaff does not blow off at first because, perhaps, the wheat is lying on the top of it; there is a good wife or holy mother or a godly husband that keeps the doubtful ones right. When these are taken away, the next blast of the winnowing fan sweeps that bit of chaff away. Oh, be not as the chaff, which is covered up, and so hidden among the wheat. Turn not aside, I pray you. The Lord keep you. I shall reckon it to be a privilege to bury you rather than have to erase your name from our church-roll for conduct inconsistent with your profession.

May you gather around my corpse when God pleases to let me go home, and may you say, "He lived an honorable life, and died faithful to his Lord." Ay, let that gathering be ere another Sabbath dawns, if God so wills, rather than that I should live to dishonor the precious truth which I have preached, and turn aside from the Master whom I profess to love. What I say to myself I think I hear each one of you say to himself or herself, "Better far that we die than that we deny our Lord."

III. I shall close up with my third head, and consider which quick-voiced Peter gave—the answer which I hope we are prepared to give to our divine Leader, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God."

It is threefold.

"Lord, to whom shall we go?" This is the first answer. Observe, that Peter does not appear to think it possible, or think it less than abominable, for a man to go back; for the natural answer to Peter's question, "To whom shall we go?" is

"Go back." No, but Peter does not tolerate the idea of going back. I ask you, my beloved brother in Christ, can you tolerate it? Can you? Can you? I might address myself to a brother who was once among the profane and the drunken who is now among the most earnest of us, and I might ask him—Brother, would you go back? I am sure that the thought of the rack would be more pleasant than the idea of returning to his old haunts. I might address myself to another who was fond of every form of gaiety, spending his money for that which was not bread, and his labor for that which did not satisfy him; he will be found among us to-night, happiest among the happy in the service of his Master, and I enquire of him, Brother, will you go back? Would you like to enjoy all your gay life again? It would be death to you.

Suppose that any of us who know the joy of being Christ's could have it proposed to us to go back; suppose we were not immoral, but were everything that could be desired in our outward conduct, would we like to go back to that dead morality which had no life of faith nor light of hope about it? No! no. When Christian in the Pilgrim's Progress thought about going back he recollected that he had no armor for his back. He had a breastplate, he was covered from head to foot by his shield; but there was nothing to protect his back, and therefore, if he retreated, the adversary could spit him with a javelin in a moment. So he thought that, bad as it was to go forward, it would be worse to go backward, and therefore he bravely cut a path for himself straight onward for glory. Look at that fact whenever you are tempted; do not endure the idea of turning tail in the day of battle!

MAY RETREAT BE IMPOSSIBLE to you. God make it impossible by His grace!

Where could I retire if I would avoid my life-call, and cease witnessing for Jesus? If I were on board ship, and a storm came on, the sailors would say, "He is the Jonah." I know they would. If I forsook my God and His cause, the lowest and meanest would point at me as a turncoat. If I were to cross the western continent, and hide away in the back settlements, it is ten to one that if I went into the most remote log cabin somebody would spy me out, and say, "Why, you are the man whose sermons I read in our newspapers. How came you here?" In the loneliest spots on earth, where men speak the English tongue, my own sermons would serve as a hue and cry, if not as a writ of arrest. I should be sure to hear the question, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" and how could I answer it? Where could I go? No hiding place remains for me. I must serve God forever. So is it with you in a degree, dear friends. You cannot get away from Jesus. You that are disciples have committed yourselves to Christ. There is nowhere for you to go.

Suppose you were to try infidelity. You know too much; you have felt too much. Unbelief would not ease you, whatever it may do with others. Be a free-thinker! Well, you are made of the wrong stuff for that now; your conscience would trouble you. Suppose you became a Romanist. Would forms and ceremonies content you? No. My brethren, I do not know where you can go if you leave Jesus and the truth. You can go down to the bottomless pit, if you will, but you will have no rest there, for the lost ones will cry, "Have you come hither? Why, you were at the Lord's table, were you not? You are the people that used to give away tracts. Did we not hear you preach at the corner of the streets?" It will be an uneasy thing for you to be lost, I tell you, sirs, ten times worse than for others; for the hiss of those who never professed religion will follow you throughout eternity; and their words will burn like coals of juniper when they cry, "Hypocrite! apostate! You knew the truth, and did it not."

There is nowhere else for us to go. If we are weary of our Master we cannot get another; where can we find another so good as He is? Shall we go back, or shall we get right with Him? Let us go at once, and tell Him how foolish we have been. Let us beg Him to keep us in His house. "Dismiss me not Thy service, Lord." I am not worthy even to unloose the latches of Thy shoes; but let me be Thy servant, for whom else can I serve? How else can I live? What other joy remains for me but to do something for Thy blessed name?

But then Peter gave a second answer; he said to our Lord, "Thou hast the words of eternal life;" as much as to say, "We cannot go away from Thee, good Master, when we think of eternity." Oh, eternity! eternity! Those who for a little pelf, or to escape a foolish laugh, shall turn aside from Christ—what will they do in eternity? Christ alone can give eternal life, or life for eternity. Apart from Him we are cast out as dead. The unbelievers shall be banished forever from the presence of God and the glory of His power, for "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." Brethren, we believe that there is salvation in Christ, and nowhere else. How can we leave Him, then? There are two ties, then, to hold us. The one is that we have nowhere else to go; and the second is that we have no life apart from Christ.

THE THIRD HOLD-FAST

is this: "We believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God." "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee." Have you learned, dear brethren, that Christ is truly the Messiah, the Son of the Father? Do you believe it? And, more than that, do you both believe and know that the Christ is also the Son of the Highest? How can we leave Him? Has God sent Him, and shall we forsake Him? Is He God, and shall we desert Him? No, good Master, at Thy feet we fall, and to those feet we cling.

You may speak this very boldly, if you speak it in the confidence of grace; for, brethren, "Who shall separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord?" What torments the saints have endured from their persecutors, and how ineffectual have been the assaults of their foes to separate them from Christ! If we are really one with Christ, Satan can no more tear us away from Jesus than he could rend away Paul or John. These saints had no more power of their own than we have; they derived everything from Christ, and we do the same. Think of how the martyrs have been scourged and even flayed alive, and yet have cried out, "None but Christ." They have been tied to the tails of horses and dragged to death, but never a thought of apostatizing has occurred to them. In those early days men, women, and children crowded the tribunals till the judges grew weary of their bloody task. The persecutors devised all kinds of tortures, such as I scarce dare mention, but the saints of God triumphed over all their torments. Fierce was the duel between the infernal cruelty of Roman paganism and the splendor of God within the souls of faithful men and women.

Oh, it was wonderful! It was wonderful! Christ laughed at His mightiest enemies, but His Spirit rested upon His poor, feeble saints, and strengthened them so that they were more than conquerors. Think of Ann Askew, whom I often quote—our own Ann Askew—sitting up after they had racked her till every bone was dragged from its fellow, and still defending the faith against the Romish shavelings. O that we had like grace. We shall have it when the trial comes, for "the Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge." If Jesus be indeed the Anointed of the Lord He will anoint us in the hour of need, and because we believe and are sure that it is even so we are bold to say in His strength, "No, Lord, we will never leave Thee. Though all men shall forsake Thee, yet will not we." By Thy faithfulness, O Lord, keep us faithful. Amen.

A Cruel Infanticide in China.

A Chinaman burying his Son.

INCIDENTS AT MR. MOODY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

"How Glad my Mother must be."—"One of the most remarkable things about these meetings," remarked Mr. Reay, "is the intense activity of the young converts. I noticed one of my own young men, a lad who was brought into the truth eight or ten months ago. I saw by his face that he had something important in hand. Presently he brought up to me a youth, in a good position in society, to be spoken with. I said to him, 'Have you given your heart to Jesus?' He said, 'I have—I have done it to-night,' and with the tears streaming down his cheeks, he said, 'Oh, how glad my mother must be to-night.' I inquired, 'Where is your mother?' 'In heaven,' he replied. 'She prayed for me long and earnestly, and she will be glad to-night. I know she will be glad to-night.' I said, 'Now, I hope you are going to live for Christ,' and with energy he replied, 'If I live, and He helps me, I will work for Jesus.'"

Waiting for Father's Decision.—Mr. A. Cannon said: "Let me just refer, as briefly as I can, to the conversion of several persons. At the Corn Exchange I saw three people sitting together. They were a father, his son about eighteen years of age, and the man's sister-in-law. I said to the father, 'Have you decided for Christ?' and then I went to the others, and put the same question to them. But the father not deciding, the son was kept back from a decision, and so was the sister-in-law. At last I said to the father, 'Now, do make up your mind. See what a responsibility rests upon you! These are all waiting for your determination.' He then said, 'Well, I don't refuse.' On Sunday night last I saw the same man in the inquiry-meeting, and he was rejoicing in having found Christ. I asked, 'How about the other two?' and he said, 'Oh, they also have decided.'"

A Mother and Two Daughters were in Mr. Kelman's church, and I talked to them in a very plain and pointed manner about their souls. One daughter sat on each side of the mother. I pointed out to her how much depended upon her decision, and I am happy to say she gave her allegiance to the Lord, and led her two daughters along with her into the fold."

Enough of Those People.—At a Prayer-meeting the Rev. Dr. Cathcart said: "I remember once being present at the induction of several friends to their first communion, and I was very much struck with the statement of the minister. He looked them over and he said, 'I think there are twenty-three of you. Now we have examined you on your knowledge, and we have heard your experience of Christ—what are you joining the Church for? Is it to do nothing? Is it to have yourselves saved—to live for yourselves? We have enough of those people already. We want working members in the Church.'"

Half-witted Jamie's Work for Christ.—Dr. Cathcart added: "In a northern city a great work of grace broke out, and among those who were converted was the half-witted man of the city. He used to curse and swear and get drunk and the rest of it. After he was saved he went to the minister and said he was anxious to join his communion. The minister asked him what evidence he had of a change in his spiritual nature, and the man said, 'I used to curse and swear, but I have left all that off now.' After a good deal of delay, he was admitted into the church, and on the following Monday morning he went to the minister, and said, 'I am a member of your church, and will you give me some work to do?' The minister had a godly wife, and he consulted her. She said, 'If the poor fellow is what he professes to be, let him distribute tracts on the Sunday mornings to the girls washing the door steps.' The man said he would come for the tracts on the Saturday night, but the minister at once gave him tracts suitable for persons intending going excursions on the Sunday. He distributed them as was suggested to him. He had given three or four to one girl, and on one occasion she handed the little book back, saying, 'Jamie, you must take back your tract again. Missus says she pays for her religion, and does not want any one to interfere with it.' Jamie said, 'She doesn't pay much for it, or it doesn't do her muckle guid, else she wouldn't keep you scrubbing the stones on the Sunday morning.' Jamie, although repulsed, continued to speak to the girl who would not have his tract, and one morning she said, 'I will take a tract this morning, if you will give me a nice one, and I am going to be at church next Sunday.' Jamie said, 'Then I will be at the door, and put you in my seat, and lend you a hymn book.' In the end, several members of that family became members of the Christian church to which Jamie, the half-witted fellow, belonged, and all through his instrumentality."

CRUEL TREATMENT OF CHILDREN IN CHINA.

By the Rev. James Sadler, of Amoy.

LET us enter a Chinese house where a little girl has just been born. Something is evidently the matter; the father looks gloomy, vexed, and disappointed. We ask, "Is the child dead?"—"No." "Why, then, are you grieved?"—"Because it is a girl." "Don't you like girls?"—"No; they are of no use." There is something ominous in his looks. They mean the death of the little one, to which the mother has consented. Why does he take into his left hand a quantity of dry rice, and with his right make it into a pellet? In order to choke the little infant. In some cases it is preferred to cause death by smothering. We turn aside to a young man of the family, and ask, "Is not this killing of infant girls a very hard thing?" "Yes," he says, "father came in to kill my little sister and tried to do it by smothering. She was a strong child, and writhed to get away from him, so that his hand trembled. He tried a second time, and a third with the same result. At last he let her live."

Sometimes the death of the innocent but hated infant girl is caused in other ways. I was going into my house one day and saw some of our students driving away a dog from a pit. I asked "What are you doing?" They gave me no answer, so I went to look, and saw a parcel, the outside of which was coarse, dirty matting. One end of it was open. A child's head was there. The top of it was eaten off by the dog, and the brains appeared. I saw the white mass and turned away as the students had done. Then I went for a man to bring a Chinese spade and do a work of mercy in digging a little grave and burying the little outcast. He did not seem willing, but was at last persuaded.

A DAUGHTER BURNED ALIVE.

Sometimes these helpless babies are put out into the roadside to live or die, as passers-by may care. A friend of mine found that there was something very disagreeable outside of his house, and went to see what it was. It turned out to be one of these little bodies going to decay. We have even heard of an infant girl being burned to death. Some people were going by a blacksmith's house and heard cries as of a child in agony. They went to see what was going on, and found a father burning to death his own child, because he considered that in this way he could drive away a bad spirit which (he thought) had caused the birth of girls instead of boys in his family. Those on-lookers could coolly stand by and see him making the fire larger until the poor little creature was a charred corpse. Chinese magistrates take no care to prevent infanticide. If you go to preach to a heathen crowd, and speak of this killing of little girls as a crime, you will be laughed at.

A CHINESE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

Sometimes in China you meet with a foundling house for gathering in these unhappy outcasts. We went to see the one established at Amoy. It was a most awful sight—filled with babies, all like little old women. Their appearance showed a distressing want of nourishment and cleanliness. We have never forgotten the sight, and can only think of it with a feeling of sickness. Even the nurses looked wretched. These various miseries may be accounted for by the want of principle often shown in heathen arrangements, especially by a system of farming out the offices of such institutions, and the efforts of all concerned to make as much gain as possible for themselves.

Sometimes a heathen man or woman is moved to save the little life and admit the child into their family. In this way, a woman whom we knew, knowing that a certain girl was to be destroyed, went to the mother and asked to be allowed to keep the little one. Her request was granted. She brought her up with her own daughters, who looked on her as a foster-sister. The girl has turned out to be a very worthy woman, whose name is known in the Christian church both at Amoy and Shanghai.

Here are some Christian Chinese parents. We inquire of them: "Have you destroyed any of your infant girls?"—"Yes." "How many?" Three, two, one, it may be. "But have you destroyed any since you have become a Christian?"—"No; no Christian destroys his girls." On examination, we find that the Christians exert their influence to awaken conscience on this subject among the heathen with considerable success.

"Daughters," say the Chinese, "are like fine young bamboos growing just outside your garden fence." That is, they may be fair and good, but what does that matter? They do not really belong to you, for in a few years they will go away into another man's house, to be his son's wife, and all your trouble in bringing them up will go for nothing. So the parents do not trouble themselves much about the education of their daughters, or about anything connected with them, in fact, except the binding of their feet, in order that when they are grown up they may be very small indeed. Every day their feet are bound with strong cotton bandages. The poor little girls cry themselves to sleep night after night during this time of pain. After a while their feet become sore, and fester; they are then dusted with a fine kind of powder, and at last numbness comes on, they lose all feeling in them, and to our eyes, walk in the clumsiest manner possible; but the Chinese say, "their gait is as the waving of the willow-trees!"

"BABY TOWERS."

In many places in China little towers are to be seen, with small openings like windows near to the ground. These are called "baby towers," and into these places the bodies of little children are thrown, wrapped round only with a piece of matting. Sometimes there is reason to fear, in the case of baby-girls, the people do not take the trouble to wait till the little ones are quite dead.

A FATHER BURYING HIS SON ALIVE.

In China, parents have the power of life and death over their children, and if a man has a bad son, and chooses to put him to death, no one can punish him for it. In a village near to Wu-Chang, a man lived whose son was a very bad character indeed; he was not only a thief, but delighted in all sorts of wickedness, and at last the people of the village would bear it no longer, and told the father he must get rid of his son at once. Accordingly, the father had a grave dug for his son, and, while yet alive, the young man was thrown into it and the grave covered in. The burial of living persons in cases of this kind is said to be not at all an unusual circumstance, and many others have taken place in this neighborhood beside the one mentioned.

It must not be imagined, however, that the Chinese are all without love for their children. This is by no means the case. Some time ago, during a summer of much sickness throughout the whole of the Yang-tse Valley, the child of a neighbor died of fever. Week after week she mourned for her little one. Her bitter weeping and wild cries went to the missionary's heart as, wringing her hands and dashing her head against the floor, with ceaseless wailing, in the strange Oriental fashion, she called to her child to return to her: "Oh, my good baby—my precious boy—my quiet, beautiful child—come back to me—come back, come back to your mother!" It was sad to see the poor woman's grief. Hers is a hard life, for her husband is an opium smoker, and the little son was the one joy of her life.

These cases show the great need which exists among the millions of China, and to all distant nations who live in heathen darkness, to tell the glad news of Christ—the Light of the world—that they may learn the principles which will elevate them, give them the Christian idea of the sanctity of human life, and will inform them that so precious is the soul of the worst of sinners, that Christ died to redeem it.

REMARKABLE CURES THROUGH FAITH AND PRAYER.

THE following incident is one of several collected from various sources by Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., of Boston, Mass., and published in his excellent book just issued entitled "The Ministry of Healing, or Miracles of Cure in all Ages." It refers to the healing of Miss Jennie Smith, who is now completely recovered of her tedious sickness, and is actively engaged in Christian work as described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 30 (page 201).

Her disease, so mysterious and agonizing and long continued that her pastor pronounced it "a narrative of suffering rarely, if ever, equalled," cannot be described at length here. Suffice it to say that she was a helpless cripple for about sixteen years, suffering much of the time the extremest agony.

One limb was subject to such violent and uncontrollable spasms that it had to be confined in a strong box, and often held down by heavy weights. During her extraordinary sufferings her faith and consecration seem to have been brought into very lively exercise, so that making her couch a pulpit, she was greatly used for quickening the spiritual life of such as came within her reach.

Meantime she began to lay hold of the promise of God for bodily healing, and getting tokens of this power in several partial reliefs, she was led on to ask and obtain entire recovery. The story of this we give in her own words. After a day of unusual suffering a few friends had gathered about her in the evening as she lay in her extension chair. She says: "The evening was devoted to prayer led by Pastor Everett. After the first hour or more some were obliged to leave. One brother, whom I had not met before, as he shook hands on leaving said, 'My sister, you are asking too much; you are too anxious to get well. The Lord can make better use of you upon your cot than upon your feet.' I was thankful for the brother's words.

I then looked searchingly into my heart. The Lord knows I honestly answered, 'No, I am not anxious to get well; I have gained the victory over that. If the heat of the furnace were increased a thousandfold I could say, Thy will be done, and feel pain would be sweet if fully shown to me that it is the Father's will that I should suffer. And I believe the time has come for me to know that will.'

"It was now after nine o'clock. We continued waiting before the Lord. Occasionally one or another would quote with comment an appropriate text of Scripture, or offer a brief prayer. For myself, I lay in quiet expectancy, still suffering, but with a remarkable sense of the divine presence. Much of the time I was almost oblivious to my surroundings, so engaged was I in communion with my heavenly Father.

"About eleven o'clock I was led to offer myself to God in fresh consecration, saying: 'I give this body anew—these eyes to see, these lips to talk, these ears to hear, and if it be Thy will, these feet to walk—for Jesus. All that is of me—all, all is Thine, dear Father. Only let Thy will be done.'

"Up to this time there was no cessation of suffering, or increase of strength. As before said I was weaker than usual. After a brief silence there suddenly flashed upon me a most vivid view of the healing of the withered arm. It seemed to me I could see it being thrust out whole. At the same instant the Holy Spirit bestowed on my soul a faith to claim a similar blessing. It seemed as if heaven were at that moment opened, and I was conscious of a baptism of strength as sensibly and as positively as if an electric shock had passed through my system. I felt definitely the strength come into my back, and into my helpless limbs. Laying my hands on the chair-arms I raised myself to a sitting posture. The Garigues brothers, being seated on either side of the chair, involuntarily sprang forward and laid hold to assist me. This, however, was not necessary. My physician, Dr. Morgan, who was sitting near, stepped forward and let down the footboard, and, while the hands of my friends were yet on my shoulders I arose and stood upon my feet.

"My first thought was 'can I kneel?' I asked to do so and knelt as naturally as if I had been accustomed to it. There was so much of the divine presence that not a word was spoken; we poured forth our souls in silent thanksgiving and praise. I then arose and walked across the room with entire ease and naturalness; there were no unpleasant sensations. I then sat down in a rocking chair for some moments. It seemed so wonderful that I did not have to learn to walk. My limbs and body seemed as if made new."

Another remarkable incident is that of

THE SON OF A PHYSICIAN,

Dr. R., of Philadelphia. Dr. R. thus described it to Dr. Boardman who quoted it in his work "The Great Physician."

The children were jumping off from a bench and my little son fell and broke both bones of his arm below the elbow. My brother, who is a professor of surgery in the college at Chicago, was here on a visit. I asked him to set and dress the arm. He did so; put it in splints, bandages, and in a sling. The child was very patient, and went about without a murmur all that day. The next morning he came to me and said, "Dear papa, please take off these things." "Oh, no, my son! you will have to wear these things five or six weeks before it will be well." "Why, papa, it is well." "Oh no, my dear child! that is impossible." "Why, papa, you believe in prayer, don't you?" "You know I do, my son." "Well, last night when I went to bed it hurt me very bad, and I asked Jesus to make it well, and it is well."

I did not like to say a word to chill his faith. A happy thought came; I said, "My dear child, your uncle put the things on, and if they are taken off he must do it." Away he went to his uncle, who told him he would have to go as he was six or seven weeks and must be very patient; and when the little fellow told him Jesus had made him well, he said, "Pooh! pooh! nonsense," and sent him away. The next morning the poor boy came again to me and pleaded with so much sincerity and confidence that I more than half believed that he was really healed, and went to my brother and said, "Had you not better undo his arm and let him see for himself? Then he will be satisfied. If you do not, I fear, though he is very obedient, he may be tempted to undo it himself, and then it may be worse for him." My brother yielded, took off the bandages and splints, and exclaimed, "It is well, absolutely well," and hastened to the door for air to keep from fainting.

He had been a really simple-hearted Christian, but in his student days wandered away; but this brought him back to the Lord. Strange if it had not. To all this I could say nothing, if I had been ever so much disposed, in the way of accounting for it, upon any other hypothesis than that of the little fellow himself, that Jesus had made him well.

Dr. Gordon has discussed this question of healing through faith and prayer with that ability and discretion which those who know him and have listened to his able lectures on unfulfilled prophecy, the near approach of the second coming of our Lord, and kindred subjects, would expect. Taking as a starting point the dictum of an eminent writer that, "you ask God to perform as real a miracle when you ask Him to cure your soul of sin as you do when you ask Him to cure your body of a fever;" he proceeds to show that the well-established and clearly proved cases of the drunkard's appetite being cured by divine power, and the opium slave being delivered by the same means, should lead Christians to exercise faith in God's power and willingness to heal all diseases.

A wide field is covered in the discussion of the subject. Dr. Gordon appeals to testimony of all kinds; of Scripture, of reason, of the church, of theologians, of missions, of the adversary, of experience and of the healed; he then considers the verdict of candor and of caution. Finally Dr. Gordon has a word to say as to our duty, and in this connection occurs this weighty remark, "It is asked, if the privilege and promise in this matter are so clear, how is it that the cases of recovery through the prayer of faith are so rare? Probably because the prayer of faith is so rare, and especially because when found it receives almost no support in the church as a whole." Dr. Gordon has done good service in calling the attention of the Christian world to this most momentous subject.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

The Lowest Deep.

"WHAT was it Felix's father had done?" asked Alice of Canon Pascal, with white lips.

"He had misappropriated a number of securities left in his charge," answered Canon Pascal; "Phebe says to the amount of over £10,000; most of it belonging to Mr. Clifford."

"Is that all?" cried Alice, the color rushing back again to her face, and the light to her eyes, "was it only money? Oh! I thought it was more dreadful than that. Why! we should never blame Cousin Felicita because her husband misappropriated some securities belonging to old Mr. Clifford. And Felix is not to blame at all; how could he be? Poor Felix!"

"But Alice," he said, with a half smile, "if, instead of being buried here, Roland Sefton had lived, and been arrested, and sent to a convict prison for a term of imprisonment, Felicita's life, and the life of her children, would have been altogether overshadowed by the disgrace and infamy of it. There could have been no love between you and Felix."

"It was a good thing that he died," she answered, looking down on the grave again almost gladly. "Does Felix know this? But I am sure he does not," she added quickly, and looking up with a heightened color into her father's face, "he is all honor, and truth, and unselfishness. He could not be guilty of a crime against any one."

"I believe in Felix; I love him dearly," her father said, "but if I had known of this I do not think I could have brought him up in my own home, with my own boys and girls. God knows it would have been a difficult point to settle; but it was not given to my poor wisdom to decide."

"I shall not love Felix one jot less," she said, "or reverence him less. If all his forefathers had been bad men I should be sure still that he was good. I never knew him do or say anything that was mean or selfish. My poor Felix! Oh, father! I shall love him more than ever now I know there is something in his life that needs pity. When he knows it he will come to me for comfort; and I will comfort him. His father shall hear me promise it by this grave here. I will never, never visit Roland Sefton's sin on his son; I will never in my heart think of it as a thing against him. And if all the world came to know it, I would never once feel a moment's shame of him." Her voice faltered a little, and she knelt down on the parched grass at the foot of the cross, hiding her face in her hands. Canon Pascal laid his hand fondly on her bowed head; and then he left her that she might be alone with the grave, and God.

The miserable, dilapidated hut at the entrance of Engelberg, with no light save that which entered by the doorway, had been Jean Merle's home since he had fixed his abode in the valley, drawn thither irresistibly by the grave which bore Roland Sefton's name. There was less provision for comfort in this dark hovel than in a monk's cell. A log of rough, unbarked timber from the forest was the only seat, and a rude framework of wood filled with straw or dry ferns was his bed. The floor was bare, except near the door, the upper half of which usually stood open, and here it was covered with fine chips of box and oak, and the dust which fell from his busy graver, the tool which was never out of his fingers while the light served him.

There was no more decoration than there was comfort; except that on the smoke-stained walls the mildew had pencilled out some strange and grotesque lines, as if some mural painting had mouldered into ruin there. Two or three English books alone, of the cheap continental editions, lay at one end of a clumsy shelf; with the few cooking utensils which were absolutely necessary, piled together on the other. There was a small stove in one corner of the hovel, where a handful of embers could be seen at times, like the eye of some wild creature lurking in the deep gloom.

Jean Merle, though still two or three years under fifty, was looked upon by his neighbors as being a man of great, though unknown age. Yet, though he stooped in the shoulders a little, and walked with his head bent down, he was not infirm, nor had he the appearance of infirmity. His long mountain expeditions kept his muscles in full force and activity. But his gray face was marked with many lines, so fine as to be seen only at close quarters; yet on the whole forming a wrinkled and aged mask as of one far advanced in life. In addition to this singularity of aspect there was the extraordinary seclusion and sordid miserliness of his mode of existence, more in harmony with the passiveness of extreme old age, than with the energy of a man still in the prime of his days. The village mothers frightened their children with tales about Jean Merle's gigantic strength, which made him an object of terror to them. He sought acquaintanceship with none of his neighbors; and they avoided him as a heretic and a stranger.

The rugged, simple, narrow life of his Swiss forefathers gathered round him, and hedged him in. They had been peasant-farmers, with the exception of the mountain pastor his grandfather, and he still well remembered Felix Merle, after whom his boy had been called. All of them had been men toiling with their own hands, with a never ceasing bodily activity, which had left them but little time or faculty for any mental pursuit. This half of his nature fitted him well for the life that now lay before him. As his Swiss ancestors had been for many generations toil-worn and weather-beaten men, whose faces were sun-burnt and sun-blistered, whose backs were bent with labor, and whose weary feet dragged heavily along the rough paths, so he became. The social refinement of the prosperous Englishman, skin deep as it is, vanished in the coarse and narrow life to which he had partly doomed himself, had partly been doomed, by the dull, despondent apathy which had possessed his soul, when he first left the hospital in Lucerne.

His mode of living was as monotonous as it was solitary. His work only gave him some passing interest, for in the bitterness of his spirit he kept himself quite apart from all relations with his fellow-men. As far as in him lay he shut out the memory of the irrevocable past, and forbade his heart to wander back to the years that were gone. He strove to concentrate himself upon his daily toil, and the few daily wants of his body; and after a while a small degree of calm and composure had been won by him. Roland Sefton was dead; let him lie motionless, as a corpse should do, in the silence of his grave. But Jean Merle was living, and might continue to live another twenty years or more, thus solitarily and monotonously.

But there was one project which he formed early in his new state of existence, which linked him by a living link to the old. As soon as he found he could earn handsome wages for his skilled and delicate work, wages which he could in no way spend and yet maintain the penance which he pronounced upon himself, the thought came to him of restoring the money which had been intrusted to him by Old Marlowe, and the other poor men who had placed their savings in his care.

To repay the larger amount to which he was indebted to Mr. Clifford would be impossible; but to earn the other sums, though it might be the work of years, was still practicable, especially if from time to time he could make safe and prudent speculations, such as his knowledge of the money-market might enable him to do, so as to insure rapid returns. At the village inn he could see the newspapers, with their lists of the various continental funds, and the share and stock markets; and without entering at all into the world, he could direct the buying in and selling out of his stock through some bankers in Lucerne.

Even this restitution must be made in secret, and be so wrapped up in darkness and stealth that no one could suspect the hand from which it came. For he knew that the net he had woven about himself was too strong and intricate to be broken through without deadly injury to others, and above all to Felicitia. The grave yonder, and the stone cross above it, barred the way to any return by the path he had come. But would it be utterly impossible for him to venture back, changed as he was by these many years, to England? It would be only Jean Merle who would travel thither, there could be no resurrection for Roland Sefton. But could not Jean Merle see from afar off the old home; or Phebe Marlowe's cottage on the hill-side; or possibly his mother, or his children; nay, Felicitia herself? Only afar off; as some banished, repentant soul, drawing a little nearer to the walls of the eternal city, might be favored with a glimpse of the golden streets, and the white-robed citizens therein, the memory of which would dwell within him for evermore.

As he drew nearer the end he grew more eager to reach it. The dull apathy of the past thirteen years was transformed into a feverish anticipation of his secret journey to England with the accumulated proceeds of his work and his speculations; which in some way or other must find their way into the hands of the men who had trusted him in time past. But at this juncture the bankers at Lucerne failed him, as he had failed others. It was not simply that his speculations turned out badly; but the men to whom he had intrusted the conduct of them, from his solitary mountain-home, had defrauded him; and the bank broke. The measure he had meted out to others had been measured to him again. Whatsoever he had done unto men they had done unto him.

For three days Jean Merle wandered about the eternal forests of the ice-bound peaks and snow-fields of the mountains around him, living he did not himself know how. It was not money he had lost. Like old Marlowe, he realized how poor a symbol money was of the long years of ceaseless toil, the days of self-denial, the hours of anxious thoughts it represented. And besides this darker side, it stood also for the hopes he had cherished, vaguely, almost unconsciously, but still with strong earnestness. He had fled from the penalty the just laws of his country demanded from him, taking refuge in a second and more terrible fraud, and now God suffered him not to make this small reparation for his sin, or to taste the single drop of satisfaction that he hoped for in realizing the object he had set before him. There was no place of repentance for him; not a foothold in all the wide wilderness of his banishment on which he could stand, and repair by one jot the injury he had inflicted upon his fellow-men.

What passed through his soul those three days, amid the ice-solitudes where no life was, and where the only sounds that spoke to him were the wild awful tones of nature in her dreariest haunts, he could never tell; he could hardly recall it to his own memory. He felt as utterly alone as if no other human being existed on the face of the earth; yet as if he alone had to bear the burden of all the falsehood, and dishonesty, and dishonor of the countless generations of false and dishonorable men which this earth has borne.

All hope was dead now. There was nothing more to work for, or to look forward to. Nothing lay before him but his solitary, blank life in the miserable hut below. There was no interest in the world for him but Roland Sefton's grave.

He descended the mountain-side at last. For the first time since he had left the valley he noticed that the sun was shining, and that the whole landscape below him was bathed in light. The village was all astir, and travellers were coming and going. It was not in the sight of all the world that he could drag his weary feet to the cemetery, where Roland Sefton's grave was; and he turned aside into his own hut to wait till the evening was come.

At last the sun went down upon his misery, and the cool shades of the long twilight crept on. He made a circuit round the village to reach the spot he longed to visit. His downcast eyes saw nothing but the rough ground he trod, and the narrow path his footsteps had made to the solitary grave, until he was close to it; and then, looking up to read the name upon the cross, his dim sight discerned the figure of a girl kneeling before it, and carefully planting a little slip of ivy into the soil beneath it.

THE SIGNS OF THE PRESENT TIMES.

Do they Indicate the Approach of the Second Advent?

By Rev. R. Chester, A. B. of Cloyne.

Authorized Signs of Christ's Speedy Coming—Their Special Characteristics—The Earliest Forerunners of the Event—Their Distinguishing Features—Wars and Earthquakes—The World-wide Diffusion of the Gospel—The Gathering and Completing of the Church—What if Christ's Coming be Delayed?—Lawlessness, Iniquity, and Infidelity—The Present Position and Circumstances of the Jews—The "Fig Tree" Nearly Full of Leaves.

To the above question there are not a few who are ready to give a decided and a joyful response in the affirmative. There are, however, a much larger number from whom a scoffing negative is the only reply to be expected; if, indeed, they can be induced to regard the question as one worthy of being replied to at all. But between these two classes there are, it is to be believed, very many who, without any actual desire to ignore or to evade the subject of the possible or probable nearness of the Advent, look dubiously upon the present aspect of affairs as affording any indication of such nearness, or as having any connection with it whatsoever. It appears to them that those signs of the present times, which some are regarding as thus significant, have been of not unfrequent occurrence in the years gone by, and have been, some of them, always more or less occurrent throughout many generations. Yet the event which they are thus supposed to indicate has not as yet taken place.

AUTHORIZED SIGNS OF CHRIST'S SPEEDY ADVENT.

In entering upon some inquiry concerning this important subject, we must be careful to remember (1) that both our blessed Lord's own words and also those of His inspired apostles, have supplied us with signs which, when they do occur, are positively and assuredly to be regarded as indicating the absolute nearness of His Advent.

No one can question this who receives as authentic the language, for instance, of Luke 21: 28: "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." And further, the immediately added parable of the fig-tree, "Behold the fig-tree, and all the trees, when they now shoot forth ye see and know of your own selves that summer is now nigh at hand. So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." In the face of language such as this, to accuse of being visionary and fanatical—as some are at present doing—those who expect that there will be positive premonitions of the Advent to be discerned in the signs of the times which shall shortly, or immediately, precede it, is assuredly to assume the position of the sceptic and the infidel, rather than that of the professing and progressing Christian.

THEIR SPECIAL CHARACTERISTICS.

But we must further remember (2), that while such signs, in order to meet the requirements of this language of our blessed Lord, must be in no small degree peculiar and significant, and must differ in some not unimportant respects from any similar events that may have gone before—they nevertheless must not be so very peculiar, so strikingly significant in their character, as to render doubt, or question, or even unbelief, as to the positive nearness of the Advent, impossible. Otherwise there could be no room for the fulfilment of the prediction of 1 Thess. 5: 1-4, or of several similar passages. But of the times and the seasons, brethren ye have no need that I write unto you, for yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. For when they shall say—when nominal, ungodly, professing Christians shall say—"peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape. But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief."

In order to meet the requirements thus indicated, it is evident that the premonitory signs of the Saviour's coming must not, on the one hand, differ so totally from all events which have preceded them as to enforce attention and conviction upon the world at large; while, on the other hand, they must needs have sufficiently peculiar features ob-servant, at all events upon some of them, as fully to attract the attention, and to ensure the conviction of such of the Lord's people as view them in the light of His prophetic word, that "He is near, even at the doors" (Matt. 24: 33).

Bearing these facts in mind, let us endeavor, in accordance with them, to give a satisfactory answer to the question which I have prefixed to this article.

THE EARLIEST FORERUNNERS OF THE EVENT.

The first in order of the signs which our blessed Lord predicts (Matt. 24: 6-7), after having warned His disciples against the danger of being deceived by false Christs and false prophets, verses 4 and 5, are "wars and rumors of wars, famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places." With regard to these, however, He expressly affirms that they are to be regarded but as the earliest forerunners of the approaching event. "All these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet." (Verse 6.) They are but "the beginning of sorrows." (Verse 8.) And when we remember that these have been events of more or less perpetual occurrence in almost all periods of the world's history, both before and since He has thus spoken of them as premonitions of His coming, we may, I think, regard them as continual warnings vouchsafed to each successive generation of the children of men, to remind them that "the night," although "far spent," still continues, and that "the day," although "at hand," has not as yet begun to dawn. We may look upon such signs as these as constantly suggestive of the still future, but ever approximating time, when darkness shall give place to light, tumult to quietude, disease to health, and sorrow to joy, in the "restitution of all things."

THEIR DISTINGUISHING FEATURES.

But if, as our Lord's words would seem evidently to imply, we are at some particular time to regard such events as indications of a then more definitely and nearly approaching end, it is specially worthy of note that we must necessarily look for something peculiar in them, something which will at that particular time distinguish them from similar events in their more usual and ordinary occurrence. And, further, that such would seem to be manifestly the case just at present with respect to, two of the classes of events which are thus presented to our notice namely "wars and rumors of wars," and "earthquakes in divers places."

WARS AND EARTHQUAKES.

As regards the former, "wars and rumors of wars," it will be remembered that it was immediately after that unusually protracted period of profound quietude among the nations which succeeded the stormy times of the Peninsular War, the memorable Battle of Waterloo, in 1815, and the overthrow of Napoleon I., and after the first great National Exhibition in London, in 1851, which was confidently hailed by many as the forerunner of a universal and long-enduring peace—that the Crimean War commenced that series of commotions by which, with scarcely any intermission, the civilized world has been ever since more or less convulsed; thus giving to the last thirty years of its history the special character of an era of warfare. While "rumors of wars," as distinguished from their actual outbreak—and the words of our Lord would seem designedly so to distinguish them—have been in recent times all but incessant.

With regard to "earthquakes in divers places," it is difficult to suppose that any person old enough and sufficiently observant to compare in such respects the present with the past, can fail to have been impressed by their modern frequency. It is, however, when viewed in conjunction with other predicted signs of a more definite character, that such events as these become truly significant.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Letter from Engineer Melville of the Jeannette, dated Jan. 15th, was received last week at the office of the New York Herald. It adds many interesting details to those we already knew respecting the expedition. Engineer Melville says the Jeannette came up with the ice on September 3d, 1879, two months after leaving San Francisco. On September 6th the Jeannette was firmly frozen in. A break came on November 25th, and the ship drifted helplessly in open water, but eventually came in contact with an ice floe and made fast to it, and was again frozen in. At that early date the brave explorers must have abandoned hope of success. Melville says: "On January 19th, after several days' anxiety from the crushing strain of the ice, we finally discovered that the ship, after receiving several severe shocks, was leaking badly. Steam was got on the engine boilers and both steam and hand pumps were worked day and night until the ship was freed from water. Stores were hoisted out of the hold and all preparations made to make good our retreat to Wrangell Land if forced to abandon the ship. We continued to drift northwest and steam was necessary to pump the ship until she was destroyed."

The Account of the Wreck of the Jeannette furnished by Engineer Melville is as follows: "The ship and ice continued to drift to the west and northwest, the whole ice field being broken up in all directions. On the night of June 10th, 1881, several severe shocks were felt and the ship was found to have raised several inches in her bed. There was evidence of an approaching break-up of our friendly floe piece. At ten minutes past twelve, A.M., June 11th, the ice suddenly opened alongside the ship, completely freeing her, and she floated on an even keel for the first time in many months. The ice continued in motion, but no serious injury occurred to the ship until the morning of the 12th, when the ice commenced to pack together, bringing a tremendous strain on the ship, heeling her over to starboard and forcing the deck seams open. This continued during the day at intervals until evening, when it was evident the ship could not much longer hold together. The boats were lowered on the ice, and provisions, sledges, and all necessary equipment for a retreat securely placed on the floe. By six P.M. the ship had entirely filled with water and lay over at an angle of about twenty-two degrees, being kept from sinking by the opposing edges of the floe. On the morning of the 13th of June, about four o'clock, the ice opened and the ship went down, with colors flying at the mast head."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Continue their work in Glasgow, with renewed and increased manifestations of God's favor and blessing. Mr. Moody conducted a large number of meetings in the Hillhead district, and crowded audiences gathered in the United Presbyterian Church and the Free Anderston Church, in both of which places there is reason to believe that many souls were delivered from the thralldom of sin into the life and liberty of those who believe in Christ. Mr. Sankey assisted two evangelists in holding meetings in the Ingram Street Circus and the Temperance Institute, where the singing and preaching of the Word have been followed by exceedingly encouraging and gratifying results. Afternoon meetings for business men were held by Messrs. Moody and Sankey in the centre of the city, and there have been large congregations of Glasgow merchants, their clerks, and other employees.

A Renewal of the Outrages on the Jews of Russia is reported, and fears are aroused that an outbreak worse than any that has yet occurred is impending. An isolated case is a specimen of many others which are not narrated. A despatch to the London Standard from St. Petersburg states that three soldiers belonging to a troop of lancers entered a liquor store kept by a Jew at Doubna and demanded drink. After some objection the eldest daughter of the Jew served them with liquor. A quarrel ensued, and the soldiers shot the proprietor, killed his two sons and an infant, outraged the daughter brutally, beat the mother and plundered the house. On April 2d, which was a market day, an attack was made on the shops and houses belonging to the Jews at Walegojulawo, twenty-five versts from Ananieff, and thirty shops and eighty houses were destroyed. In the Polish cities of Warsaw and Cracow grave apprehensions are felt of a renewal of the outbreaks. Placards have been posted threatening the Jews, who are in a state of great terror. The government has ordered the shops closed, and great military precautions are being taken.

A Murder of a Singularly Cowardly Character was perpetrated on Sunday, April 2d, in County Westmeath, Ireland. Mrs. Smythe, a Dublin lady, was returning from church in a carriage with her husband's brother, Mr. Barlow Smythe, and a lady, when just as they were approaching Mr. Smythe's residence four shots were fired at the carriage from behind some thick shrubbery. Mrs. Smythe fell forward, and when her brother raised her and carried her into the house it was found that one of the balls had struck her behind the left ear, killing her instantly. It is supposed the shot was intended for Mr. Barlow Smythe, who is a large landowner in that locality. Mr. Smythe was greatly distressed by the crime. He has written a letter to Mr. Gladstone, in which he says: "I lay the guilt of this deed of blood at your door in the face of the whole country, supported as you are in that part of your policy by the 'no rent' members of parliament, by their press and by some of the Irish bishops." Mr. Smythe goes on to say that the terrorism under the Gladstone policy is so tremendous that few who abhor the crime would venture to denounce the assassins had they seen them. If they did so their lives would be forfeited, while the prisoners would almost as surely escape after the farce of a trial by jury.

Mr. Lowell's Action in the Matter of the Imprisoned Irish-Americans is regarded in a different light in England from that adopted at the New York meeting. A newspaper correspondent in London says: "Mr. Lowell's action was characterized by unrelenting energy, ingenuity, variety of resource and boldness. He availed himself of every diplomatic expedient, and did not hesitate to depart from diplomatic usage, at the risk of affronting a foreign minister, in order to execute the wishes of his own Government. Those very personal intimacies of which Mr. Lowell's Irish critics complain contributed to the effectiveness of his action. Regardless of etiquette, Mr. Lowell pressed the matter, not only with Earl Granville, but with Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Forster. The Irish-Americans' complaint of what they call Mr. Lowell's 'flunkeyism' is as absurd and ignorant as it is vulgar. Mr. Lowell, though personally popular, has always been criticised in London society for his marked and combative Americanism."

The Subject of Home Rule for Ireland may soon become a practical question in British politics in spite of the ridicule at present poured upon the proposed change. A telegram from a London newspaper correspondent contains the startling intelligence that a movement in favor of home rule has been commenced in Scotland. He says: "The Scotch home rulers appear to be better able to reply to Mr. Gladstone's request to formulate a scheme than their Irish brethren. The Burgh Convention has commenced its annual meeting at Edinburgh, and immediately proceeded to unanimously adopt a resolution in favor of home rule—namely, that all Scotch legislation should be effected, subject to the approval of Parliament and the veto of the crown, by Scotchmen chosen triennially by the electors of the burghs and counties." If the agitation continues in Scotland it may lead to the adoption of the principle for Ireland also. On this point an influential English journal says: "Home rule has taken its place within the area of practical politics, because Englishmen are beginning to see that they will eventually have to accept it. There is no more reason why we English should claim the right to make land laws for Ireland than for Canada or New Zealand. I venture to predict that within twenty years it will be thought monstrous that we should ever have denied the Irish so self-evident a right."

The Political Situation in France is Regarded by intelligent observers with apprehension. The present administration has no great following among the people, and its only safe course is one of inactivity. It fears to move lest the dormant dislike with which it is regarded should become active, and it should be driven from office. Since the decline in the popularity of M. Gambetta, caused by his advocacy of a new electoral system, which aroused the suspicion that he aimed at absolute power, there is no leader who can form a strong government. A combination of any two sections of politicians can overthrow any administration. Apprehensions are expressed lest some daring man like the late emperor, seeing how disorganized political society is, may seize the reins of government and impose on the nation a return of personal and arbitrary rule.

The Movement to Assist Unemployed Mechanics and laborers in Great Britain to emigrate to Canada is making steady progress. A preliminary meeting was held at the Mansion House on April 5th, the Lord Mayor presiding, with the view of taking steps to raise a fund for aiding the people. Sir Alexander T. Galt, the Canadian High Commissioner, announced that Canada offered to give five dollars per head to certain families to whom the Canadian Pacific Railway Company offered employment. Ex-Lord Mayor McArthur and Mr. Torrens, members of parliament; Cardinal Manning, and several well-known churchmen were present. It was announced that $30,000 would be required to start the scheme.

The Mosque of St. Sophia at Constantinople, which is a fac-simile of the one that stands on the site of Solomon's Temple, at Jerusalem, is stated to be unsafe, and the news has created considerable consternation among the Turks, who hold the tradition that the fall of St. Sophia will be the signal for the dismemberment of the Mahommedan Empire. The dome threatens to give way at any moment, and should the fall occur at the time of any special ceremony many deaths would be the result.

AMONG the world's benefactors must be counted not only the philanthropists, the reformers, and the great statesmen and orators, but the men who devote their time and attention to the study of the laws of nature. Especially have those a claim to a high place on the world's roll of honor, who have turned their studies to account in making their discoveries practically useful in the preservation of life and in relieving the sufferings of mankind. Among such men Sir Humphry Davy occupies a high place. He was an original thinker and a hard worker. He made many discoveries which have been perfected since his day and which the world has found valuable and beneficial. But were it only for the invention of the safety lamp for the use of miners that we are indebted to his genius, that one invention alone would secure for him universal fame. Though it did not entirely preclude the possibility of accidents in the mines, it rendered them much less frequent and provided a means by which hundreds if not thousands of lives have been saved. His portrait and a short sketch of his life cannot therefore fail to interest our readers.

Humphry Davy was born on December 17th, 1778, near Penzance, England. His father, Robert Davy, was a wood-carver, in independent though humble circumstances, and the family resided upon a small estate of their own, situated in Mount's Bay.

The childhood of Humphry was spent under the immediate care of his parents, and in his earliest years he gave evidence of the possession of singular abilities; and especially manifested the dawning of a vivid imagination, united with a strong turn for experiments in natural philosophy.

One of his favorite amusements was to exhibit to his playfellows the operation of melting in a candle scraps of tin, and to make and explode detonating balls. Another was the inventing and repeating to them fairy tales and romances. At times, however, he would exercise his eloquence upon graver subjects.

When a mere child he entered the grammar school at Penzance, where, in the usual acceptance of the words, he profited little. His own opinion, however, was different. "I consider it fortunate," he subsequently wrote to a member of his family, "that I was left much to myself as a child, and put upon no particular plan of study, and that I enjoyed much idleness at Mr. Coryton's school. I perhaps owe to these circumstances the little talents that I have, and their peculiar application; what I am, I have made myself. I say this without vanity, and in pure simplicity of heart."

He was soon removed to the school at Truro, where he remained two years, undistinguished except by a love of poetry, which evinced itself in several compositions. This, indeed, continued to be a favorite amusement, until, in mature life, he became absorbed in scientific pursuits; and it has been said upon high authority that if Davy had not been the first chemist, he would have been the first poet of his age.

ARTICLED TO A SURGEON.

In 1794 his father died, and his mother in consequence removed from the patrimonial estate to Penzance, where, in his sixteenth year, Davy was apprenticed to Mr. Borlase, a surgeon in that town. For the medical part of his profession he showed distaste, but he speedily gained that decided taste for chemical pursuits which eventually placed him in the front rank of scientific investigators. His passion for experiment became insatiable. Everything that could on any pretence or by any contrivance be converted into a piece of chemical apparatus was appropriated without scruple. The notoriety which, in a small town, he readily acquired as the boy who was "so fond of chemical experiments," introduced him to a valuable friend, Mr. Davies Gilbert, in early life his patron, in mature age his successor as President of the Royal Society.

By Mr. Gilbert young Davy was introduced to Dr. Beddoes, who was at that time seeking an assistant in conducting the Pneumatic Institution, then newly established at Bristol, for the purpose of investigating aeriform fluids, and the possibility of using them as medical agents.

This providential engagement opened a career of usefulness and fame which, under other circumstances, might have been long delayed. The arrangement was concluded upon liberal terms, and in October, 1798, before he was twenty years of age, he left his home in high spirits to enter upon an independent life. It is to his honor that, as soon as a competent though temporary provision was thus secured, he resigned, in favor of his mother and sisters, all his claims upon the paternal estate.

EXPERIMENTS WITH LAUGHING GAS.

While he was with Dr. Beddoes his zeal and intrepidity was signally displayed in his attempts to breathe different gases, supposed, or known, to be highly destructive to life, with a view to ascertain the nature of their effects. Two of these experiments, the inhaling of nitrous gas and carburetted hydrogen, are remarkable, because in each he narrowly escaped death. But his attention was especially turned to the gas called nitrous oxide, or laughing-gas, which, upon respiration, appeared to transport the inhaler into a new and highly pleasurable state of feeling, to rouse the imagination, and give new vigor to the mental faculties. (The panel in the upper portion of the frontispiece shows him in his laboratory after inhaling this gas.)

The effects produced, exaggerated by the enthusiasm of his patients, were in fact closely analogous to intoxication. He found that by its means he could produce sleep, delicious dreams, and involuntary laughter; and many persons witnessed with curiosity and amusement strange freaks of poets and philosophers, while under the operation of this novel stimulus.

In 1800 he published "Researches Chemical and Philosophical, respecting Nitrous Oxide and its Respiration." The nature of the results announced, combined with the ability shown in their investigation, and the youth of the author, produced a great sensation in philosophical circles; and through the celebrity thus acquired, and the favorable opinion of him formed upon personal acquaintance by several eminent scientists of the day, he was offered by the conductors of the Royal Institution, the office of Assistant Lecturer in Chemistry, with the understanding that ere long he should be made sole Professor. This negotiation took place in May of 1801, and on May 31st, 1802, he was raised to the appointment.

LECTURES AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.

To Davy, the quitting Bristol for London was the epoch of a transformation—an elevation from the chrysalis to the butterfly state. In youth his person, voice, and dress, were alike uncouth; and at first sight they produced so unfavorable an impression upon Count Rumford, that he expressed much regret at having sanctioned so unpromising an engagement. But he soon found abundant reason to change his opinion.

Davy's first course of lectures, which was not delivered till the spring of 1802, excited an interest unequalled before or since. Not only the scientific, but the literary and fashionable world crowded to hear him; and his vivid imagination, fired with enthusiastic love for the science which he professed, gave to one of the most abstruse of studies a charm confessed by persons the least likely to feel its influence. The strongest testimony to his richness of illustration is supplied by Mr. Coleridge. "I go," said he, "to Davy's lecture to increase my stock of metaphors."

Had this been all, the young prodigy would soon have ceased to dazzle; but his fame was maintained and increased by the success which waited on his undertakings; and, in a word, Davy became the lion of the day. The effect of this sudden change was by no means good. Sought and caressed by the highest circles of the metropolis, he endeavored to assume the airs of a man of fashion; but the strange dress sat awkwardly, and ill replaced a natural candor and warmth of feeling which had singularly won upon the acquaintances of his early life.

HIS INVESTIGATIONS OF ELECTRICITY.

Our limits are too small to admit even a sketch of the various trains of original investigation pursued by Davy during his connection with the Institution. His electrical inquiries carried on from 1800 to 1807, and developed in the Bakerian Lectures, were so novel and brilliant that public curiosity was raised to the highest pitch: the laboratory of the Institution was thronged with visitors, and the high excitement thus produced, acting upon a frame exhausted by fatigue, produced a violent fever, in which for many days he lay between life and death.

His discovery that substances could be decomposed by electricity, and the elements revealed of which they consist, was a superb triumph. Having first of all succeeded in decomposing water, he tried the effect of the electric current on potash and soda; and his brother says, "His delight when he saw the minute shining globules like mercury burst through the crust of potash and take fire as they reached the air was so great that he could not contain his joy—he actually bounded about the room in ecstatic delight." Thus the great principle was ascertained that chemical affinity can be overcome by a stronger power, and Davy pioneered the way for Faraday, to whom we are most indebted for what we know of the intimate connection between electricity and chemical change.

AGRICULTURE AND PHOTOGRAPHY.

Agricultural chemistry likewise owes much to Davy. While Baron Liebig, of Darmstadt, was laboring in the same field in Germany, Davy taught how the growth of plants depends upon the chemical condition of the soil wherein they are sown, how different crops ought to be sown in succession in order not to exhaust the soil in any particular field, and what manure will best restore to the ground the essential and vitalizing elements that the crops have taken out of it.

To Davy, also, may be attributed in great part the knowledge of photography; for in 1802 he and Dr. Thomas Wedgwood suggested that pictures might be taken by the rays of the sun acting chemically upon chloride of silver, and they even succeeded in making some pictures in this way. Daguerre came afterward and completed their work, when, in 1839, he demonstrated how a picture might be fixed so as to remain.

Another contribution of Davy to the cause of science resulted from his taking two pieces of ice, and making them melt by rubbing them together, without any warmth being brought near them. In order to be quite sure that the heat did not come out of the air, he made a second experiment by placing a piece of ice in a machine under an air-pump. When he had drawn out all the air, he set the machine to work so that the ice, being rubbed, melted without any air being present. Hence, he came to the conclusion that "heat is a peculiar motion, probably a vibration of the corpuscles of bodies, tending to separate them."

To an unwearied industry and zeal in research Davy added accurate reasoning. His discoveries were useful in further inventions after he had passed away.

In the year 1810 he was invited to Ireland, and received from Trinity College the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws; and on April 8th, 1812, he received the honor of knighthood from the Prince Regent, at a levée at Carlton House, in testimony of his merits. (The ceremony is depicted in the right-hand section of the lower portion of our picture.) On the 11th of the same month he married Mrs. Apreece, a lady possessed of ample fortune; immediately previous to which he delivered his farewell address to the Royal Institution, and from this time gave himself up to continental travel and literary composition.

INVENTION OF THE MINER'S SAFETY LAMP. The autumn of 1815 is rendered memorable by the discovery of the Safety-lamp, one of the most practical applications of science to economical uses yet made, by which thousands of lives have been preserved. Sir Humphry was led to consideration of this subject by an application from the Rev. Dr. Grey, the Chairman of a Society organized in 1813, at Bishopwearmouth, Sunderland, to consider and promote the means of preventing accidents by fire in coal-pits. Being then in Scotland, he visited the mines in the North of England, and on his return southward, and was supplied with specimens of fire-damp which, on reaching London, he proceeded to examine. He soon discovered that the carburetted hydrogen gas, called fire-damp by the miners, would explode when mixed with less than six, or than fourteen times its volume of atmospheric air; and further, that the explosive mixture would not be fired in tubes of small diameters and proportionate lengths. Gradually diminishing the dimensions, he arrived at the conclusion that a tissue of wire—wire gauze—in which the gas does not exceed a certain small diameter, may be considered as the ultimate limit of a tube of such tubes, is impervious to the inflamed combustible air; and that a lamp covered with such tissue or gauze, may be used with perfect safety even in an explosive mixture, which will burn, and burns within the cage, securely cut off from the power of doing harm. Thus, when the atmosphere is so impure that the flame of the lamp itself cannot be maintained, the Davy still gives light to the miner, and turns his worst and most deadly enemy into an obedient servant. This invention, the certain source of large profit, presented with characteristic liberality to the public. The words are preserved, in which when asked to secure to himself the benefit of it by a patent, he declined to do so, in conformity with his high-minded resolution which he formed upon rising independent wealth, of never making his eminence subservient to gain. "I have thought for all my views and purposes; more might be troublesome, and distract my attention from those pursuits in which I delight. Wealth would not increase my fame or happiness. It might undoubtedly enable me to put horses to my carriage, but what would it avail me if I have it said that Sir Humphry Davy drives in a carriage and four?" The coal-owners of the North of England presented to him a service of plate, in testimony of their gratitude. He underwent, however, considerable vexation from claims to priority of invention set up by some persons connected with the mines, whose attention had been turned to the subject. The controversy was settled in his favor by the decision of the most eminent names in British science, and the general voice of the owners of the Sunderland and Newcastle coal-fields; and so long as the pits are worked, the name of Davy, given by the colliers to the safety-lamp, cannot be forgotten. (The right-hand section of the upper division of our front picture represents Sir Humphry explaining the principle of his safety-lamp to Count Rumford.)

MINING PAPYRI FROM HERCULANEUM. In 1818 Sir Humphry visited Naples, with a view of applying the resources of chemistry to the unrolling of the papyri found in Herкулaneum. These, it is well known, are generally plates resembling charcoal, often cemented into a mass, and the texture so entirely destroyed that it is hardly possible to separate the layers. Submitted fragments to the operation of chlorine and iodine with such fair hope of success that he was encouraged to proceed to Naples, the Government furnishing him with every recommendation and defraying the expenses of such assistance as he thought it necessary to take out. His success, however, fell short of his hopes, and partly from disappointment, partly from a belief that unfair obstacles were placed in his way by interested parties, he abandoned the undertaking at the end of a few months, having partially unrolled 23 manuscripts and examined 120 which offered no prospect of success. (The left-hand section of the lower half of our frontispiece illustrates these examinations.)

BECOMES PRESIDENT OF THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.

In October, 1818, Sir Humphry was created a baronet, as a reward for his scientific services. In 1820, upon the death of Sir Joseph Banks, he was elected President of the Royal Society, and retained the chair until forced to quit it by ill-health.

It would have been better had he not obtained this honor. His scientific pride disgusted some; his aristocratic airs excited the ridicule of others. Much of this weakness may be traced to the pernicious effects of early flattery. Such frailties, though just grounds of censure and regret to his contemporaries, are now lost in the splendor of his discoveries.

HIS LAST DAYS.

Toward the end of 1825 the indisposition which his friends had long seen stealing on him reached its crisis in the form of an apoplectic attack. All immediate cause of alarm was soon removed; but the traces of his illness remained in a slight degree of paralysis, which somewhat impaired his muscular energies. He hastened abroad, and passed the rest of the winter and the spring at Ravenna. In the summer he visited the Tyrol and Illyria, and finding his health still precarious, resigned the chair of the Royal Society, and a few weeks later returned to England, having gained little strength.

In the early part of 1828 Sir Humphry once more sought the continent in search of health. His steps were turned to that favorite district of which he speaks as the "most glorious country in Europe, Illyria and Styria," where he solaced the weary hours of sickness by such field sports as his failing health enabled him to pursue, in the revision of a small manual on fishing, and in the composition of the "Last Days of a Philosopher."

A large portion of this work is occupied by metaphysical and religious disquisitions. As a moral philosopher, his opinions do not seem entitled to peculiar weight. Of his visionary excursion to the limits of the solar system, it is not fair to speak but as the play of an exuberant imagination, mastering the sober faculties of the mind. The work contains many passages, reflective and descriptive, of unusual beauty. He was a firm believer in God and in the doctrines of Christian faith.

The winter of 1828-9 having been spent at Rome, with returning spring he expressed a wish to visit Geneva, but his hours were numbered. He reached that city on May 28th, unusually cheerful; dined heartily on fish, and desired to be daily supplied with every variety which the lake afforded. In the course of the night he was seized with a fresh attack, and expired early in the morning without a struggle, in the 59th year of his age. His remains were honored by the magistrates with a public funeral, and repose in the cemetery of Plain Palais, just outside the walls of the city. The splendors of natural scenery amid which he awaits the summons of the resurrection morning, seem suitable as the resting-place of one who explored with enthusiasm the mysteries of nature, but dwelt also with intense pleasure on the marvellous loveliness of phenomena of daily occurrence.

No one who ever heard the thrilling story of the heroic John Maynard, as told by Mr. John B. Gough, will soon forget the touching picture of the noble courage which is born of true religion, however humble may be the breast in which it reigns. John Maynard was a well-known, sturdy, intelligent, and God-fearing pilot on Lake Erie. He had charge of a steamer from Detroit to Buffalo, one summer afternoon. At that time those steamers seldom carried any boats.

In the course of the trip, on this sultry afternoon, smoke was suddenly seen to curl its way from below. What could be the matter? The captain was immediately on the alert, and calling out to one of the sailors he said, "Go down, Simpson, and see what is the matter, and what that smoke means."

"Ay, ay, sir," was the quick response; but scarcely had he been gone a moment when he reappeared with a face pale as death. "What's the matter, man?" cried the captain. "Captain! the ship is on fire!"

Beyond all question such was the terrible fact, and the cheeks of the sailors became blanched at the news. They could face the wildest hurricane that ever threatened to rend a vessel asunder, but a ship on fire was something too terrible even for their strong nerves. In a moment the cry went shrieking to the sky, "Fire! fire! fire!"

Then, quicker than it takes to tell, all hands were called up, and the promptest measures taken to subdue the flames which every moment burst out in fresh places. It was raging in all directions, and seemed in its fury to laugh to scorn the buckets of water which were dashed upon the flames. No energy, however undaunted, could save the doomed vessel! To add to the fury of the flames there were large quantities of resin and tar on board, and when at last these took fire, the passengers saw that unless they could reach land very soon their fate was sealed.

All this time brave John Maynard never left his post at the wheel, but might be seen through the flames grasping its spokes as with sinews of iron.

"John Maynard," cried the passengers, "how far are we from land?" "Seven miles," was the brief answer.

"How long shall we be ere we reach it, John Maynard?" was the next agonized inquiry.

"Three quarters of an hour at our present rate of speed."

"Is there any danger, John Maynard?"

"Well," said the pilot, "there is danger enough here; do you not see the smoke bursting out? If you would save your lives, go forward!"

In an instant passengers and crew, men, women, and children, crowded to the fore part of the ship, but John Maynard stood at his post. Then the flames burst forth in a sheet of fire, and clouds of smoke arose. At last, bellowing through his speaking trumpet, came the voice of the captain.

"John Maynard!"

"Ay, ay, sir," cried the brave helmsman.

"How does she head?"

"South-east by east, sir."

"Head her south-east, and run her on the shore."

Nearer, yet nearer, she approached the shore.

Once more the voice of the captain was heard crying—"John Maynard!"

"Ay, ay, sir," was the answer which, though intended to be reassuring, was so faint that it could scarcely be heard.

"Can you hold on five minutes longer, John?"

"Ay, ay, sir," said the brave pilot, "by God's help I will."

The pilot's hair was scorched from the scalp; one hand was disabled, and his teeth were set; yet there he stood firm as a rock.

At last he brought the ship ashore. Every man, woman, and child was saved. Only one was lost, and that one was brave, God-fearing John Maynard. Lost! did we say? He lost to win; he died to live, for a simpler or more believing spirit never took its flight than that of this Christian pilot. He sacrificed his own life that he might save the lives of others, and the story of his heroic courage shall never be forgotten.

A Strayed Sheep.—The Rev. W. H. Aitken, of the Episcopal Church, recently narrated an incident which illustrates the imperilled condition and awful state of the impenitent sinner. "Two friends were in the Highlands of Scotland recently, shooting, and one of them observed an animal on a jutting rock. He inquired, 'Is that a sheep?' and looking through his field-glass he saw that it was. In search of herbage the sheep had descended from one grass-covered ledge to another, and found it impossible to return. No shepherd in Scotland dare risk his life by going down the declivity. The sheep must remain there till an eagle observed it, when it would hover over the poor animal, drawing nearer and nearer, until at last the affrighted sheep would take a dreadful leap into space, to be dashed to pieces on the rocks below, and then become the eagle's prey."

SHALL WE KNOW EACH OTHER IN HEAVEN?

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"I shall go to Him."—Samuel 12: 23.

Is the Child Dead?—A Tremendous Question—The Subject of Future Recognition—A Certainty, not a Surmise—What the Text Implies—The Transfiguration—The Angels know each other—Heaven a Great Home Circle—Reasons for Accepting this Truth—I. The Rejection of it Implies the Obliteration of Memory—II. The World's Expectancy Affirms it—III. Moral and Spiritual Features will Distinguish us for ever—IV. We need an Opportunity of Thanking Spiritual Benefactors—V. Dying Experiences Confirm the Belief—A Child's Vision—Heaven—This is Death.

THERE is a very sick child in the abode of David the king. Disease, which stalks up the dark lane of the poor and puts its smothering hand on the lip and nostril of the man and master, also knocks at the palace door, and bending over the pillow blows into the face of a young prince the frosts of pain and death. Tears are vain to the King of Terrors. Alas! for David the king. He can neither sleep nor eat, and lies prostrate on his face, weeping and wailing until the palace rings with the outcry of woe.

What are courtly attendants, or victorious armies, or conquered provinces, under such circumstances? What to any parent is all splendid surrounding when his child is sick? Seven days have passed on. There in that great house, two eyelids are gently closed, two little hands folded, two little feet at rest, one heart still. The servants come to bear the tidings to the king, but they cannot make up their minds to tell him, and they stand at the door whispering about the matter, and David hears them and he looks up and says to them,

"IS THE CHILD DEAD?"

"Yes, he is dead." David rouses himself up, washes himself, puts on new apparel, and sits down to food. What power hushed that tempest? What strength was it that lifted up that king whom grief had dethroned? Oh, it was the thought that he would come again into the possession of that darling child. No grave-digger's spade could hide him. The wintry blasts of death could not put out the bright light. There would be a forger somewhere that with silver hammer would weld the broken links. In a city where the hoofs of the pale horse never strike the pavement he would clasp his lost treasure. He wipes away the tears from his eyes, and he clears the choking grief from his throat, and exclaims, "I shall go to him."

Was David right or wrong? If we part on earth will we meet again in the next world? "Well," says some one, "that seems to be an impossibility. Heaven is so large a place we never can find our kindred there." Going into some city, without having appointed a time and place for meeting, you might wander around for weeks and for months, and perhaps for years, and never see each other; and heaven is vaster than all earthly cities together, and how are you going to find your departed friend in that country? It is so vast a realm.

Now I ask, how are you going to find your friends in such a throng as that? Is not this idea we have been entertaining after all a falsity? Is this doctrine of future recognition of friends in heaven a guess, a myth, a whim, or is it a granite foundation upon which the soul pierced of all ages may build a glorious hope? Intense question! Every heart in this audience throbs right into it. There is in every soul here the tomb of at least one dear.

TREMENDOUS QUESTION!

It makes the lip quiver, and the cheek flush, and the entire nature thrill. Shall we know each other there? I get letters almost every month asking me to discuss this subject. I get a letter in a bold, scholarly hand, on gilt-edged paper, asking me to discuss this question, and I say, "Ah! that is a curious man, and he wants a curious question solved." But I get another letter. It is written with a trembling hand, and on what seems to be a torn-out leaf of a book, and here and there is the mark of a tear; and I say, "Oh, that is a broken heart, and it wants to be comforted."

The object of this sermon is to take this theory out of the region of surmise and speculation into the region of positive certainty. People say, "It would be very pleasant if that doctrine were true. I hope it may be true. Perhaps it is true. I wish it were true." But I believe that I can bring an accumulation of argument to bear upon this matter which will prove the doctrine of future recognition as plainly as that there is any heaven at all, and that the kiss of reunion at the celestial gate will be as certain as the dying kiss at the door of the sepulchre.

Now, when you are going to build a ship you must get the right kind of timber. You lay the keel and make the framework of the very best materials, the keelson, stanchions, plank-shear, counter-timber, knees, transoms, all of solid oak. You may build a ship of lighter material, but when the cyclone comes on, it will go down. Now we may have a great many beautiful theories about the future world, built out of our own fancy, and they may do very well as long as we have smooth sailing in the world; but when the storms of sorrow come upon us, and the hurricane of death, we will be swamped—we will be foundered.

We want a theory built out of the solid oak of God's eternal Word. The doctrine of future recognition is not so often positively stated in the Word of God as implied, and you know, my friends, that that is, after all, the strongest mode of affirmation. Your friend travels in foreign lands. He comes home. He does not begin by arguing with you to prove that there are such places as London and Stockholm and Paris and Dresden and Berlin, but his conversation implies it. And so this Bible does not so positively state this theory as, all up and down its chapters, take it for granted.

What does my text imply? "I shall go to him." What consolation would it be to David to go to his child if he would not know him? Would David have been allowed to record this anticipation for the inspection of all ages if it were a groundless anticipation? We read in the first book of the Bible, Abraham died and was gathered to his people. Jacob died and was gathered to his people. Moses died and was gathered to his people. What people? Why, their friends, their comrades, their old companions.

Of course it means that. It cannot mean anything else. So in the very beginning of the Bible four times that is taken for granted. The whole New Testament is an arbor over which this doctrine creeps like a luxuriant vine full of the purple clusters of consolation. James, John, and Peter followed Christ into the mountain. A light falls from heaven on that mountain and lifts it into the glories of the celestial. Christ's garments glow and His face shines like the sun. The door of heaven swings open. Two spirits come down and alight on that mountain. The disciples look at them and recognize them as

MOSES AND ELIAS.

Now, if those disciples standing on the earth could recognize these two spirits who had been for years in heaven, do you tell me that we, with our heavenly eyesight, will not be able to recognize those who have gone out from among us only five, ten, twenty, thirty years ago?

The Bible indicates, over and over again, that the angels know each other; and then the Bible says we are to be higher than the angels, and if the angels have the power of recognition, shall not we, who are to be higher than they in the next realm, have as good eyesight and as good capacity? What did Christ mean, in His conversation with Mary and Martha, when He said, "Thy brother shall rise again?" It was as much as to say, "Don't cry. Don't wear yourselves out with this trouble. You will see him again. Thy brother shall rise again."

The Bible describes heaven as a great home circle. Well, now, that would be a very queer home circle where the members did not know each other. The Bible describes death as a sleep. If we know each other before we go to to sleep, shall we know each other after we wake up? Oh, yes, we will know each other a great deal better than now; "for now," says the apostle, "we are through a glass darkly, but then face to face." We will be my purified, enthroned, and glorified by gazing on your purified, enthroned, and glorified body.

Now, I demand, if you believe the Bible, if you take this theory of future recognition out of the realm of speculation and surmise into the region of positive certainty, and no more keep saying, "hope it is so; I have an idea it is so; I guess it is so." Be able to say, with all the concentrated energy of body, mind, and soul,

"I KNOW IT IS SO."

I. There are, in addition to these Bible arguments, other reasons why I accept this theory. The first place, because the rejection of it implies the entire obliteration of our memory. Can it be possible that we shall forget forever those whose walk, look, manner we have been so long familiar? Will death come and with a sharp, keen blade hew away this faculty of memory? Alas! ham said to Dives, "Son, remember." If the loved and other lost remember, will not the throne remember?

You know very well that our joy in any circumstance is augmented by the companionship of friends. We cannot see a picture with less than four eyes, or hear a song with less than four ears. We want some one beside us with whom to change glances and sympathies; and I suppose the joy of heaven is to be augmented by the fact that we are to have our fireside with us when the throne before us the throne of the blessed, and when there surges up in our ears the jubilate of the saved.

Heaven is not a contraction, it is an expansion. If I know you here, I will know you better there. Here I see you with only two eyes, but there your soul shall have a million eyes. It will be immortality gazing on immortality—ransomed spirit in colloquy with ransomed spirit—victor beside victor. When John Evans, the Scotch minister, was seated in his study, his wife came in and said to him, "My dear, do you think we will know each other in heaven?" He turned to her and said, "My dear, do you think we will be bigger fools in heaven than we are here?"

II. Again, I accept this doctrine of future recognition because the world's expectancy affirms it. In all lands and ages this theory is received. What form of religion planted it? No form of religion, for it is received under all forms of religion. Then, I argue, a sentiment, a feeling, an anticipation, universally planted, must have been God-planted, and if God-planted it is rightfully planted. Socrates writes, "Who would not die with a great deal to purchase a meeting with Orpheus and Homer? If it be true that this is the consequence of death, I could even be willing to die often."

Among the Danes, when a master dies his servant sometimes slays himself that he may see the master in the future world. Cicero, living before Christ's coming, said, "Oh, glorious day when I shall retire from this low and sordid scene to associate with the divine assemblage of departed spirits, and not with the one I have just now mentioned, but with my dear Cato, the best of men and most faithful of men. If I seemed to bear death with fortitude, it was by no means that I did not most sensibly feel the loss I had sustained. It was because I was supported by the consolation of reflection that we could not long be separated."

The Norwegian believes it. The Indian believes it. The Greenlander believes it. The Swiss believe it. The Turks believe it. Under every tongue, in every zone, the theory is adopted, and so I say a principle universally implanted by God, and hence a right belief. The argument is irresistible.

III. Again, I adopt this theory because it is a feature of moral temperament and

* Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday. We therefore publish by request a sermon by him which God has widely blessed to the comfort alike of dying and bereaved Christians. It was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 31, 1899, but there have come to us so many demands for copies containing the sermon that it has now for a long time been out of print.—Ed.

FEATURES OF THE SOUL

It will distinguish us for ever. How do we know each other in this world? Is it merely by color of the eye, or the length of the hair, or facial proportions? Oh, no. It is by the disposition as well, using the word in the very best sense and not in the bad sense; and if in the dust of the body should perish and lie there forever, and there should be no resurrection, still the soul has enough features and the disposition has enough features to make us distinguishable. I can understand how in sickness a man will become so delirious that he will not know his own friends; but will he be blasted with such insufferable idiocy, that, standing beside our best friends for all eternity, we never guess who they are?

V. Again, I think that one reason why we ought to accept this doctrine is because we never in this world have an opportunity to give thanks to those to whom we are spiritually indebted. The joy of heaven, we are told, is to be inaugurated by a review of life's work. These Christian men and women who have been toiling for Christ, have they seen the full result of their work? Oh, no. In the church at Somerville, New Jersey, John Vredenburg preached for a great many years. He felt that his ministry was a failure, and others so, although he was a faithful minister preaching the Gospel all the time. He died, and died amid some discouragements, and went home to his father; for no one ever doubted that John Vredenburg was a good Christian minister. A little while after his death there came a great awakening in Somerville, and one Sabbath two hundred souls stood up at the Christian altar espousing the cause of Christ, among them my own father and mother. And what was peculiar in regard to nearly all of those two hundred souls was that they dated their religious impressions from the ministry of John Vredenburg.

Will that good Christian man before the throne of God never meet those souls brought to Christ through his instrumentality? Oh, of course he will know them. I remember one Sabbath afternoon, borne down with the sense of my sins and owing not God, I took up Doddridge's "Rise and Progress." Oh, what a dark afternoon it was, and I read the chapters, and I read the prayers, and I tried to make the prayers my own. I must see Philip Doddridge. A glorious book he wrote! It is out of fashion now. There is a mother before the throne of God. I say her joy is full. Is it? You say there can be no augmentation of it. Cannot there be? Her joy was a wanderer and a vagabond on the earth until that good mother died. He broke her old heart. She died leaving him in the wilderness of earth. She is before the throne of God now. Years ago that son repents of his crimes and gives his heart to God and becomes a useful Christian, and dies and enters the gates of heaven. You tell me that that mother's joy cannot be augmented. They confront each other.

THE SON AND THE MOTHER.

"Oh," she says to the angels of God, "rejoice with me! The dead is alive again, and the lost is found. Hallelujah! I never expected to see this one come back." The Bible says nations are born in a day. When China comes to God will it not know Dr. Abel? When India comes will it not know Dr. John Scudder? When the Indians come to God will they know David Brainard? I see a soul entering heaven at last, with covered face at the idea that it has done so little for Christ, and feeling borne down with unworthiness, and it says to itself, "I have no right to be here." A voice from a throne says, "Oh, you forget that Sunday-school class you invited to Christ! I was one of them." And another voice says, "You get that poor man to whom you gave a loaf of bread and told of the heavenly loaves. I was that man." And another says, "You forget that sick man to whom you gave medicine for the body and soul. I was that one." And then Christ, from a throne overtopping all the rest, will say, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, I did it to me." And then the seraphs will take their harps from the side of the throne, and cry, "What song shall it be?" And Christ, bending over the harpers, shall say, "It shall be the Harvest Home!"

V. One more reason why I am disposed to accept this doctrine of future recognition is that so many in their last hour on earth have confirmed this theory. I speak not of persons who have been delirious in their last moment and knew not what they were about, but of persons who died in calmness and placidity, and who were not naturally superstitious. Often the glories of heaven have struck the dying pillow, and the departing man has said he saw and heard those who had gone away from him.

How often it is in the dying moments parents see their departed children and children see their departed parents. I came down to the banks of the Mohawk River. It was evening, and I wanted to go over the river, and so I waved my hat and shouted, and after a while I saw some one waving on the opposite bank, and I heard him shout, and the boat came across, and I got in and was transported. And so I suppose it will be in the evening of our life. We will come down to the river of death and give a signal to our friends on the other shore, and they will give a signal back to us, and the boat comes, and our departed kindred are the oarsmen, the fires of the setting day tingeing the tops of the paddles.

Oh, have you never sat by such a deathbed? In that hour you hear the departing soul cry, "Hark! look!" You hearkened and you looked. A little child pining away because of the death of its mother, getting weaker and weaker every day, was taken into the room where hung the picture of her mother. She seemed to enjoy looking at it, and then she was taken away, and after a while died. In the last moment that waned and wasted little one lifted her hands, while her face lighted up with the glory of the next world, and cried out,

"MOTHER!"

You tell me she did not see her mother? She did. So in my first settlement at Belleville a plain man said to me, "What do you think I heard last night? I was in the room where one of my neighbors was dying. He was a good man, and he said he heard the angels of God singing before the throne. I haven't much poetry about me, but I listened and I heard them too." Said I, "I have no doubt of it." Why, we are to be taken up to heaven at last by ministering spirits. Who are they to be? Souls that went up from Madras, or Antioch, or Jerusalem? Oh, no; our glorified kindred are going to troop around us.

Heaven is not a stately, formal place, as I sometimes hear it described, a very frigidity of splendor, where people stand on cold formalities and go around about with heavy crowns of gold on their heads. No, that is not my idea of heaven. My idea of heaven is, you are seated in the evening-tide by the fireplace, your whole family there, or nearly all of them there. While you are seated talking and enjoying the evening hour, there is a knock at the door and the door opens, and there comes in a brother that has been long absent. He has been lost, for years you have not seen him, and no sooner do you make up your mind that it is certainly he than you leap up, and the question is who shall give him the first embrace.

That is my idea of heaven—a great home circle where they are waiting for us. Oh, will you not know your mother's voice there? She who always called you by your first name long after others had given you the formal "Mister"? You were never anything but James, or John, or George, or Mary, or Florence to her. Will you not know your child's voice? She of the bright eye, and the ruddy cheek, and the quiet step, who came in from play and flung herself into your lap, a very shower of mirth and beauty? Why, the picture is worn in your soul. It cannot wear out. If that little one should stand on the other side of some heavenly hill and call to you, you would hear her voice above the burst of heaven's great orchestra. Know it! You could not help but know it.

Now I bring you this glorious consolation of future recognition. If you could get this theory into your heart it would lift a great many shadows that are stretching across it. When I was a lad I used to go out to the railroad-track and put my ear down on the track, and I could hear the express train rumbling miles away, and coming on; and to-day, my friends, if we only had faith enough we could put our ear down to the grave of our dead, and listen and hear in the distance the rumbling on of the chariots of resurrection victory.

O HEAVEN! SWEET HEAVEN!

You do not spell heaven as you used to spell it. You used to spell it h-e-a-v-e-n, heaven. But now when you want to spell that word you place side by side the faces of the loved ones who are gone, and in that irradiation of light and love, and beauty and joy, you spell it out as never before, in songs and hallelujahs. Oh, ye whose hearts are down under the sod of the cemetery, cheer up at the thought of this reunion! Oh, how much you will have to tell them when once you meet them!

How much you have been through since you saw them last! On the shining shore you will talk it all over. The heartaches. The loneliness. The sleepless nights. The weeping until you had no more power to weep, because the heart was withered and dried up. Story of vacant chair, and empty cradle, and little shoe only half worn out never to be worn again, just the shape of the foot that once pressed it. And dreams when you thought that the departed had come back again, and the room seemed bright with their faces, and you started up to greet them, and in the effort the dream broke and you found yourself standing amid-room in the midnight—alone.

Talking it all over, and then, hand in hand, walking up and down in the light. No sorrow, no tears, no death. Oh, heaven! beautiful heaven! Heaven where our friends are. Heaven where we expect to be. In the East they take a cage of birds and bring it to the tomb of the dead, and then they open the door of the cage, and the birds, flying out, sing. And I would to-day bring a cage of Christian consolations to the grave of your loved ones, and I would open the door and let them fill all the air with the music of their voices.

Oh, how they bound in these spirits before the throne! Some shout with gladness. Some break forth into uncontrollable weeping for joy. Some stand speechless in their shock of delight. They sing. They quiver with excessive gladness. They gaze on the temples, on the palaces, on the waters, on each other. They weave their joy into garlands, they spring it into triumphal arches, they strike it on timbrels, and then all the loved ones gather in a great circle around the throne of God—fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters, lovers and friends, hand to hand around about the throne of God—the circle ever widening—hand to hand, joy to joy, jubilee to jubilee, victory to victory, until the day breaks and the shadows flee away.

Oh, how different it is on earth from the way it is in heaven when a Christian dies! We say "Close his eyes." In heaven they say, "Give him a palm." On earth we say, "Let him down in the ground." In heaven they say, "Hoist him on a throne." On earth it is, "Farewell, farewell," In heaven it is,

"WELCOME WELCOME."

And so I see a Christian soul coming down to the river of death, and he steps into the river, and the water comes to the ankle. He says, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No," says Christ, "this is not death." And he wades still deeper down into the waters until the flood comes to the knee, and he says, "Lord Jesus, tell me, tell me, is this death?" And Christ says, "No, no, this is not death." And he wades still further down until the wave comes to the girdle and the soul says, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No," says Christ, "this is not." And deeper in wades the soul till the billow strikes the lip, and the departing one cries, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No," says Christ, "this is not." But when Christ has lifted this soul upon a throne of glory, and the pomp and joy of heaven come surging to his feet, then says Christ, "This is death."

SYLPH SOMERS.

McCann's Fatal Evidence—Truth Perverted—Rossiter Given up to Vengeance—His Prayer for his Murderers—The Search for Sylph and Capt. Vaughan—Corny Fagan Warns the Intended Victims—Sylph's Incredulity—Farmer Dunne Sells a Horse and Cart—The Escape—The Farmer's Peril.

MILES listened to the details related by McCann with foreboding. He was incensed, disquieted, outraged, disgusted by this confession of treacherous espionage, and by a fellow who seemed not to have the least perception of the infamous nature of his conduct.

"Priest and president of the court," he cried out, addressing Father John. "Will you permit this disgraceful story to be continued longer! If this man has no sense of what is decent and becoming, will you allow him further to disgrace himself?"

"Oh! never heed me, nor me character," said Barty, "I am quite able to take care of them both. But anyhow, it isn't ayther o' them yer thinkin' or carin' about, me man, but what I'm jest on the point o' comin' to."

"Wud ye believe it, yer riv'rence, that afther a long palaver about himself, and his goin's on in France an' Englan', I heard this man say that all ye'es up here—you, Father John, and all our leaders around ye—war nothin' but a lot of assassins and murderers; that ye'es had disgraced and dishonored our great and holy cause; that he was heart sick o' ye'es—every wan. And—what do ye'es think? Why, that he would give ye'es up and disown ye'es, tee-totally; would bethray ye'es, and would turn himself over to the English, to fight agin ye'es; and, more nor that, would git the two pris'ners we reprieved, at his biddin', yesterday, away from our grasp, and into the ranks of our inimes."

There was some exaggeration in this statement. Miles had said, indeed, that he would abandon the insurgents and would withdraw from their camp, but had distinctly declared to Sylph that he would not betray them. There was, however, enough of what was true in the words of Barty McCann to condemn him in the opinion of the men before whom he stood for trial. Miles felt this, and that his hour was come—that the death which, in his despondency, he told Sylph he craved for, was about to overtake him with a speed he had not imagined.

This conviction met with almost immediate confirmation. Scarcely had Barty McCann, who had given such fatal evidence against him, ended his testimony when a howl, loud, savage, and fierce, burst forth from the multitude on either hand of him—"Pike him, pike him off hand, pike him!" was shouted out by exasperated hundreds.

"Take him, and do your will upon him," said Father John, raising his voice to be heard above the tumult. "The voice of the people is the voice of God. As a traitor and an apostate, he is the troubler and the curse of the camp, and even if we were disposed to save him—which we are not—it is better that one man should die, and not that the whole of a devoted people should perish."

Miles felt himself dragged by powerful hands toward the spot indicated for his execution. He would have liked to press a kiss upon his mother's lips, who still lay on one side the throng pale and unconscious. He craved to do this, as a token that he did not blame her for the part she had been forced to play in his unjust condemnation. But his executioners were too eager to wreak their vengeance upon him to permit of their granting this privilege. On and on he was pushed, until he stood upon the very spot where Captain Vaughan had knelt the day before, awaiting the death which now approached his deliverer.

Miles stood with his back to the precipice, and facing the crowd; his hands folded across his breast, and his look undaunted, braced up to meet his doom. At the last moment, however, he unclasped his arms, and stretched them forth with his hands open toward the heavens. "Oh, God," he cried, "I acknowledge Thee as Lord of Heaven and earth, and the Father of my spirit; and I believe in Thy Son as the world's Redeemer, and therefore mine. Through the atonement of His precious blood, may all my sins in Thy sight be forgiven. In His name, I beseech Thee to receive my soul, and take it to Thy everlasting kingdom. And these, my murderers, visit not, O Lord, their sin upon them, but give them repentance, and at length, forgiveness for their cruel crime."

The men, who had their pikes levelled—one each side—to pierce the body of Miles, struck by his gesture in lifting up his hands, hesitated to strike, awed by the reverent avowal of his faith, so opposed to their conception of him as an apostate and blasphemous; and also as moved by the solemn prayer for themselves which he uttered.

But their delay soon ended. Miles had begun to repudiate the name of traitor and to pray for a blessing on his country. "God bless Ireland" was upon his lips when his bosom was transfixed, and his life-blood gushed forth. Next moment, hurled over the rocky steep, he lay lifeless amid other dead, stretched all ghastly and gore-stained around him.

Scarcely had the body of Miles disappeared over the cliff than an angry shout was raised to rearrest the English officer, with whom the false Miles Rossiter, they declared, had conspired to betray them; and also his lady companion; and to visit upon them the same vengeance which had overtaken their treacherous advocate and deliverer.

The prospect of having another drama of blood was too attractive to the multitude to be forfeited, or even postponed. Murder is a thirst that grows by murder; hence, a band of swift messengers, armed with pikes, was despatched from the camp to hunt up Sylph and Captain Vaughan, and to bring them in haste to the hill, as material for another scene of bloodshed. "They plotted with Rossiter to betray us!" was fiercely shouted. "They have forfeited their lives, and must pay the penalty!"

The yearning for blood, however, was not, in the case of Sylph and Captain Vaughan, to be satisfied. Corny Fagan having in hand a business of his own which he deemed important, had come in disguise to the camp to consult the man—his old comrade—who had first directed him to Miles. When Corny got half way up the hill he heard that matters of moment were proceeding near the Old Mill, and, urged by curiosity, he resolved to venture himself in the crowd and find out what was passing.

Wring with pity and horror, he witnessed the condemnation of Miles upon the testimony of his own mother; heard the narrative of Barty McCann, and his description of the manner in which he came to hear the conversation of Miles with his mistress, Sylph; and was struck with terror at the muttered threats and curses of the rebel crowd against her and Captain Vaughan for complicity in what they considered the vile treachery of Rossiter.

Corny felt there was not a moment to lose in giving his "mistress and the capt'n" warning. Without waiting to witness poor Rossiter's tragical end, and even before the victim was led to the place of his murder, Corny set off at full speed to Farmer Dunne's to urge immediate flight on Sylph. Both of them, then—it was Corny's plan—should give the alarm to Captain Vaughan, who was staying in a farmhouse, two and a half miles or more distant from the camp, and which stood near the main road which led to Gorey. The whole three after this, Corny proposed, should push on, with all speed, to Gorey, where he knew a portion of the royal army was posted, and then they would be safe.

Fortunately for Corny, the tragedy that was being enacted near the Old Mill had proved such an irresistible attraction, and had so drawn away the rebels to that locality, that there were few to notice or question the course of his headlong course through the camp and then beyond it.

One old woman, however, too feeble to climb the hill to see for herself the "grand goin's on," as she called them, near the Old Mill, but who hungered to hear the particulars of the massacres, was most anxious that Corny should stay to her a full account of the proceedings. "hoy! hulloa!" she screamed out in a cra-voiced, when Corny came near. "The blessin' the Vargin and the saints, on ye, young man! Stop and tell us the news. How is things on at the mill? Iz the boys, more power to t'givin' it sharp an' hot to the church's inimes owld Ireland's? Tell me, now, there's a darl!"

"Yis, the work's goin' on sharp and hot, vout a doubt," said Corny, to screen himself detection as being no rebel. "But, gran, cannot stop, fur I'm on most particular bus'ness."

Out of breath, panting, completely exhausted, ready to drop from fatigue, Corny reached Farmer Dunne's dwelling, and without ceremony hastened into the little parlor where Sylph was sitting.

"Misthress, misthress," he cried out with culty, "git away from this without the loss second, fur the rebels is comin' to kill ye, and cum straight from the Hill to warn ye."

Sylph had too much discretion to act at upon Corny's alarming tidings. She thought was right to question him a little to learn the state of the case, before abandoning the shelter of the roof where Miles had placed her.

But Corny was in no condition to enter particulars. He had not yet recovered breath, it was distressing to see his convulsive efforts one moment to answer her inquiries, and at other to urge her to instantaneous flight.

After a little, however, the words, "They piked Mr. Rossiter, and are comin' fast as will carry thim to pike the capt'n and your misthress," enabled Sylph to see that her faithful Corny had raised no false alarm, and a speedy departure from her present place of refuge was absolutely necessary.

But how was escape possible? To attempt on foot would be useless, for the insurgents would soon overtake her. She hastened into the kitchen near her little parlor, and fortunately found Farmer Dunne there and told him her difficulties.

The farmer had got to like his temporary guest. Not only Sylph's beauty, but her gentle manner and her ardent piety interested him; and his thought of her being slain, and that likely by his very eyes, greatly distressed him. Besides, the ultimate success of the rebellion, he believed, was very doubtful, and if it should happen that the rebels would take a turn it would greatly serve him if the royalists should come to know that he had saved the lives of an English officer and a lady, still, to aid in the flight of persons proscribed by the authorities at the camp would imperil his life at the hands of the rebels; and this latter danger was more imminent than the former.

Farmer Dunne, in fact, found himself in a dilemma. Thinking over the matter, a way of escape for him at last suggested itself. "I'll leave the house," he said, "and will not return for an hour. Do you take my horse and cart without my leave. When you reach Gorey put them up in the stable o' the inn, an' I can get them some day soon agin, or whenever I may want them; or if you'd rather pay me fur them, ye haven't the money by ye, miss, I'll take a note o' hand."

"I can pay you for them at once," said Sylph, and taking money from a secret pocket, she placed in the hands of the good farmer the sum stated was the value of his property.

It was not long before Corny harnessed the farmer's excellent horse to the cart. This had springs, and was a rude vehicle. It would, however, serve the present purpose, and was deemed under the circumstances of priceless value.

Horse and cart were soon at the farmhouse door. Sylph bearing in one hand a few articles of luggage, promptly seated herself upon some straw laid thick upon the cart bottom, Corny leaped up in front, seized the reins and flourished the whip, put the horse to a gallop and took the road to Gorey.

Earnestly did she petition Heaven for her safety, not from any selfish motive, however, that she might continue to honor Christ, who was dearer to her than life, by a ministry in which hitherto, she had been remarkably successful.

at the same time, she sought the grace of resignation, for she knew that "her Father's will was best and wisest," and so meekly looking upward, her trembling lips expressed the true sentiment of her heart, "Not my will, oh Lord, but Thine be done."

Sylph was not on her way a minute too soon. Looking back from a gentle height on the road, after taking up Captain Vaughan, she could see a number of rebels hurrying after her from Farmer Dunne's; having discovered her flight and the direction she had taken. Even their shouts of rage were borne to her ear, raised when they perceived that the speed of the farmer's horse was distancing them.

"It's Dunne's horse," they cried, "that's doin' the job, bad looke to him. To see this rascally escape is enough to drive us crazy."

"I vote," said one huge fellow, "that we turn back and wreak our vengeance on Dunne, who has lint his horse for this escape, and is at the bottom of it."

The proposal was at once accepted; but even this intended victim failed them. Dunne could be found nowhere in his house when they came to look for him. His wife, who pretended to come from the cows in the field, feigned to be unaware of what had taken place, but declared that she knew her husband had been a long time away from the premises.

The rebel band, therefore, came to the conclusion which the farmer, we know, wished them to draw, namely, that his horse and cart were taken without his permission. So, after a treat of liquor, administered in policy by Mrs. Dunne, they departed for the hill, saying as they left "That they were as sorry for Mr. Dunne's loss as they were for their own disappointment. But that th' thiev-in' act of takin' his horse and cart widout as much as 'be yer lave' was only a fair specimen of th' way in which the English robbed the Irish.

Corny still retained the post of charioteer, and Captain Vaughan and Sylph sat side by side in the cart behind him. The captain and Sylph were still in a perilous case. The whole district was in such a condition of anarchy and lawlessness that at any moment a band of ruffians might rush upon them and take their lives. They trusted, however, that the Providence which so far had wonderfully and graciously preserved them, would still guard them; and in any case the complete separation which they had experienced for some time in comparative ignorance of each other's fate, gave a delightful zest even to this meeting.

S.S. Lesson for April 30, Mark 8: 1-16. Golden Text, ver. 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ALL throughout the life of Jesus whenever He preached or healed publicly, a certain number of people were present whose only object was to criticise Him and to find whatever fault they could. A great excitement like that we have mentioned in the close of our last lesson was just the opportunity which such people desired, and we find them busy finding fault with the disciples because they, who had scarcely time to eat at all, did not stay to wash their hands before they ate bread. Often they had to snatch a morsel by the wayside, in the ship upon the lake, or when in the house, just while eager suffering and seeking ones were waiting for them. They were practically carrying out the law in its true spirit, for all their time and strength were being spent in the service of others. The Pharisees, however, made no allowance for this, but because they did not follow the tradition of the elders they condemned them. God had commanded "Ye shall not add to the Word which I command you" (Deut. 4: 2). The elders and scribes, who had written commentaries on the law, did add to it, and the additions had come to be received more than the real text; thus the disciples of Jesus were condemned, for not obeying a command, the very existence of which was in contravention of the Word of God.

The Pharisees and scribes, who were needing the ministrations of Jesus in their own lost souls, came, and asked Him, "Why walk not Thy disciples according to the tradition of the elders, but eat bread with unwashen hands? He answered and said unto them, Well hath Esaias prophesied of you hypocrites, as it is written, This people honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. Howbeit in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men, for laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men, as the washing of pots and cups; and many other such like things ye do." Our Lord here brings against the Pharisees and scribes

THREE CHARGES.

1. Vain worship, i. e., life-service while their hearts are far from Him. 2. Teaching man's commandments. 3. Laying aside God's commandments. Would to God that these charges applied to them only, but alas, they are applicable to us!

Consider how truthfully it may be said of this generation, "They teach for doctrines the commandments of men." Is it out of God's Word that so many counsels come to newly converted souls who are just in the warm fervor of their first love, "Now be sure don't do anything extraordinary, don't bring on yourselves any unnecessary remark?" No, it is man's tradition and it is exactly contrary to the Word of God, which says, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate" (2 Cor. 6: 17). "Ye are the light of the world. A city set on an hill cannot be hid" (Matt. 5: 14). Is it out of God's Word that men say, "We must not hope to overcome sin down here, we must pray and struggle, but we cannot overcome?" Is not this giving the lie to all the promises of God made to "him that overcometh?" How unreasonable it would be in God to make promises with an impossible condition! What a failure must Christ's salvation be if it cannot deliver us from the power of sin! What an exaggeration are the words of Paul, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law but under grace" (Rom. 6: 14), if we are never to overcome sin! Alas! men are unwilling to are unwilling to have all means of continuing in sin cut off, and they are guilty of making God responsible for this iniquity, by declaring that His Word does not mean what it says; thus they make both the commandment and the promise of God "of none effect" by their tradition. Is it on the authority of God's Word that men say there is no harm in self-indulgence, in enjoying one's self, whether in a dancing party, or a pipe of tobacco, or the reading of a novel, or the indulgence of personal vanity in dress, or the seeking of one's own honor or reputation? No harm in indulging one's self when Jesus has said, "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself!" Do self-denial and self-indulgence mean the same thing? Or is it only when a word occurs in the Bible that we are to look upon it as meaning nothing? Alas, alas! men are making "the Word of God of none effect" by their tradition. Is it from the Word of God that we hear it so often said "We must not judge other people," meaning that we are not to know whether they are converted or not? How are we to open the eyes of them that are blind, if our own eyes are not wide open enough to see whether they are on the right way or not? How can we "turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God," unless we know and see whether they are groping their way in the darkness without God, or walking in the blessed light of His reconciled countenance? Men seek to do away with the distinctions which God makes and to delude themselves into the belief that God's "death" means the same as life, and God's "darkness" the same as light, making the Word of God of none effect through their tradition.

Is it from the Word of God that many Christian teachers say, "I must sow the seed, but I leave the results with God?" Did the Lord Jesus tell us to go out into the highways and hedges and leave the result with God, or did He tell us to compel them to come in that His house might be filled? It is not they who, in unbelief and hardness of heart toward lost perishing souls "leave the results with God," who will shine as the stars forever, but "they who turn many to righteousness" (Dan. 12: 3). Thus it is God alone who gives the increase, but He expects His fishers of men to care whether souls are saved. There are combinations which God has never made. Those who save their consciences by rising early to go to a five o'clock or six o'clock communion, or who give up an evening to a prayer-meeting spend a corresponding amount of time and strength in the pursuit of worldly pleasure, striking in their own minds a kind of balance as to how far their religion warrants them to go in self-pleasing without losing their own souls? Does He not say, "Love not the world, neither the things which are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him" (John 2: 15)? and again, "I would thou wert cold or hot" (Rev. 3: 15). O how awfully men make the Word of God of none effect by their tradition.

Is it in accordance with the Word of God that so many, even among believers, seek to vindicate themselves when wrong is done them, and to claim and establish their rights? "Why do ye not rather take wrong?" says Paul (1 Cor. 6: 7). Better a thousand times to suffer wrong than to lose an opportunity of obeying the Master's command, "I say unto you that ye resist not evil" (Matt. 5: 39). But how large a proportion even of the children of God, utterly ignore that "this is thank-worthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully" (1 Pet. 2: 19). Our human nature rebels and shrinks from this suffering, but it is the true test whether we are crucified with Christ, or whether we are making the Word of God, on this point, of no effect through our tradition. Let us not forget that the influence of our witness day by day is either vindicating or traducing the Word of the living God.

The Lord Jesus went on to say, "Full well ye reject (or frustrate) the commandment of God, that ye may keep your own tradition. For Moses said, Honor thy father and mother; and, whoso curseth father or mother, let him die the death. But ye say, If a man shall say to his father or mother, that wherewith thou mightest have been profited by me is Corban, that is to say, Given to God; ye no longer suffer him to do aught for his father or his mother; making void the Word of God by your tradition, which ye have delivered; and many such like things ye do" (Rev. Ver.). Man's tradition makes duty to God clash with duty to man; the Jews of Christ's day were clever in avoiding responsibility, and so are professing Christians now. "I must keep up my position," is man's tradition, whether father and mother are cared for or not, "All seek their own" (Phil. 2: 21). O how different to the spirit of Jesus, who even in His dying agony commended His mother to the disciple whom He loved.

How common it is even among people who lay claim to be converted, that the authority of parents is made a cover for worldliness and self-indulgence, while the same authority is entirely disregarded where it does not minister to the self-gratification of the child. "My mother gave me these ornaments," says a vain girl, "and I should offend her if I did not wear them," while the same mother's wish that she should take upon her some of the care of a little sister or of the housekeeping is entirely disregarded.

Our blessed Lord next takes occasion to teach that not that which goeth into a man can defile him, "because it entereth not into his heart," but, "That which cometh out of the man that defileth the man." And He proceeds to open the door and let us know what He sees in the human heart. "For from within, out of the heart of man, proceed evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness; all these evil things come from within, and defile the man." O how terrible is the fall of man! When Adam came forth from the hand of God, he pronounced him to be "very good;" the enemy of souls has done his work well, but blessed be God, there is a power in Christ's Redemption to "destroy the works of the devil," and to produce in us "a new heart," and "a new spirit" (Ezek. 36: 26). The Lord Himself do His works upon us.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Another Bill to Suspend Chinese Immigration was introduced in the House on Monday, April 17th, by Mr. Page, by the instruction of the Committee on Education and Labor. It is a modified form of the bill recently vetoed by the President. The number of years during which the bill prohibits the immigration of the Chinese is reduced from twenty to ten years, and the passport system prescribed by the former bill is changed for one of certificates. Several other minor alterations have been made, which the committee hope will render the bill, if passed in its present form, acceptable to the President.

The New Electoral Law, which it is Proposed shall govern all future Presidential elections, was favorably reported by the House Committee on April 12th. The events of 1876 are still fresh in our recollection, and the new bill will therefore be carefully scrutinized before it becomes law. Its most important provisions are that between the day of choosing the electors and the day on which they are to vote, the title to the office of elector may be determined, which, if made by the highest judicial tribunal of the State having jurisdiction shall be conclusive; that if there be more than one judicial decision the two Houses of Congress shall determine which shall be received; that where there has been a controversy in any State, and no certified decision has been transmitted, or where two or more such certified decisions have been transmitted, the contested votes from such State shall not be counted unless both Houses concur therein.

An Important Decision in the Star Route cases was pronounced on April 10th by Judge Wylie of the Criminal Court. A motion had been made to quash the indictments, and there was some apprehension that the technical grounds on which the motion was made would be found good in law. Among these was the plea that the acts charged against Mr. Brady were done by him in his official capacity, and that he could not be punished at law for exercising a discretion conferred upon him as an officer of the government; that he could only be punished by impeachment.

Judge Wylie decided this point by citing that provision of the Constitution which declares that while judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification, the person impeached shall be liable to indictment and conviction in due process of law. Another plea made by the defence was that the appropriation of money by Congress confirmed the alleged illegal acts. Upon this, Judge Wylie said that there was nothing in the law to show that Congress had any intention to sanction such offences as were said to have been committed. The charge in these cases is not merely of improper official action within the department, but of actual conspiracy between the officials and the contractors to defraud the government. If the government can prove the crime of conspiracy against the defendants it cannot help them in the least to show that Congress unconsciously consummated their frauds.

The Repudiation of the Stenographic Report of Mr. Shipherd's testimony by the Foreign Affairs Committee, is a significant fact in connection with civil service reform. When the report was printed and laid before the committee its glaring inaccuracies were at once remarked, and Mr. Shipherd himself protested against its admission. This is the more unfortunate because the evidence given was of the utmost national importance, and as the history of the case will be frequently the subject of reference, it is of consequence that its truth should not be impugned. The stenographer pleaded that he was out of practice and was nervous, but produced a copy of a recommendation signed by General Grant vouching for his ability. The production of the document confirmed the suspicion prevalent that Mr. Hayes, who until recently filled the office, was removed in order to make a vacancy for General Grant's protégé. Mr. Hayes was requested to resume his work as official stenographer, but having accepted another appointment he was unable to comply with the request. Several members of the committee expressed their regret that the Speaker should have yielded to General Grant's representations.

A Petition to Congress Against the Suspension of Chinese immigration has been forwarded from New York. It is signed by sixty-three dry goods merchants; by sixteen firms in the iron trade, by fifty-six banking houses; by the presidents of twenty-one insurance companies; by thirty-five cotton firms, and by forty merchants in the trade with China. They remonstrate against any limitations on immigration from China—first, because the policy would be a violation of the traditions of the government; second, because it would be an unnecessary affront to a friendly nation, and, third, because "it would greatly reduce if not absolutely destroy our growing commerce with China, which promises to be of vast importance to the financial and industrial interests of the United States."

The Gift of a Million Dollars for Educational purposes among the colored people of the South was announced last week. The donor is Mr. John F. Slater, a prominent manufacturer of Norwich, Conn. Mr. Slater states his object in giving this large sum of money, in a public letter. He desires that the money shall be used for the benefit exclusively of the colored race. He is actuated by two motives; the one that of regard for their interests, and the other for the future of the country, which he considers is likely to be imperilled by the franchise being confided to uneducated men. He says: "I am desirous to aid in providing them with the means of such education as shall tend to make them good men and good citizens—education in which the instruction of the mind in the common branches of secular learning shall be associated with training in just notions of duty toward God and man in the light of the Holy Scriptures. The means to be used in the prosecution of the general object above described I leave to the discretion of the corporation; only indicating, as lines of operation adapted to the present condition of things, the training of teachers from among the people requiring to be taught. If at any time after the lapse of thirty-five years from the date of this foundation it shall appear to the judgment of three fourths of the members of this corporation that, by reason of a change in social conditions, or by reason of adequate and equitable public provision for education, or by any other sufficient reason there is no further serious need of this fund in the form in which it is at first instituted, I authorize the corporation to apply the capital of the fund to the establishment of foundations subsidiary to then already existing institutions of higher education, in such wise as to make the educational advantages of such institutions more freely accessible to poor students of the colored race." The trustees of the fund are to be Ex-President Hayes, Chief-Justice Waite, President Gilman, of Johns Hopkins University, the Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks, of Boston, Governor Colquitt, of Georgia, James P. Boyce, of Kentucky, William A. Slater, of Norwich, the son of the giver of the fund, and John A. Stewart, William E. Dodge, and Morris K. Jessup, of New York.

A Denunciation of the Principles of the Republican Party came last week from an unexpected quarter. Mr. Wayne MacVeagh, who was Attorney-General in the Garfield administration, presided on April 13th at the annual meeting of the Civil Service Reform Association in Philadelphia, and in the course of his address said that President Hayes had consulted him in the preparation of his Civil Service order, and that he wrote a portion of it. When, however, Mr. Hayes was put to the test practically, he failed, and the closing days of his administration witnessed Sherman trying to elect himself President by the aid of the Treasury Department. Then came the short-lived Garfield administration. Whatever hope was in that was cut short by Guiteau's bullet. Mr. MacVeagh concluded by saying "My party leaves me in this predicament—it has but three principles, and I find myself opposed to all three. Its first great principle is the spoils system; the second is opposition to Civil Service reform; and the third seems to consist of repudiation in old Virginia." Mr. MacVeagh is not reported as saying whether he considered the administration of which he was a member was immaculate on the points mentioned, nor as to what his future course will be.

Senator Bayard's Letter Recently Published on success in public life will receive all the more attention because his own life is held as a conspicuous example of the high and honorable principles he advocates. It is often said by Christians, when they are urged to take an active part in politics instead of abandoning public affairs to unprincipled men, that the pursuit necessarily leads to dishonor. Senator Bayard shows that the assertion has no foundation in fact. He states his conviction that success in public life does not at all involve disregard of the canons of punctiliously honorable action. He says of the young American who engages in politics that "the discovery of much weakness and unworth may often pain and disappoint him, and he may weary of the work and long for rest; but his hands can be as clean at the end of the journey as when he set out upon it."

A Methodist Minister on the Land League.—In the course of a sermon delivered in Washington, D. C., on April 9th, the Rev. Dr. Crooks, of the Irish Methodist Church, made the following remarks on the Land League agitation: "There is not a Protestant of any connection in sympathy with the Land League. It is a scheme gotten up for the ultimate purpose of trying to root out Protestantism from every part of the land, and no effort is to be left untried to root out what is called the Protestant garrison; and the thing is carried on under the name of the Land league. There is not a country on the face of the earth where there is a better land law than in Ireland now. I don't mean to say that it was always so. There was a time when the people had a good deal to complain of; when landlords could raise the rents and eject for non-payment; but the landlord has no power to raise the rent now and the tenant cannot be put out now except for not paying the rent. There is a faction in Ireland that doesn't want to be satisfied. So long as money is sent in thousands from America to feed agitation, there will be agitation in Ireland."

A Remarkable Awakening is Reported from West Virginia as the result of God's blessing on the labors of Miss Jennie Smith and her co-workers among the railroad men on the Baltimore and Ohio Line. From Martinsburg, where over two hundred souls have been saved, the movement has spread to Keyser, where in two weeks one hundred persons were brought to the Saviour, and to Piedmont, where eighty-two confessed Christ during the week ending April 8th. Miss Smith is now laboring at Cumberland, Md., at which place the members of the Y. M. C. A. are rendering efficient help in the meetings. During her absence the work at Piedmont and Keyser has been conducted by her friend, Miss Adelaide Sherman, who, like Miss Smith, engages in the work without pecuniary reward. At the two places the services conducted by Miss Sherman have been signally blessed, and one hundred and seventy-five persons have professed saving faith in Jesus.

The Baptist Sunday-School Convention of North Carolina, which closed its labors in Raleigh on Sunday night, April 2d, is said to have been the largest and most enthusiastic gathering of Sunday-school workers ever seen in the State. The body, which sat three days, holding three sessions daily, discussed such questions as "The Conversion of souls the great object of Sunday-schools," "The Development of Missionary Giving," "Week-day Work for the Sunday-School Teacher," "The Bible and how to Make it Interesting," and many others of like import. The lectures of Professor W. F. Sherwin, of Cincinnati, Ohio, were an important feature of the convention. The reports of the officers show that there are in the State at the present time six hundred and sixty-six schools, four thousand seven hundred and eighty teachers, and thirty-nine thousand two hundred and thirty-eight scholars, out of a Baptist membership of one hundred and thirty thousand. These figures show a marked increase over those of former years.

A Traveller on one of the Railroads in West Virginia who was reading a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, dropped it from the window of the car as the train was passing a station. A subscriber writes to us that it was picked up by a man who saw it fall. He read it, and God blessed its perusal to his conversion. This is one of many interesting incidents which show how God uses apparently trivial circumstances to produce momentous results. Our Saviour assured us that not even a sparrow falls to the ground without the will of God, and surely He who notices the fall of a sparrow, arranged that the special message of which that immortal soul stood in need, should be dropped from the car window at the very time and place at which it was found. Those who are engaged in the preparation of the paper and those who are praying that God's blessing may rest upon it, are naturally encouraged by this, as by many other evidences, reported from all parts of the country, that the Holy Spirit is using it in the cause of our Lord.

The Firm of A. T. Stewart & Co. Announced last week that they were about to relinquish business. It is believed to be the largest business of its kind in the whole world, and was remarkable for the character of its origin and of its operations. It was on September 2d, 1825, that Mr. A. T. Stewart first inserted an advertisement in the New York papers inviting attention to his newly-opened store. He had a capital of about $1200 and he occupied the half of a building, No. 283 Broadway. His sagacity and enterprise soon attracted business, and he proceeded step by step, always making sure his ground, to enlarge the sphere of his operations, until in 1862 he built the six story building at Ninth and Tenth Streets, now used by the firm. The building covers two and a half acres of land, and with the lot cost $2,750,000. At the time of Mr. Stewart's death in 1876, 2000 persons were employed by the firm, and the current expenses of the establishment were estimated at over $1,000,000 a year. The business which Mr. Stewart did in his two stores was enormous; the sales are said to have amounted to $203,000,000 in three years, and the income of Mr. Stewart was the largest in the mercantile world. Ex-

Judge Hilton, who was Mr. Stewart's intimate friend and successor, assigns as the reason for disposing of the business his desire for rest. There are some incredulous people who aver that there are other reasons for his retirement, but it is not a little remarkable that other commercial magnates in the city seem fully able to credit Judge Hilton's statement that he is thoroughly tired of the worry and work. He is not the first man who has found that the pursuit of wealth and its accumulation do not satisfy the soul, and after a time become an intolerable burden. The whole history of the business forms a striking commentary on the fourth and fifth chapters of Ecclesiastes, which those who regard riches as the highest good in life may advantageously study.

An Autographic Quilt has been Made by a lady at Leadville, Col., which is a curiosity. She has sent a square of cloth and a pencil of indelible ink to all the American celebrities, with the request that they return the same with their autograph and a sentiment indorsed thereon. The result has been flattering, and she has amassed an extensive collection. Some of the returns have been witty, and some fraught with good common sense. She intends disposing of the quilt for the benefit of the widow of an officer. She has had many visitors anxious to see what the celebrities have written. There are many people who evince strong curiosity to read the remarks of famous men who are indifferent about the words of inspired wisdom treasured up in the Word of God (2 Tim. 3:16).

The Exertions Made to Mail a Letter by a well-known director of a city company are described by the Lewiston, Me., Journal. The writer of the letter was anxious that it should go by the 11.28 mail to Boston. The train had left the Lewiston station when he sealed his letter. He jumped out of doors, leaped into the team of an astonished gentleman who was passing, without any remarks, grasped the reins, put the whip to the horse, and then told the man that he was bound to catch that train at Auburn. The train had started from the Auburn station when they arrived in Railroad Square. The director jumped from the wagon, and, by quick running, got by the side of the last car as it whisked past the platform of the freight depot. He caught the platform rail and got aboard, although the brakeman's face grew pale. He sent the letter forward to the mail car and rode to Danville Junction, whence he walked home. The letter was mailed, and the director returned triumphant. This shows what energetic business men will do and dare when their business enterprises are in question. The fact is a reproach to many Christians who in the affairs of their Master suffer very trivial obstacles to hinder them (Psa. 119:139).

The Arrival of Jumbo, the Enormous Elephant purchased by Mr. Barnum from the English Zoological Society, caused a sensation last week. He crossed the Atlantic in the Assyrian Monarch. The ship had a rough passage, experiencing a series of severe gales, but Jumbo bore the journey well. He was frightened and restless at first, and was seasick on the second day, but he soon recovered his appetite, and was in fine condition when he reached here. His daily allowance of food was about as follows: Two hundred pounds of hay, two bushels of oats, one bushel of biscuit, ten or fifteen large loaves of bread, two or three quarts of onions, five buckets of water, and apples, oranges, figs, cakes, and candies. The Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and other distinguished personages in London who visited the steamer to say goodbye to Jumbo just before the Assyrian Monarch sailed, left boxes of candy and buns, of which Jumbo is very fond, for his use during the voyage. He was a great pet of officers, crew, and passengers, and was liberally fed with good things. He has developed a great liking for strong drink and he swallows the contents of a whiskey bottle at one gulp, without winking, and then holds out his trunk and pleads for more. Beer he likes, also, and drank dozens of bottles during the voyage. Mr. Barnum, however, who is a strong temperance man, has put Jumbo on temperance diet and cut off all his supplies of strong drink.

A DELUSION DISPELLED.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Though Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their righteousness."—Ezekiel 14:20.

WE are told in the opening verse of this chapter that certain of the elders of Israel came to the prophet and sat before him. You need not ask who these elders were, or whence they came, because it is evident enough they were not a deputation from the Jews who were left in Judah and Jerusalem; but they were individuals of distinction from among the exiles of Chebar. That they came to inquire of the prophet of the Lord we gather from the answer that came to them by the word of the Lord; and we might also infer from the matter of the terrible denunciations that were uttered something at least of the manner of inquiry they proposed. The men were downright hypocrites; followers of the false prophets who are exposed in the previous chapter as seeing vanity and divination, and then saying, "Jehovah saith," though Jehovah had not sent them.

The thought which seems to have nestled in their breasts and prompted their visit was this: after all the exposure that Ezekiel has made of the wickedness of the land and of its inhabitants, may it not still be consistent with the mercy of the Lord to spare the city, as He would have spared the city of Sodom at the intercession of Abraham, for the sake of the few righteous men that remained in it? The answer, as you are aware, was an emphatic "No." A reference to the twenty-sixth chapter of Leviticus, and a rehearsal of the four sore judgments which should work the desolation, stand associated with the protest, which is repeated again and again, each time, it seems to us, with more vehement force—"Though Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their righteousness."

Now, my main object this evening will be to assert, to illustrate, and to enforce this one distinct feature in the moral government of God. In all the procedures of divine judgment the principle of can never be relaxed. Hence the need of personal piety—the absolute necessity that men and women should pray for themselves—that each one should repent for himself, that each one should believe for himself, and that each one should in his own proper person be born again by the effectual operation of the Spirit of God. No proxy in these matters is possible.

Among the various shifts and schemes for taking comfort without a satisfactory title, or a plausible reason, the idea adopted by some that the righteousness of their friends may be of some use to them is not the least pernicious. They are the children of eminently gracious people. "Surely," say they, "we cannot be lost." They are connected with those whose name is known, and whose memory is fragrant in Christian society. They were born and brought up in a house dedicated by family prayer; they have been cradled and nurtured in the midst of godliness. They readily believe that those who live in the back slums, and have grown up to be wanton and wilful, depraved and dishonest, will certainly perish; but can it be that those who have walked in the paths of morality and observed the ordinances of outward religion should be cast away? They scarcely think that it could be consistent with propriety to resist their claims to some discriminating consideration.

There are others, to mark a lighter shade in self-deception, who indulge a hope that the prayers of their dear ones will be heard for them, although they never pray for themselves. They fall back in time of need upon the belief that surely their mother's prayers will be answered on their behalf, or their wife's petitions will bring down a blessing upon them. They do not embody the notion in words; I wish they did; for if people were to place such thoughts in black and white, they would never like to own them; their folly would be too palpable. They entertain a hazy notion that because they have been so often prayed for, a blessing must come to them sooner or later. In fact, some of them eagerly ask the prayers of the godly, though they never pray to God for themselves.

My text is a stern rebuke for any who have betaken themselves to either of these refuges of lies. I want to sound an alarm and drive them out of their hiding-places. Oh, that God may be pleased to make His own word effectual to this end! "Though Noah, Daniel, and Job were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their righteousness."

Now, it cannot be denied that there is great power in godliness, and a mighty prevalence in the intercessions of godly people to bring down rich blessings upon men. You are perfectly right in seeking the prayers of Christian friends. Why, even the apostle Paul said, in the name of all the sacred ministry, "Brethren, pray for us." You can hardly ask for a choicer favor from the servants of God than that they should pray for you. But certain circumstances may entirely neutralize the prayers of the godly. Such circumstances were present in the case of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah in Jeremiah's day.

They went on so far in idolatry and all manner of vice that God said that He would not hear Moses and Samuel, though they stood before Him to plead on their behalf. He told Jeremiah that he might as well cease to weep and pray, for He would never hear him for that people; and here by Ezekiel He declares that if so wonderful a trio as Noah, and Daniel, and Job should join in intercession yet He would not regard them. And just so it is at this hour: if men continue in their sin—if, after hearing the Gospel, they refuse it, if they persist in rejecting it, if they stifle conscience, if they silence the voice within, if they pertinaciously resolve to indulge their lusts, and will not repent and turn to God—then the excellence of their friends will rather aggravate than make amends for their guilt, and the prayers of their friends will be so utterly nullified and made of none effect, that nothing in arrest of the dread sentence will avail them—they must perish. Birth, blood, and family avail nothing in this matter.

Thus, then, there are two propositions, which, as God shall help me, I will endeavor to set plainly before your eyes. First, the righteousness of the most godly cannot avail for the ungodly; and, secondly, the prayers of the greatest intercessors cannot avail if men persist in their unbelief.

I. First, the righteousness of

for the ungodly. We have to prove this, and we do so, first, by referring you to our text, and asking you to read it for yourselves. Mark ye how the anger of the Lord kindles, and how the words are launched forth like hot thunderbolts from the lips of the Most High. The statement is clear, the supposition is startling, but the oath that seals the oracle of heaven appals us. A coincidence that was not likely to occur is imagined to put the utmost strain on the delineation, and to give language a stress that cannot be surpassed. As a matter of fact, we are told that if Noah, Daniel, and Job were in the midst of Jerusalem, yet their conjoined virtues would not avail to save any but themselves.

I wish I could help you to realize the picture as it must have flashed before the vision of the seer. Three saints who were not cotemporary, for their lives on earth were passed in distant centuries and different climes, meet together in a season of terrible emergency. The sacred annals of those days knew no names more illustrious, no stars that shone more brightly, than Noah, Daniel, and Job. Their sympathies are all excited, their hearts are in unison, and their prayers blend together as they bow before the altar. You look, you listen, in trembling suspense, as you cast a glance at the miserable inhabitants of the doomed city, and consider the fate of those captives who are languishing in a land far away. With what measure of acceptance will those appeals for mercy be heard?

Anon, the verdict comes from the throne. They deliver their own souls by their righteousness; and no more. Not one of them saves so much as his own son or his own daughter by his supplications. What a wail comes up as is pronounced! But the echo that lingers longest in my ears is that awful asseveration, "As I live, saith the Lord God."

Next to this, I am going to ask you to inspect more narrowly the portraits of these men of God, who are presumed to have stood counsel for the defendants, and to have occasioned so much astonishment, because with all their special pleadings they signally lost their case. Noah is the very pattern of godly fear, a model of that "fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom;" just as Abraham was a model of faith, and the father of the faithful. Scarcely can we find a better man than this second father of the human race from whom we have all sprung.

Next to him we have mention made of Daniel. He was alive at the time when Ezekiel wrote; a young man, I suppose, of about thirty years of age. It is very singular that he should be sandwiched in, as it were, between Noah and Job—two men of the olden world. He must have been highly esteemed in his own generation. Ezekiel, moved by the Holy Ghost, groups him with those whom history has canonized. He was a man greatly beloved of God, and no doubt by his cotemporaries he was very much appreciated. Sterling virtue and an elevation of character above the common standard of a good man would be indispensable to his taking rank as one of so remarkable a triumvirate. So holy is he in his conscience, as well as in his habits, that the King of kings reveals to him the secrets of His government! There is none like unto Daniel; "Yet," says God, "though in addition to Noah, Daniel stood before me, his righteousness should suffice only for himself, and could not be of the least profit to any one besides."

To complete the trio, there is Job, to whom we have infallible testimony that he was perfect and upright. Satan himself could find no fault with his character; though with fiendish malice he insinuated a sinister motive for his scrupulous integrity. "Doth Job serve God for nought? Hast Thou not set a hedge about him, and all that he hath? Thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. But put forth Thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to thy face." You remember that he did not curse God, but he blessed Him, and his faith triumphed over his fretfulness even on the dunghill of his poverty, when he was covered with sore blains, and filled with anguish. Surely Job is a model of excellence. "Ye have heard of the patience of Job." "My servant Job," was the honorable designation that the Almighty gave him. Moreover, He bestowed on him high praise, and a double blessing at the end of his trial.

Now, if we had any one of these three men to plead for us we should look upon him as putting a great weight in the scale. If we had for our next-door neighbor, or brother, or father, either of these—if there were any transference of righteousness from one man to another, we should hope to shade ourselves under the wings of Noah, or Daniel, or Job. But here the Lord declares that if the whole three were put together they should not save son or daughter. No, dear friends, "Ye must be born again." Ye must be made righteous each one for himself, or else if you had all these friends at court, which you have not, they would be unable to avert the course of justice, or obtain for you the slightest favor. The text puts it plainly—"Though Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their righteousness."

This truth may be further substantiated by observing the course of Providence as regards the things of this life. Could the merits of friends and parents secure the salvation of their relatives or children, we must expect to see "the son or the daughter" of a righteous man screened from the full punishment of his own misdeeds; but we have evidence that such is not the case. Let me give you scriptural illustrations.

David had a favorite son, who became the cruel adversary of his own father, and in open rebellion attempted to usurp his throne. Yet even in the tumult of battle the king would have spread the ægis of protection over his own child. "Beware," he said to his generals, "that none touch the young man Absalom." You remember how he fled from the fray, but fled in vain; a just retribution overtook him. The locks in which he gloried were caught in the low branches of an oak, and there he hung. Then, as you hear David cry, "O Absalom, my son, my son Absalom, my son, my son, would God I had died for thee!" you see that the righteousness of David could not deliver his son Absalom even as to this life.

If you needed other proofs, I would give the instance of Judas, which is greatly to the point, not in the matter of relationship, but in the matter of association. Judas consorted with eleven of the princes of the church of God, for such I call them now that they have gone up to their thrones. Nay, more, he consorted with the Master Himself and dipped in the same dish with our Redeemer. Yet, you see, the righteousness of eleven apostles could not cover Judas, and because he did not believe in Jesus, neither did the righteousness of his Master cover him. And so this man perished in his own iniquity.

These examples I have given you from the Bible. Were I to try and turn over the pages of my recollection, I could give you that the father's righteousness does not cover the son. I am afraid I shall touch a very tender string with friends here present who in their own sons have sad proof that it is so. I have seen the preacher of the Gospel whose son was committed to prison. I have known the father to be a minister of Christ, and his son a ringleader in infidelity, or a chief actor in things too filthy and profane to be mentioned here.

Full many a child of godly parents has in this life brought himself to beggary, to disgrace, to disease, to death. It is a sad fact, but so it is. There may have been, perhaps, grave fault at home. That I cannot tell—God knows—but so it has been that men who, to the best of our judgment, were not only godly, but eminently so, have, nevertheless, had this wretched lot—to see their sons and daughters given up to work iniquity with both hands greedily. God save you from such a sorrow; but the recurrence of these facts goes to show that the godliest man's righteousness cannot avail even for son or daughter.

What need, however, that I multiply proofs? The scales of justice must be poised with an equal hand. Partiality is out of the question. God is no respecter of persons. Were it otherwise, personal obedience to the will of God could be dispensed with. There would be in this world a number of chartered libertines who would plead a mother's godliness or a father's Christian character as a set-off for their own indifference or profligacy; as if they had a special license to live as they list because their sires were godly. Would you have it so if you could? I would not. I should think it

A MOST DANGEROUS INSTITUTION.

Thank God, His divine justice has never given immunity to any vice. If a man eats sour grapes his teeth shall be set on edge. A spendthrift shall rue the course he has run, and shall beg bread, even though his father were a saint of the innermost sanctuary. If a man puts his finger into the fire, it will burn him; if he tempts the flood in time of danger, it will drown him. You may groan to think he was the child of so good a man; but the laws of nature are not to be trifled with. If you act contrary to them they will be contrary to you.

I think the meanest pride in all the world is the pride of ancestry; for how on earth can a man have any credit due to him for a contingency which never could be at his own disposal? It must be a matter of God's own dispensation, and if he have received it, why does he glory as though he had not received it. To suppose that grace comes with ancestry would be a supposition exactly opposite to the declaration of the Spirit of God by John, wherein he saith, of the godly, "which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God." There must be a birth by the Spirit of God, or the first birth will be nothing whatsoever to our advantage. However well-born at first, ye must be born again.

If the righteousness of one man could excuse the unrighteousness of another man, then the great principle of responsibility would be reversed. You and I, who were born in the midst of Christian associations, are responsible for the light which we receive. If we sin, we cannot sin so cheaply as others. If a man transgresses against the holy example of parents,

HE SCORES SEVEN FOR EVERY SIN to what another would have done who had been trained up under vicious surroundings. Assuredly he is not a less sinner, but a greater sinner who, being born in the midst of godliness, ventures to depart from the good way, transgress the sacred precepts, and refuse the Saviour. That is the principle of Scripture, to whom much is given of him much shall be required; and we have to say daily to you children of the godly that, if you fall, your exaltation by your privileges will cause you a more awful fall than the fall of others.

Painful though it be, dear friends, I must carry the assertion a stage further. The righteousness of good men has not availed to save their relatives from the terrors of the world to come. Instances of this come uncalled for to our recollection. Begin at the beginning. There is Cain. Who is his brother? Abel. Abel is a man whose faith is acceptable with God. Does that save Cain? No, he was "of that wicked one, and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." The first two sons that were born to Adam depart from earth in different directions.

Look again at Ishmael. His father, Abraham, the father of the faithful, said, "O that Ishmael might live before Thee!" yet Ishmael becomes the very type of the children of nature who do not inherit the blessing that belongs to the children of promise. Look at Esau, born at the same birth with Jacob, children of a godly father, yet we read of Esau that he was a profane person. The godliness of holy Isaac does not save Esau. Look at Hophni and Phinehas, priests of God by office, but sons of Belial by character. Their father Eli, with all his faults, was a man who feared God, yet as for these sons of his, they died in their sins, from which no sacrifice nor offering could purge them.

Look at Jehoram; his father Jehosaphat was a truly gracious man, though, alas! he turned aside, joined affinity with Ahab, and married his son to the daughter of that woman Jezebel. And, ah me, how many a young man is ruined by some such perilous alliance! For money, for business, or for social position they are wedded to the ungodly. Some of you sell your daughters to the devil that they may make a respectable match, when you know that this unequal yoking is forbidden by Gospel precept. I am ashamed of Christian people who lend their countenance to this breach of the Lord's commandment. In this world there is a blight on such unions, and in the world to come—well, over that you would wish to draw the veil. The life of Jehoram was evil; his death was painful and premature; his end was without hope; yet he was a son of Jehosaphat, who did that which was right in the sight of the Lord.

II. Now I come to our second proposition. The prayers of the greatest if men persist in their unbelief. God forbid that I should discourage any of you from praying for your parents, your children, and your friends. Let us never leave off praying for them. But if any man in this place is sitting comfortably in his seat, saying, "My wife prays for me; my mother prays for me; my children pray for me; it will be all right with me somehow, their prayers will suffice for me, without any penitence or faith on my part," I should like to touch him on the shoulder, and whisper in his ear these words, "Though Noah, Daniel, and Job were the intercessors, they could deliver none but their own souls."

Noah was a man of prayer undoubtedly; still there was not a single person saved by Noah's prayer except those that went into the ark; and if God would give to us His people everything that we ask for, yet we would not ask Him to save you if you will not believe in Christ. If you set up your idols in your heart and keep the stumbling-block of your lust before your eyes, we cannot, we dare, not pray for you that you may be saved contrary to the Gospel.

You must believe in Jesus with a faith distinctly your own. Were the whole church on earth to lift up one continuous prayer, and persevere in it from generation to generation, it could not save one unbelieving man. While he remains in unbelief the wrath of God abideth on him. If you buoy yourself up with a deceitful hope that it is different, you will presently sink down in blank despair. Remember, beloved friends, that all the prayers of godly men put together cannot alter the rule of the kingdom. And what is

THE RULE OF THE KINGDOM?

Here is one of the rules, "Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." Well, here is another rule of the kingdom, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned."

Now if Noah, Job, and Daniel were all to pray that this statute might be repealed, and a resolution more consonant with the caprice of mortal men should be substituted in its place, do you think the appeal would be allowed? Surely our cries to God must not be complaints of His decrees. Our petitions must be submissive to His word, not subversive of His wisdom. He will not change the ordinances of His kingdom because men are stubborn; like the laws of the Medes and Persians, his decrees can never be altered. They stand fast forever, and forever they exclude from heaven those who abide in unbelief.

Remember that all the prayers of godly men cannot alter the nature of sin, and if they cannot alter the nature of sin, then they that continue in it must perish. If we were to hold a prayer-meeting to prevent a person from being burnt who would put his hand into the fire, would that be of any use? If a man who cannot swim will persist in leaping into the river, what is the use of my asking you all to pray God to preserve his life? If a man puts a bottle of prussic acid to his lips and drinks it, what is the use of our coming together to pray that his life may be spared, when the deadly poison is destroying it? If he drives a dagger into his heart he must die, unless God is pleased to reverse that order, which, according to the poet, "is heaven's first law."

Oh, do remember this. Sin is fire, and it must burn. Sin is hell, and it must torment the man who continues in it. There is no help for it. Pray as much as ever we like, if you do not get out of sin, you cannot get out of destruction. If you do not find pardon through our Lord Jesus you must be punished.

Moreover, the prayers of good men cannot alter the conditions of the eternal future, so long as the present abides the same. This must be palpable to any sane judgment. The palace of luxury and the prison of penal servitude are but faint pictures of heaven and hell. What is heaven? The abode of perfect spirits washed in the blood of the Lamb. The right of admission, how can it be obtained? There are qualifications that cannot be dispensed with. And there are disqualifications that cannot be denied.

Perhaps you say, "Sir, I did not think prayer would suffice to effect a change in my circumstances without a corresponding change in myself; but I thought that somehow by prayer I should be Compelled to believe and to repent? Well, man, what sort of repentance and faith must that be which comes of compulsion? Surely that man's heart is not sincere who says, "I hope to go to heaven, though it is against my own inclination." You would fain be made to hate sin against your will? That is strange; are you to be made to love righteousness against your own liking?

I have heard of fathers saying that their daughters should marry So-and-so, but I defy them to make them love those with whom they have no sympathy. No, these matters are far too delicate to be managed by coercion. It cannot be. Neither does the Holy Ghost Himself employ force to compel those who are unwilling. He has a power that is quite congruous with the freedom of the will by which He sweetly turns the mind and will by blessed argument and illumination. By enlightening the understanding He controls the will. But, believe me, you will never be lugged into heaven by your ears. You will never be strapped down and carried to heaven as we see drunken women carried to the station-house on a stretcher. Have you ever fancied that such would be the case? Has such an absurd idea ever entered into your head, that somehow or other, without your ever seeking it, you will be taken up by some celestial surgery and chloroformed into glory? It will not be so. Turn to this Book and see.

How did the prodigal get to his father's house? Did his father asphyxiate him and make him insensible, and strap him down and carry him there? Not at all. But first he was hungry, and he tried to fill his belly with the husks, and he could not, and he became more hungry still, and then he said, "I will arise, and go unto my father," and he went to his father. Yes, it was all of grace, but still he arose and came unto his father. It was all of eternal love, but he did leave the swine and seek his home. It was of infinite pity; but he did think, and he did will to go; and, what is more, he did go to his father's house.

HE DID ALL THAT,

and then when he was a great way off his father met him. Now, do believe me, though I always preach free, rich, sovereign grace with all my heart, I never understood, and never shall understand, that God treats us like logs of wood and blocks of marble, and cleaves or chips us about as if we had no life, or will, or intelligence. It is not so, and only fools think in such a fashion.

Do you believe this, dear friends? It may be that out of this large congregation there are only a few to whom these remonstrances are particularly appropriate; but I thought that I would leave the ninety and nine sheep in the wilderness—there is plenty of sweet grass for you in the quiet places of the word—and I would go after some that have gone astray in this direction, for I long to find you. Oh, that the blessed Spirit would convince you of your sin, and lead you to say, I have played the fool exceedingly.

Remember, there is a righteousness which you can have—the righteousness of Jesus Christ which can cover you. Though Noah and Daniel and Job cannot deliver you, Jesus can. There is an intercession that can be heard for you—the intercession of one that liveth and was dead, and now maketh intercession for men, and is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him. Come unto God by Him, and His intercession is yours, and shall be your health, and His righteousness is yours, and shall be your covering. God grant it for the dear Redeemer's sake. Amen.

A Lawyer's Interview With His Ward.

A HEADSTRONG GIRL.

IN a cosy room in one of our great cities a fashionably-attired young lady sat awaiting an interview. She was alone, and was evidently uneasy. The coming visit clearly presented itself to her mind in the aspect of an ordeal, and she was anxious to have it over. She moved restlessly about the room, occasionally sitting down at the piano and rattling off a few bars of a favorite air; then rising impatiently she would take a walk up and down the apartment, or turn over the leaves of a book in which she did not read a line. At length the door was opened and an elderly gentleman entered. He greeted the lady with the grave and respectful courtesy of the old school, and at once entered on the business in hand.

The gentleman was a lawyer, and the lady was the orphan daughter of a late client. She had no near relatives and when her father was dying he had confided his fortune to the care of his lawyer in trust for his little girl. The lawyer, a conscientious Christian man, had given much care to the education and training of his ward, and had been especially anxious that her friendships should be with godly people. She had, however, in the course of a visit to a fashionable watering-place, made the acquaintance of a man of some considerable social rank but without the religious principle which the experienced lawyer knew was the only sure foundation for a useful life. On hearing from his ward of the acquaintance she had formed, and seemed disposed to cultivate, he immediately took steps to obtain some further knowledge of the young man's character. The result had been to satisfy him that a friendship with such a man must end disastrously. But in spite of warnings the friendship had ripened, and at last a promise of marriage had been given, and accepted, and now the young lady had come to her guardian's house to inform him of the fact.

The lawyer was startled and grieved by the news, but hoped that he might still be able to prevent the marriage. He was too wary to lose his temper or to give expression to an authoritative prohibition, such as his position as Lilian's guardian would have warranted him in doing, but he sought rather to induce Lilian herself to separate from the man who had dazzled her youthful fancy. With the utmost deference he placed before her a sketch of the danger she risked in marrying a comparative stranger, and one, too, whose conversation and habits naturally justified suspicion. Lilian heard him with downcast face, but with firm resolve that she would be true to the man she had promised to marry.

The interview was a long one, and the lawyer saw that he had failed, long before it had closed. Lilian would not argue the question, or he might have convinced her. She would only say that she had promised, and she would keep her promise and that "it was a shame to speak ill of a man so good and honorable" as the one she loved, and that "it was wrong to suspect him of being vicious and dissolute because he was not so sedate and serious as an old man." Then the lawyer changed his attack, and concentrated all his efforts on securing from Lilian herself a provision for her future. He induced her to place apart from her fortune, a sum of twenty thousand dollars, which should be confided to his keeping, and on which she should receive only the interest. To this Lilian consented, and the necessary documents were prepared and signed.

The marriage took place, and bride and bridegroom went to Europe to spend their honeymoon. It was two years before the lawyer heard anything more of his ward, and then the tidings were deplorable. One stormy winter's night, there drove up to his residence a carriage, from which alighted a lady, looking the very picture of distress. It was Lilian. After disregarding her guardian's advice, she felt she had no right to expect comfort from him, but she had come to him in her trouble simply because her necessity had no choice.

Short as was the period which had elapsed since her marriage, it had been long enough to convince her that the old-fashioned regard for the law of the Highest was infinitely better than the best advantage which the world could give. She had been introduced by her husband's relations to all the gayeties of fashionable life. She had been welcomed into circles which it was supposed to be a rare privilege to enter. She had gone the whole round of conventional folly, and tried all that the glittering amusements of London and Paris could offer.

What her experience had been, a glance at her face sufficed to tell. Never were sorrow, disappointment, regret, and pain more clearly depicted in a human countenance. The husband whom she had trusted, after wasting in gambling and dissipation as much of her fortune as he could lay hold of, had heartlessly left her, and she had found herself alone with her infant in Paris, forsaken, weak, and miserable. She had waited in the gay city, enduring all kinds of privation, still hoping against hope for her husband's return. But one day she saw in an evening paper that an American had been hurt in a drunken brawl and had died before medical assistance could be summoned. She went to the place named, and there saw the dead body of her husband. Then she thought of her guardian, and selling all her trinkets and the few jewels left to her, she raised sufficient money to pay her passage home.

Touched with her tale of sorrow, the old lawyer received her without one word of reproach, and warmly expressed his thankfulness that though her expectations of worldly happiness had proved an empty dream, better things were in store for her now that she had learned to estimate the pleasures of irreligious fashionable life at their true value. She had through his foresight a sufficient income for herself and her child, but she asked her guardian as a favor that she might make her home in his house, a request with which he gladly complied.

Lilian had learned wisdom in the stern school of adversity. She betook herself to Him who can heal every wound that sin has made, and in His service and favor found the happiness she had vainly sought elsewhere. The care and training of her little son was a source of ever new interest and delight. Out of the fulness of a heart made wise by sadness, she taught others the lessons which had been so costly to herself, and lived to be the joy of her guardian's declining years, and a great blessing to many.

A ROMANTIC RESCUE.

A CROWD of hardy fishermen with their wives and daughters stood one afternoon on the beach below a village in Newfoundland eagerly watching two boats approaching the shore. A storm was raging with a violence that even the oldest man in the group had never seen equalled. The sky was almost as black as night, and the waves seemed lashed into fury by the gale. There were anxious hearts among the watchers, for in those two boats, now rising on the crest of the waves and now lost to view in the trough of the sea, were the sons of some of the men, and the husbands of some of the women standing there. Oh! it is hard to see those we love on the brink of destruction, and yet unable to move a hand for their rescue. As every eye was strained in the direction of the boats, many prayers silently ascended to Heaven for the heroic crews. Poor creatures, they could do no more, but they did that, and they did it with an earnestness and an importunity which only those use who know their need of a blessing and believe that God can and will answer prayer.

Those who prayed too, were conscious of a certain ground for their petitions in the errand that had taken the two boats out to sea in such a storm. It was an errand of mercy. Nearly two miles from the shore, where the waves bore on their crest masses of foam, lay on her beam-ends a trim vessel. Just below the surface of the water and visible at low tide were a cluster of cruel rocks. On these the vessel had struck and the breakers were fast rending her to pieces. The two boats were launched by the intrepid men when she first struck, and they were returning laden with passengers and crew. It seemed to the anxious crowd of watchers as if they would never reach the land, but after a long and desperate struggle a joyous shout told that they were safe at last.

Then commenced the care of the rescued people, some of whom had been picked up from the waves and were still unconscious, even if they were alive. Among these was an elderly gentleman, who, from his dress and general appearance, obviously belonged to the upper classes of society. Another of the passengers, a young man who had been taken off the wreck, showed much solicitude over the old gentleman, and loudly declared that if the kind people would attend to him first they would be liberally rewarded. There were those present who, poor as they were, thought the offer little removed from an insult. The idea that services such as they had rendered, and were prepared to render, could be paid for with money, could only have entered a mind lost to all appropriate sense of gratitude. But the old gentleman needed little attention. Such simple restoratives as the women had at hand sufficed in his case, and he soon opened his eyes and gazed bewildered on those about him. Then a wild cry broke from his lips. "My daughter! Where is my daughter?"

Only two women were among the rescued, and neither of these was the lady he sought. Then with his eyes fixed on the young man who had promised the reward he said in an agonized tone of voice, "James, where is my daughter; you surely never left her to perish?" The young man addressed hung his head in shame and said that she had swooned in the cabin and he had tried to carry her to the deck, but the boats were leaving and he could not have been taken off had he waited. A bitter wail went up from the father's lips as he heard the reply, and he fainted.

At this moment a tall figure was seen rapidly approaching from the village. It was the clergyman, who had been visiting a sick parishioner inland, and when the storm came on had hurried to the beach, hearing on his way of the wreck and of the gallant attempt at rescue. None was more welcome there than he. Philip Irving was the best loved man for miles around. Four years before he had come to the village on a visit, and he had not left it since. He opened the little church on the hill, he visited the sick, comforted the bereaved, taught the children in the little school, and was continually engaged in works of love and sympathy. But sincerely as he was loved no one understood him. There came over him at times a moodiness and a recklessness that puzzled the simple people. His face bore the marks of trouble, and of a hard and bitter conflict of which he never spoke. He had been known to leave his house for two or three days at a time, and had been seen walking solitarily on the cliffs with but scant caution. When he returned from these long excursions he would look pale and ill, but calmer and more gentle than usual. At such times he would engage in any Christian work there might be in hand with extra zeal and with a subdued air as of one chastened by sorrow.

As he approached the group on the beach, his hearty grasp of the rough hands held out to him showed that his congratulations were no meaningless phrases on his lips, and he raised a glass he carried to his eye, that he might see what an almost superhuman rescue they had achieved. He gazed but for a moment, and then exclaimed that he saw a human form clinging to a spar near the wreck. Instantly the glass was thrown aside, and he sprang into his own skiff disregarding all warning. To those who would have gone to the rescue in his stead he said "No," they were already fatigued, and he was strong and would go alone. They watched him as with a strong arm he wielded the oars, and they saw with delight how gallantly his little craft rode the waves. Soon the word was passed through the crowd that he had loved by her in return. That being rejected by the squire, on account of his poverty, with words of scorn and disdain, he had quitted his native land and had carried his burden of grief to this little fishing village and tried to forget his disappointment in works of Christian love. That after his departure the squire had tried to bring about a marriage between his daughter and the son of a wealthy neighbor, the craven suitor who accompanying father and daughter on their voyage had saved himself and left his betrothed to perish. The villagers predicted that their clergyman had won for himself a wife when he went out on the day of the storm to rescue at the peril of his life, he knew not whom, and unwittingly rescued the girl he loved. That prediction was fulfilled. The life so saved was given into his keeping, and the lives of bride and bridegroom so strangely united, were devoutly consecrated to the service of Him whose way is in the sea and whose path is in the great waters (Psalm 77 : 19).

The Failure of the New Rugby Colony in Tennessee appears to be an admitted fact. The following as some of the causes of non-success are assigned by Governor Hawkins of that State: "There are two hundred persons still there, a few are Germans and Americans. The great majority are Englishmen who are not workers. Many of them are younger sons of noble or wealthy families, and, as a rule, they are thrifless and dissipated. They spend their time in hunting and in playing billiards, lawn tennis, and in other amusements. Only fifty acres of the original purchase of 30,000 are under cultivation." If this account is correct there is no reason to be surprised that the colony did not thrive.

lifted a lady into his boat and was pulling for the shore. The delight of the people knew no bounds, but it was checked by a cry of alarm. As he neared the beach an oar was broken by a giant wave, and instantly the light boat whirled around and capsized. That was an anxious moment, but just when he was given up for lost he was seen wading up to his breast in water with the unconscious burden in his arms. A rope had been thrown to him as the boat capsized, and by its means he had succeeded in gaining a footing, and was soon standing among his flock, with the woman he had risked his life to save, safe in the hands of her rejoicing father.

The clergyman stood but a few minutes amid a group of admiring men who were thanking God that his desperate venture had not cost him his life, when the father of the rescued girl made his way to them to thank the preserver of his daughter's life. The simple villagers then saw with surprise a strange look of recognition pass over the faces of both men, and while from the clergyman's lips broke the exclamation, "You, Mr. Grenville," they saw the old gentleman's countenance pale, as he said, "Philip, can it be you?"

Before many weeks passed away a romantic story was told in all the cottages of the little village. It was said that Philip Irving had once been the curate of a trans-Atlantic parish. That he had loved the only daughter of a proud squire, and been Alice Pascal.

ALICE PASCAL looked up into Jean Merle's face with the frank and easy self-possession of a well-bred Englishwoman; coloring a little with girlish shyness, yet at the same time smiling with a pleasant light in her dark eyes. The oval of her face, and the color of her hair and eyes, resembled, though slightly, the more beautiful face of Felicita in her girlhood; it was simply the curious likeness which runs through some families to the remotest branches. But her smile, the shape of her eyes, the kneeling attitude, riveted him to the spot where he stood, and struck him dumb. A fancy flashed across his brain, which shone like a light from heaven. Could this girl be Hilda, his little daughter, whom he had last seen sleeping in her cot? Was she then come, after many years, to visit her father's grave?

There had always been a gnawing sadness to him in the thought that it was Felicita herself who had erected that cross over the tomb of a stranger, with whom his name was buried. He did not know that it was Mr. Clifford alone who had thus set a mark upon the place where he believed that the son of his old friend was lying. It had pained Jean Merle to think that Felicita had commemorated their mutual sin by the erection of an imperishable monument; and it had never surprised him that no one had visited the grave. His astonishment came now. Was it possible that Felicita had revisited Switzerland? Could she be near at hand, in the village down yonder? His mother, also, and his boy, Felix, could they be treading the same soil, and breathing the same air as himself? An agony of mingled terror and rapture shot through his inmost soul. His lips were dry, and his throat parched; he could not articulate a syllable.

He did not know what a gaunt and haggard madman he appeared. His gray hair was ragged and tangled, and his sunken eyes gleamed with a strange brightness. The villagers, who were wont at times to call him an imbecile, would have been sure they were right at this moment, as he stood motionless and dumb, staring at Alice; but to her he looked more like one whose reason was just trembling in the balance. She was alone, her father was no longer in sight; but she was not easily frightened. Rather a sense of sacred pity for the forlorn wretch before her filled her heart.

"See!" she said in clear and penetrating accents, full, however, of gentle kindness, and she spoke unconsciously in English, "see! I have carried this little slip of ivy all the way from England to plant it here. This is the grave of a man I should have loved very dearly."

A rapid flush of color passed over her face as she spoke, leaving it paler than before, while a slight sadness clouded the smile in her eyes.

"Was he your father?" he articulated, with an immense effort.

"No," she answered; "not my father, but the father of my dearest friends. They cannot come here; but it was his son who gathered this slip of ivy from our porch at home, and asked me to plant it here for him. Will it grow, do you think?"

"It shall grow," he muttered.

It was not his daughter, then; none of his own blood was at hand. Yet this English girl fascinated him; he could not turn away his eyes, but watched every slight movement as she carefully gathered the soil about the root of the little plant, which he vowed within himself should grow. She was rather long about her task, for she wished this madman to go away, and leave her alone beside Roland Sefton's grave. What her father had told her about him was still strange to her, and she wanted to familiarize it to herself. But still the haggard-looking peasant lingered at her side, gazing at her with his glowering and sunken eyes; yet neither moving nor speaking.

"You know English?" she said, as all at once it occurred to her that she had spoken to him, as she would have spoken to one of the villagers in their own country churchyard at home, and that he had answered her. He replied only by a gesture.

"Can you find me some one who will take charge of this little plant?" she asked.

Jean Merle raised his head, and lifted up his dim eyes to the eastern mountain-peaks, which were still shining in the rays of the sinking sun, though the twilight was darkening everywhere in the valley. Only last night he had slept among some juniper-bushes just below the boundary of that everlasting snow, feeling himself cast out forever from any glimpse of his old Paradise. But now, if he could only find words and utterance, there was come to him, even to him, a messenger, an angel direct from the very heart of his home, who could tell him all that last night he believed that he should never know. The tears sprang to his eyes, blessed tears; and a rush of uncontrollable longing overwhelmed him. He must hear all he could of those whom he loved; and then, whether he lived long or died soon, he would thank God as long as his miserable life continued.

"It is I who take care of this grave," he said; "I was with him when he died. He spoke to me of Felix and Hilda and his mother; and I saw their portraits. You hear? I know them all?"

"Was it you who watched beside him?" asked Alice eagerly. "Oh! sit down here and tell me all about it; all you can remember. I will tell it all again to Felix, and Hilda, and Phebe Marlowe; and oh! how glad, and how sorry they will be to listen!"

There was no mention of Felicita's name, and Jean Merle felt a terrible dread creep over him at this silence. He sank down on the ground beside the grave, and looked up into Alice's bright young face, with eyes that to her were no longer lit up with the fire of insanity, however intense and eager they might seem. It was an undreamed-of chance which had brought to her side the man who had watched by the death-bed of Felix's father.

"Tell me all you remember," she urged.

"I remember nothing," he answered, pressing his dark hand against his forehead, "it is more than thirteen years ago. But he showed to me their portraits. Is his wife still living?"

"Oh, yes!" she answered, "but she will not let either of them come to Switzerland; neither Felix nor Hilda. Nobody speaks of this country in her hearing; and his name is never uttered. But his mother used to talk to us about him; and Phebe Marlowe does so still. She has painted a portrait of him for Felix."

"Is Roland Sefton's mother yet alive?" he asked, with a dull, aching foreboding of her reply.

"No," she said. "Oh! how we all loved dear old Madame Sefton! She was always more like Felix and Hilda's mother than Cousin Felicita was. We loved her more a hundred times than Cousin Felicita, for we are afraid of her. It was her husband's death that spoiled her whole life and set her quite apart from everybody else. But madame—she was not made so utterly miserable by it; she knew she would meet her son again in heaven. When she was dying she said to Cousin Felicita, 'He did not return to me, but I go to him; I go gladly to see again my dear son.' The very last words they heard her say were, 'I am come, Roland!'"

Alice's voice trembled, and she laid her hand caressingly on the name of Roland Sefton graven on the cross above her. Jean Merle listened, as if he heard the words whispered a long way off, or as by some one speaking in a dream. The meaning had not reached his brain, but was travelling slowly to it, and would surely pierce his heart with a new sorrow and a fresh pang of remorse. The loud chanting of the monks in the abbey close by broke in upon their solemn silence, and awoke Alice from the reverie into which she had fallen.

"Can you tell me nothing about him?" she asked. "Talk to me as if I was his child."

"I have nothing to tell you," answered Jean Merle. "I remember nothing he said."

She looked down on the poor ragged peasant at her feet, with his gaunt and scarred features, and his slowly articulated speech. There seemed nothing strange in such a man not being able to recall Roland Sefton's dying words. It was probable that he barely understood them; and most likely he could not gather up the meaning of what she herself was saying. The few words he uttered were English, but they were very few and forced.

"I am sorry," she said gently, "but I will tell them you promised to take care of the ivy I have planted here."

She wished the dull, gray-headed villager would go home, and leave her alone for a while in this solemn and sacred place; but he crouched still on the ground, stirring neither hand nor foot. When at last she moved as if to go away, he stretched out a toil-worn hand, and laid it on her dress.

"Stay," he said, "tell me more about Roland Sefton's children; I will think of it when I am tending this grave."

"What am I to tell you?" she asked gently. "Hilda is three years younger than me, and people say we are like sisters. She and Felix were brought up with me and my brothers in my father's house; we were like brothers and sisters. And Felix is like another son to my father, who says he will be both good and great some day. Good he is now; as good as man can be."

"And you love him!" said Jean Merle, in a low and humble voice, with his head turned away from her, and resting on the lowest step of the cross.

Alice started and trembled as she looked down on the grave and the prostrate man. It seemed to her as if the words had almost come out of this sad, and solitary, and forsaken grave, where Roland Sefton had lain unvisited so many years. The last gleam of daylight had vanished from the snowy peaks, leaving them wan and pallid as the dead. A sudden chill came into the evening air which made her shiver; but she was not terrified, though she felt a certain bewilderment and agitation creeping through her. She could not resist the impulse to answer the strange question.

"Yes, I love Felix," she said simply. "We love each other dearly."

"God bless you!" cried Jean Merle, in a tremulous voice. "God in heaven bless you both, and preserve you to each other!"

He had lifted himself up, and was kneeling before her, eagerly scanning her face, as if to impress it on his memory. He bent down his gray head and kissed her hand humbly and reverently, touching it only with his lips. Then starting to his feet he hastened away from the cemetery, and was soon lost to her sight in the gathering gloom of the dusk.

For a little while longer Alice lingered at the grave, thinking over what had passed. It was not much as she recalled it, but it left her agitated and disturbed. Yet after all she had only uttered aloud what her heart would have said at the grave of Felix's father. But this strange peasant, so miserable and poverty-stricken, so haggard and hopeless-looking, haunted her thoughts both waking and sleeping. Early the next morning she and Canon Pascal went to the hovel inhabited by Jean Merle, but found it deserted and locked up. Some laborers had seen him start off at daybreak up the Trübsee Alp, from which he might be either ascending the Titlis, or taking the route to the Joch-Pass. There was no chance of his return that day, as Jean Merle's absence usually lasted for several days, and he was eccentric, bestowing his confidence on nobody. There was little more to be learned of him, except that he was a heretic, a stranger, and a miser. Canon Pascal and Alice visited once more Roland Sefton's grave, and then they went on their way over the Joch-Pass, with some faint hopes of meeting with Jean Merle on their route, hopes that were not fulfilled.

When he left the cemetery Jean Merle went home to his wretched chalet, flung himself down on his rough bed, and slept for some hours, the profound and dreamless sleep of utter exhaustion. The last three nights he had passed under the stars, and stretched upon the low juniper-bushes. He awoke suddenly, from the bright, clear moonlight of a cloudless sky and dry atmosphere streaming in through his door, which he had left open. There was light enough for him to withdraw some money from a safe hiding-place he had constructed in his crazy old hut, and to make up a packet of most of the clothing he possessed.

There were between twenty and thirty pounds a gold pieces of twenty francs each—the only money he was owner of now his Lucerne bankers had failed him. A vague purpose, dimly shaping itself, was in his brain, but he was in no hurry to see it take definite form. With his small bundle of clothes and his leathern purse, he started off in the earliest rays of the dawn to escape being visited by the young English girl, whom he had seen at the grave, and who would probably seek him out in the morning with her father. Who they were he could find out if he himself returned to Engelberg.

If he returned; for, as he ascended the steep path leading up to the Trübsee Alp, he turned back to look at the high mountain-valley where he had dwelt so long, as though he was looking upon it for the last time. It seemed to him as if he was waking out of a long lethargy and paralysis. Three days ago the dull round of incessant toil and parsimonious hoarding had been abruptly broken up by the loss of all he had toiled for and hoarded up, and the shock had driven him out like a maniac, to wander about the desolate heights of Engelberg in a mood bordering on despair, which had made him utterly reckless of his life. Since then news had come to him from home—stray gleams from the Paradise he had forfeited. Strongest of them all was the thought that these fourteen years had transformed his little son Felix into a man, loving as he himself had loved, and already called to take his part in the battle of life. He had never realized this before, and it stirred his heart to the very depths.

THE SIGNS OF THE PRESENT TIMES.

Do they Indicate the Approach of the Second Advent?

Authorized Signs of Christ's Speedy Coming—Their Special Characteristics—The Earliest Forerunners of the Event—Their Distinguishing Features—Wars and Earthquakes—The World-wide Diffusion of the Gospel—What if Christ's Coming be Delayed?—Lawlessness, Iniquity, and Infidelity—The Present Position and Circumstances of the Jews—The "Fig Tree" Nearly Full of Leaves.

THE WORLD-WIDE PREACHING OF THE GOSPEL.

In Matt. 24 : 14, we meet with a very noteworthy sign of this more definite description: "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." And, in Mark 13 : 10, "And the Gospel must first be published among all nations." There is still, it will be observed, a certain amount of vagueness as to its actual accomplishment designedly attaching to this, as to the predictions previously referred to. Were it not so, the actual time of the occurrence of the Advent would, contrary to the Lord's emphatic declaration on this subject, be capable of being accurately fore-known. This vagueness, in this instance, belongs especially to the words "for a witness," it being impossible for us to determine when such a result of the "preaching," or "publishing," of the Gospel among all the nations shall have been sufficiently accomplished to answer the requirement expressed in these words. There is, however, one great fact concerning this matter, which it is most essential that we should remember, but which seems to have been strangely lost sight of by many writers and speakers upon the subject.

THE GATHERING AND COMPLETING OF THE CHURCH.

It is as follows. We are distinctly taught in Isaiah 66 : 19, compared with its preceding context, especially verse 15, that, at the actual occurrence of the Advent, there will be very many people among the then existing nations of the earth, who shall not have ever heard of the Lord's fame, or seen His glory." The publishing of the Gospel previous to the Advent "for a witness to the nations," does not by any means necessarily involve or require such a diffusion of it as shall reach every existing individual, or family, or locality, among these nations. On the contrary, it will not, we are expressly taught, be at all diffused to any such extent among them, until after the Advent shall have taken place. And this is in exact accordance with what we learn from other portions of the Holy Scriptures, such for instance as Acts 15 : 17, Rev. 5 : 8-10, concerning the object of the sending forth of the Gospel for a witness among the nations during this present dispensation—namely, that its object is not, as some so mistakenly imagine, the conversion to Christ of all these nations, but "the taking out from among them of a people," the gathering and completing of that Church "the Bride the Lamb's wife," which is, subsequent to His Advent, to "reign" with Him over these nations, who shall then, by another, and altogether different diffusion among them of His Gospel, through the instrumentality of converted Israel, be converted unto Him, and shall become the subjects of His kingdom. See also and compare Isaiah 66 : 15-24, and Romans 11 : 15.

Now, if this be so, a most important consideration arises in immediate connection with our question.

WHAT IF CHRIST'S COMING BE DELAYED?

Let us just suppose that the Redeemer's Advent should be postponed for some, not many years, from the present time. Let us suppose that during these years the British and Foreign Bible Society were to carry on, as it is doing now, its glorious work of translating into every known language and dialect the blessed Word of God, the best of all preachers and publishers of the Gospel, inasmuch as it is the only one which always publishes it abroad in all its fulness without any taint of human error or impediment of human infirmity, and of circulating this word as it is at present doing, from end to end of all the habitable earth. Let us further suppose that the various noble missionary societies at present laboring so arduously in the publishing and preaching of the same Gospel in every region of the globe, were, during this brief period of postponement, to continue, and to increase year by year their efforts, as they are doing now. Does not the conclusion seem to force itself upon us as all but inevitable, that, at the end of these years, even supposing them to have been few, there would, as far as we can judge, be no nations, no families, scarcely any, if any, individuals, existing upon the earth who should not, ere then, have "heard the fame and seen the glory" of Christ in the light of His blessed Gospel, none who should not ere then, either by the reception of that Gospel have become incorporated with His Church, or else who, by its rejection, should not have come under the awful judgments upon the unbelieving with which He shall then be revealed. In such case there would, therefore, be none to be the subjects of that extensive and completely successful mission of the remnant of Israel spoken of (Isaiah 66 : 19), to which we have already referred.

LAWLESSNESS, INIQUITY, AND INFIDELITY.

There are other by no means unimportant or uncertain signs to which, did time and space permit, I should willingly advert. Such are the abounding lawlessness and iniquity and infidelity of the present time, the working of the leaven more or less at present among all the nations, which in one nation in the last century, fermented into such appalling results. These, however, are the signs directly of the approaching Advent of the Antichrist, rather than of Christ, while in signifying the former they necessarily become most sure indications of the latter. My desire, in this article, is to confine myself to such signs as are specially designed to comfort and to cheer the hearts of His believing people with the assurance that the coming of their Lord is indeed drawing nigh. And, therefore, with brief reference to one more of such, and that to my mind the most significant of all, I shall conclude. It is

THE POSITION AND CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE JEWS.

The able and interesting articles entitled "The Budding of the Fig-tree," by W. Maude, in the January and February numbers of The Prophetic News, have left little to be said in addition upon this very interesting subject. I would only say that, having read the work entitled "The Land of Gilead," by W. Oliphant, which forms the topic of the second of these articles, I cannot but regard the book in itself as a most remarkable sign of the times; all the more so that its author undertook and accomplished his exploratory tour under the semi-official sanction of the British and French Governments—himself, all the while, an ignorer of the restoration of Israel as a fulfilment of prophecy, and yet looking upon it, and working with singular ardor and ability for its accomplishment, as a political necessity of the present time. The only obstacle to its being speedily effected, or at all events to the accomplishment of a large and speedy instalment of it immediately taking place, would seem to have been, at the time of the publication of this book, the want of consent upon the part of the Sultan, which Mr. Oliphant had failed to obtain.

But, if we are to believe recent statements in some of our leading newspapers, all unwillingness upon the Sultan's part towards the colonization of Palestine by Jews is at an end. The Record of November 9th, has an article entitled, "The Colonization of Palestine by Jews," in which it gives a copy of a communication published in the Jewish Chronicle from a Jewish Society formed at Galatz for that purpose, which speaks of "English notabilities as willing to come forward with the support and permission of the Government to give to the Jews possession of fields and vineyards in a land now not sown, and where there was not a man to till it and keep it." The article goes on to state that the Sultan has expressed to Mr. Bourke his willingness to grant a tract of land in Syria for that purpose in consideration of a loan, as stated in the daily journals, and notably in a leader in the Times; and that England would exercise a kind of protectorate, and they would abide under its shadow.

When we compare all this, and much besides this, which has occurred in recent years with regard to the land and the people, with the time, not many years ago, when Palestine was "a land that no man cared for," and the Jewish people were "a scorn and a bye-word" among the nations, and when the comparatively few who entertained a thought of their future restoration were regarded by those who considered themselves "men of sense" as fanciful and visionary in the extreme, it seems to me as though "the fig-tree" had well-nigh ceased to be a "budding" one, by reason of its manifestly becoming

ALMOST FULL OF LEAVES.

Upon the whole, then, I submit that the only answer which can consistently be given to our question by those who read the prophetic Scriptures, and who without prejudice consider the subject in the light which they shed upon it, must be an answer in the affirmative.

I submit that the signs of the present times are such as to speak to the hearts of the Lord's believing people in words of most encouraging assurance that at the longest it can be but "a very little while, and He that cometh shall come, and shall not tarry." (Hebrews 10 : 37, Revised Version.) If so, do they not also speak to one and all, in words of very solemn warning, against any tendency towards that attitude of mind in which it is Satan's special object and endeavor to place and to keep them, the attitude of "the evil servant, who says in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming?"

NOTE.—Upon the subject of the Gospel being preached to all nations for a witness, I wish to ask the attention of my readers to a statement made publicly by Rev. S. Duffield, D.D., in which he averred that there is still one, and only one country, in which the Gospel of the kingdom has not been openly proclaimed—viz., the peninsula of the Corea. Even should this statement be not altogether correct, the fact that it can be made is surely most significant as to the extent to which the Gospel has been and is being proclaimed.*

* Since the above was written the announcement has been made in an English Journal that the London Religious Tract Society is circulating religious books in Corea. Corea is a kingdom from which hitherto Europeans have been jealously excluded. It is situate to the north-east of China proper, south of Manchuria, and nearly opposite to Japan. It is about the same length as England and Scotland, with an area of 90,000 square miles and a population of 10,000,000.—Ed.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Some Excitement was Produced in Ireland on April 10th by the news that Mr. Parnell had been released from prison. The houses were illuminated in the cities, bonfires blazed in the country districts and bands were playing in the streets. Bitter disappointment followed when it became known that Mr. Parnell was only temporarily released, and that he was pledged to return at a specified time. Mr. Parnell had telegraphed to the government that his sister's only child had died, and that if they would allow him to attend the funeral he would "undertake not to take part in any political matter." Mr. Forster said in reply that upon understanding that Mr. Parnell's engagement included an undertaking not to take part in any demonstration, he approved of his being released on parole for one week, or for such further time as would enable him to attend the funeral of his sister's child. Mr. Parnell went direct to Paris, where his sister resides, but the remains of his sister's child had been interred before his arrival there.

Mr. Forster, the Secretary for Irish Affairs, in reply to an appeal made in the House of Commons to release the imprisoned members of Parliament, made a speech in which he charged them and their fellow leaders in the Land League with being responsible for the outrages. He said last year these outrages were constantly happening, and no resolute effort was made by the leaders of the Land League to stop them. An occasional remark might be made, but, on the other hand, words were spoken and written which no one having a knowledge of the Irish people and of human nature could doubt would lead to the commission of outrages. Then came the "No Rent" manifesto and its publication over Ireland. But its track had been marked by deeds of bloodshed and violence, committed because men disobeyed the manifesto, by those who reasonably supposed that they were carrying out the wishes of its authors and distributors. It had been said, "If you slap an Irishman in the face you must expect a blow in return." Yes, but a blow to whom? Not to the government. But the blow was given to poor men such as he saw lying in agony from the injuries they had received. The blow was given to hard working, honest men, who were torn from their beds, maimed or killed.

The Memorial Window in Westminster Abbey for which American citizens have subscribed as a tribute of respect to Dean Stanley, forms the subject of a statement issued by the Dean's successor, Dr. Bradley. He says the list of subscribers thoroughly bears out the statement of Rev. Phillips Brooks as to its widely representative character, and it would be invidious to make a selection, but it is interesting to remark that the name of Henry W. Longfellow, following that of Oliver Wendell Holmes, is followed by those of Ralph Waldo Emerson and John G. Whittier.

Queen Victoria Returned to England last week after spending a short time at Mentone, in the South of France. It is stated that during her tour she administered a reproof to the gamblers of the noted resort of Monte Carlo, the authorities of which humbly offered a magnificent basket of exotics. A correspondent says it was as peremptorily refused as though a deadly viper coiled beneath the beautiful blossoms. It may be supposed that the Queen intended thus to mark her disapprobation of the gambling spirit which is becoming so alarmingly prevalent in England.

The Czar of Russia is making Preparations for being crowned at Moscow. The Minister of the Imperial Household has issued a private circular announcing that the coronation will take place in August and that by imperial command all dignitaries of the empire must attend the ceremony in Moscow. The festivities will last two weeks, and it is estimated that the expenses will amount to about seven million dollars. The celebration when the late Czar was crowned lasted a month and cost nearly twelve million dollars. It appears an extraordinary sum to pay for crowning a monarch who will have reason to congratulate himself if he lives to see the close of the ceremony. That he may well have reason to doubt that issue is evident from a statement which appears in the Vienna Presse, which says: "Trustworthy merchants from Moscow report that eighty workmen who were employed on the Uspanski Cathedral were arrested on Holy Saturday in consequence of the discovery of a mine under that edifice, in which it is intended that the ceremony of the coronation of the Czar shall take place."

Prince Gortschakoff, the Celebrated Russian statesman who has for more than thirty years controlled the foreign policy of his country, has resigned. He is eighty-four years of age, and he finds the new order of affairs too great a tax on his strength. A despatch from St. Petersburg says that an imperial ukase has been published stating that, in deference to the wish the Prince Gortschakoff, the Czar has relieved him of the functions of Minister of Foreign Affairs on account of shattered health and advancing years. On the imperial rescript which was delivered to Prince Gortschakoff the Czar wrote with his own hand, "With the sincere esteem of your grateful Alexander." Prince Gortschakoff is succeeded by M. de Giers, who is believed to be of a pacific disposition.

An Attempt to Murder Araby Bey, who was formerly the leader of the discontented Egyptian troops but who is now a member of the Egyptian administration, was reported last week. Sixteen Circassian officers were arrested for taking part in the plot. They were actuated by dissatisfaction at non-promotion. According to an official version of the plot the government had been aware for the past ten days of the existence of discontent among the Circassian officers, of whom only forty were with their colors. The officers had intended to petition the government in regard to promotion, and if unsuccessful to kill Araby Bey. One of them having turned informer nineteen others were summoned on various pretexts to the Ministry of War, where they were immediately arrested. Several carried concealed arms. Nearly all subsequently confessed that they were concerned in the plot.

The Insurrection in Herzegovina is Reported as having been suppressed, and it is stated that an amnesty will be granted to those who lay down their arms and return to their lands. A correspondent in Herzegovina writing to the London Times says: "From Crivoscie all is reported quiet, except about Cervice, where the troops exchange occasionally shots at long range with the remains of the insurgent bands which linger in the higher parts of the territory on the border of Crivoscie and Herzegovina. Above all, they haunt the former, which borders on Montenegro. They seem to have made their preparations beforehand for the eventuality of being driven from their position and to have collected provisions and supplies of ammunition."

A New Scheme for the Pacification of Ireland has been propounded by the leaders of the Conservative Party in England. They propose that the State shall purchase the estates of all landowners who are willing to sell on the basis of twenty-one years of the judicial rent, land debentures bearing 4 per cent interest being issued to the sellers, the State guaranteeing payment of the debentures at maturity, and the surplus of the Irish Church fund being made a part of the guarantee. It is probable that the amount of actual cash required from the Treasury would be comparatively small, as the debentures would be as good as government bonds, and would be gladly accepted by the landlords. The amount of money needed would, it is stated, be about one hundred million dollars, and probably would fall below that sum. It is proposed to deal with the arrears of rent on the same principle, the State advancing money to pay off part and the landlord remitting the remainder.

Professor Goldwin Smith has Taken upon himself to express the opinion of Americans on the Irish question. In a letter to the London Times, Professor Smith says that if the British Legislature and people would handle the Irish question with vigor their determination would be applauded by nobody more than the great mass of the American people as distinguished from the politicians. He recommends the abolition of jury trial in agrarian cases, the collection of fair rents by summary process, the suppression of representation of rebel districts, the suppression of the murderous press, and special legislation concerning foreign emissaries, they and their governments being given to fully understand their position and the liabilities they incur. Professor Smith has never been remarkable for judicious utterance, and in this instance it would have been more seemly had he stated his own opinions without attempting to pose as the representative of Americans, who would be little likely, if they needed a representative in this matter, to select a man of Professor Smith's character.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon is once more Prostrated by a severe attack of rheumatic gout, which is far more serious than was anticipated on March 9th, when the announcement of his renewed indisposition was first made to the Tabernacle congregation. Sunday evening, March 12th, was the service from which, by request, the members of his church absented themselves to make room for "strangers," and long before the time announced for commencing the service, the huge edifice was crammed in every part. Mr. Fullerton read the following letter from Mr. Spurgeon: "I am more disappointed than any one of you when I cannot address you to-night. It is always a great pleasure to me to see new faces that fill the Tabernacle in these open meetings. I feel it an honor and a privilege to preach Christ among a fresh circle of friends. But, alas! I cannot even leave my couch or stand." It is not likely that the sufferer will be able to leave the house for some weeks.

The Death of Mrs. Henry H. Jessup, wife of the Rev. Henry H. Jessup, D.D., and daughter of the late David S. Dodge, occurred after a short illness at Beirut, Syria, on April 5th. She was born at Hartford, Conn., in October, 1836, and she came to New York in 1849. In 1858 she was married to Dr. Jessup, the eminent missionary to Syria, and a short time afterward started for Beirut, where she has since been engaged in missionary work.

THE LATE MR. HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW AND SCENES FROM HIS POEMS.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

The Mission of the Poet—Longfellow's Influence—Lineage and Birth—Early Life—His first Professorship—Invited to Harvard—Marriage—Settlement at Cragie House—A Tragic Death—Illness and Death—His Love for Children—Present of a Chair from the Wood of the Chestnut Tree—Selections from his Poems.

THE allusion to the poets of Greece incorporated in the sermon the Apostle Paul delivered on Mars Hill was as significant as it was wisely timed. He had a twofold mission there—on the one hand to declare to the Athenians an unknown God whom they worshipped in ignorance, and on the other to teach them how they might become in very deed the sons of God—a conception of their own poets. "We are His offspring," said the apostle, and he reminded them that the fact had been so stated by the poets. It has been ever so. The poet, from his higher region of thought, has been able to see grander and nobler truths than the toiler in the world's business, and he has found his true mission in seeking to raise his fellows to his altitude and to inspire them with his impulses. It is not for him to concoct money-making schemes, to invent labor-saving appliances, or to teach political economy; but if he can lead men to look above the sordid aims and the grovelling pursuits of life to something nobler, if less tangible, he will have rendered them a better service than if he had taught them something of commercial value. Such was the mission to which the eminent man, whose death the nation mourns to-day, consecrated his life. Of the way to make money, the supreme object of the world's thoughts, he had nothing to say; he had no story to tell of the lives of vicious men, no picture to paint in glowing colors of the delights of sinful pleasure; but, realizing the trials, the temptations, and the sorrows of his fellow-man, he set himself to the task of a helper, and labored to teach them that "Life is real! Life is earnest!

And the grave is not its goal;
'Dust thou art, to dust returnest,'
Was not spoken to the soul.

"Not enjoyment, and not sorrow,
Is our destined end or way;
But to act, that each to-morrow
Find us farther than to-day."

And while the weary traveller on life's highway, stricken and buffeted and toiling through the years under heavy burdens, groaned beneath his lot, the voice of the sympathetic poet brought solace to his heart by the words:

"The dawn is not distant,
Nor is the night starless;
Love is eternal!
God is still God, and
His faith shall not fail us;
Christ is eternal!"

Who can tell the extent of the healthful influence his life and works have exerted on his generation and on generations following! It becomes us, as citizens of this great nation, to humbly thank the Giver of every good gift that the poet whose works have gone into the homes of this wide land, and have been read by young and old, was a man of so pure a life, and whose teachings were so elevating in their tendency.

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow was born February 27th, 1807. His birthplace was a plain wooden house on the very edge of the sea. Two States divide the honor of claiming him among their citizens, for the city of Portland, in which he was born, though now in Maine, was at the time of his birth included in the State of Massachusetts. He came of such a lineage as he most highly esteemed. His ancestors were not lords or dukes, but men of sterling character and in most cases of distinguished piety. His mother was descended from John Alden, one of the Mayflower Pilgrims; and his father, Stephen Longfellow, who was one of the leaders of the Maine bar and a member of the National Congress, and who enjoyed the honorable title of "the honest lawyer," was also descended from the Puritan stock. Longfellow himself was named after his mother's brother, Lieutenant Henry Wadsworth, a gallant officer of the U. S. Navy, who lost his life about two years before the poet's birth, during an action near Tripoli. In 1807 the family removed to a brick house in Portland which was formerly occupied by General Peleg Wadsworth, the maternal grandfather of the poet, he having vacated it to settle on some land at Hiram, granted him for military services.

Of the poet's childhood little is known. The first school he entered was a private school in Portland kept by a Mme. Fellows. The next was the town school, but in this he studied only a week or two when he was placed in another private establishment, and eventually in the Portland Academy, where one of his teachers was Jacob Abbott. When he had reached the age of fourteen he entered Bowdoin College, of which his father was then a trustee, and it is thought that his health must have been delicate, for it is certain that he passed a great part of his freshman year at home. Some of his classmates, like himself, became afterward distinguished, among them Nathaniel Hawthorne, George B. Cheever, and John S. C. Abbott. Franklin Pierce, afterward President of the United States, was also a student of the college in the same term, though not in the same class as Longfellow.

COLLEGE DAYS

Longfellow became known as a writer of poetry. It is not known what was his earliest production, but in his published works seven appear which were written before he attained the age of nineteen, and it is probable that many other fugitive pieces were produced during the same period which are now lost. He made considerable progress in his studies while at Bowdoin, and when he graduated his place was second in honors. A reporter of the New York Times received from the venerable Professor A. S. Packard an interesting account of the youthful days of the future poet. He describes the young freshman as an attractive youth with auburn locks, just entering the last half of his fifteenth year, with clear, fresh, blooming complexion, well-bred manners, and sedate bearing. "I recall," he says, "the appearance of a few of that class of 1825 as they sat in the old class-room of Maine Hall—Bradbury, Josiah Stover Little, Hawthorne, the Longfellow, Shepley, and others. I cannot testify concerning Longfellow any more than a general statement of his unblemished character as a pupil and a true gentleman in all his relations to the college and its teachers."

Professor Packard adds that it is a college tradition that in his sophomore year, at the annual examination of his class, the version of an ode of Horace, which it fell to him to render, so impressed the Hon. Benjamin Orr, of the Committee of Examination, that when the new Professorship of Modern Languages was established, his recollection of that specimen of the young sophomore's taste and scholarship led him to propose him for the position. Shortly after his graduation Mr. Longfellow accordingly was offered the Professorship of Modern Languages, and it is as a teacher that Professor Packard especially remembers him. "He approved himself a teacher who never wearied of his work. He won, by his gentle grace, and commanded respect by his self-respect and his respect for his office, never allowing an infringement of the decorum of the recitation-room. The department was a new one, and in lack of suitable text-books he prepared a translation of a popular French grammar which went through several editions, an Italian grammar, and Spanish tales for the class-room."

Longfellow was then 19 years of age, but before he entered upon his duties he was allowed to go abroad that he might the better qualify himself for the duties of the place. He was in Europe three and a half years, spending the time in England, France, Spain, Germany, and Italy. He returned in 1829, and at once began his work. Professor Packard's recollection of the young man's character is confirmed by the fact that the freshman class numbered fifty-two, a number unprecedented at Bowdoin.

In 1831 Longfellow was married to Mary S. Potter, a daughter of Judge Barrett Potter, of Portland, who lived only four years after the marriage. This period at Bowdoin also witnessed the first volume that Mr. Longfellow ever published. It was the "Coplas de Don Jorge Manrique." His writings up to this time had, however, been considerable for a young man of 26. Poems printed and reprinted in the newspapers had already carried his name far out of Maine. Some of the best of these were "An April Day," "Autumn," "Woods in Winter," "Hymn of the Moravian Nuns at Bethlehem," "Sunrise on the Hills," "The Spirit of Poetry," and "The Burial of the Minnisink," all of which still occupy a place in his published works. He had written prose, also, for the North American Review, which was then the highest honor to which he could have aspired as a writer for the serial press. He also contributed to the Knickerbocker Magazine. At this time also appeared "Oltre Mer" and "Hyperion."

In 1839 the fugitive poems originally published in newspapers and magazines were gathered up and issued in a volume by the title of "Voices of the Night." It included besides the "Copas de Manrique" and translations, eight short poems. These were "Hymn to the Night," "A Psalm of Life," "The Reaper and the Flowers," "The Light of Stars," "Footsteps of Angels," "Flowers," "The Beleaguered City," and "Midnight Mass for the Dying Year." These soon became popular, and they still remain among his best-known poems. It is with a sad interest associated with the venerable head recently laid low that we now read

"There is a Reaper, whose name is Death,
And with his sickle keen,
He reaps the bearded grain at a breath
And the flowers that grow between."

The success of Mr. Longfellow's career as a professor at Bowdoin attracted general attention, and when the Professorship of Modern Languages in Harvard University became vacant by the resignation of Mr. George Ticknor, it was offered to and cordially accepted by Mr. Longfellow. Again before entering on his duties he went abroad, this time with the view of studying the languages of Holland, Sweden, and Norway. It was while making a short stay at Rotterdam that Mrs. Longfellow was seized with an illness which proved fatal. It was of her that the poet wrote the lines now so well known in his "Footsteps of Angels," descriptive of his reveries as he sat in the twilight "Ere the evening lamps are lighted," and "the forms of the departed enter at the open door":

"And with them the Being Beauteous,
Who unto my youth was given,
More than all things else to love me,
And is now a saint in Heaven.

"With a slow and measured footstep
Comes that messenger divine,
Takes the vacant chair beside me,
Lays her gentle hand in mine."

Sorely cast down, the bereaved husband turned his steps homeward, and after paying a brief visit to his native city he went to

at which place he resided until the time of his death.

An amusing account is related of the circumstances of his first residing at Cragie House, where he spent his future life. He had not been long in Cambridge when he went to the Cragie House, hoping to get lodgings there. This house, during the war of the Revolution, had for a time been Washington's head-quarters. Mrs. Cragie concluding from the young professor's youthful appearance that he was a student, bluntly told him she would "lodge students no longer," but on learning that he was not a student, but a professor, she decided to take him. He was shown a room in the north-eastern corner of the second floor, in which Washington used to sleep, and concluded that it would suit his purpose. Mrs. Cragie died in 1843, and the poet then bought the property. It has ever since been his home. He married in that same year Frances Elizabeth Appleton, a daughter of the Hon. Nathan Appleton, of Boston. Two sons and three daughters were born to them in this house. The Harvard professorship was continued for nineteen years, when Mr. Longfellow resigned, to give himself up exclusively to literary production. Since 1839, when "Voices of the Night" appeared, every few there was issued a collection of Mr. Longfellow's shorter poems. The "Ballads" appeared in 1841, the "Poems on Slavery" in 1842, "The Seaside and the Wayside Inn," in 1846; "The Seaside and the Wayside Inn," in 1846; "Birds of Passage," in 1858; "Keramos," and other poems, in 1878; "Utima Thule," in 1880. Besides these were longer poems, which, although not so popular as those above mentioned, bore marks of the true genius. These are "The Spanish Student," published in 1843; "Evangeline," in 1847, "The Legend," in 1851, "Hiawatha," in 1855, "The Courtship of Miles Standish" in 1858, "The Ship" in 1870, "The New England Tragedies" in 1872, and "The Hanging of the Crane" in 1874; "Morituri Salutamus," read at the fiftieth anniversary of his class at Bowdoin College, 1875; later the same year, "Masque of Pandora."

An event which clouded the later years of the life was the tragic death of his second wife. He was in the act of sealing a letter when the taper she held in her hand set fire to the muslin dress she wore, and in a few moments she was wrapped in flame. Mr. Longfellow rushed to her side and succeeded in extinguishing the fire, but the gentle lady was so severely burned that she died shortly afterward in excruciating pain. Her death was a shock from which Mr. Longfellow never wholly recovered.

After the resignation of the Harvard professorship, Mr. Longfellow continued to reside at Craigie House, which became the centre of attraction to a host of distinguished friends. His two sons, John and Charles, and his three daughters, Edith (R. H. Dana), Alice and Annie were constant at his side, and the home at Cambridge was a place of domestic happiness.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

A few months ago he had a severe attack of rheumatism, and it left him shaken and very weak. On the 18th last he was tempted by the brightness of the spring sunshine to venture out for a short walk.

But the day was treacherous, gusts of wind blew, and the aged poet returned to the house chilled to the bones. He was feverish during the night, and the next day peritonitis was declared. He sank into a stupor from which he never rallied, and on Friday, March 24th, surrounded by his children and most intimate friends, the great man peacefully breathed his last.

More finished, rounded life has seldom been known in our annals. He had passed the limit assigned to the generality of men. Seventy winters had gently shed their snows on his head. He had in comparatively early life tasted the sweets of popularity. He had been recognized as a heaven-sent bard. He had seen his popularity steadily increase, the number of his readers grow, and their appreciation of him become deeper and closer. He had suffered bitterly, but he had struggled bravely; and the agony that rent his heart he had borne silently, uncomplainingly, and never appealed to the world for help or pity. His children had grown up around him and had found life. One after another of his friends and contemporaries had gone on before. Bryant had died; Hawthorne long since fell asleep; Maynard Taylor he had written a dirge. The sensitive man must have felt himself almost alone, and have had premonitions that his work was done and that his years were numbered. He came to his grave in a full age, like a corn of corn cometh in its season."

While we mourn over his death we cannot fail to realize that in his works he is immortal. That he has done for us he can still do for us and for others. In his own stirring words we can find "Lives of great men all remind us, we can learn our lives sublime," and as we gaze upon the prints he has made, we would fain learn the lesson he was ever ready to teach.

It is a touching and deeply significant fact that among the mourners at the tomb of Longfellow there are none more sincere than the children. The news of his death was accompanied by the following words, "The sorrow of the children is remarkable; they all loved him." A correspondent of the New York Herald, alluding to this fact, says that the attachment between the poet and the children was mutual. He loved to witness their gambols and listen to their innocent, cheerful prattle, and he had always a kind word, a pleasant smile, and a paternal pat for the most ragged urchin he met. They all knew him and loved him. His long white hair and beard, his benevolent face, and bright, laughing look captured their little hearts, and those who could read, had a fascination for such of his poems as came within the range of their intellectual grasp.

Three years ago the school children of Cambridge presented him with a handsomely carved chair made out of immortalized in his poem, "The Village Blacksmith." The design of the chair is very pleasing, and in perfect keeping, the color is a dead black, an effect produced by ebonizing the wood. The upholstery of the arms and the cushions is in green leather; the casters are glass balls set in sockets; in the back of the chair is a circular piece of exquisite carving, consisting of horse-chestnut leaves and blossoms, and horse-chestnut leaves and burrs are presented in varied combinations at other points. Around the seat, in raised German text, are the following lines from the poem:

And children coming home from school
Look in at the open door,
And catch the burning sparks that fly
Like chaff from a threshing floor.

Underneath the cushion is a brass plate, on which is the following inscription:

To the author of the "Village Blacksmith."

This chair, made from the wood of the spreading chestnut tree, is presented as an expression of grateful regard and veneration by the children of Cambridge, who, with their friends, join in best wishes and congratulations on this anniversary. February 27, 1879.

This the distinguished poet prized as the richest trophy won by his pen. He wrote a touching little poem in response, which every schoolchild in Cambridge learned by heart. He loved to sit in it and showed it to strangers who visited him, just as he did the old clock on the stairs and his numerous souvenirs from abroad.

So universally have Longfellow's poems been read by his admiring fellow-citizens that it is unnecessary to make extended quotations from them. They are familiar in our mouths as household words, but we may be permitted to make a few selections which have formed the subject of the illustrations in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A picture on our front page gives artistic embodiment to "The Slave in the Dismal Swamp," in whose dark fens, as described in his Poem on "Slavery,"

"The hunted Negro lay;
He saw the fire of the midnight camp,
And heard at times a horse's tramp
And a bloodhound's distant bay.
"Where hardly a human foot could pass,
Or a human heart would dare,
On the quaking turf of the green morass
He crouched in the rank and tangled grass,
Like a wild beast in his lair."

JOHN ALDEN AND PRISCILLA.

From "The Courtship of Miles Standish" we have selected two episodes for illustration. The panel on our front page represents a matrimonial embassy under somewhat interesting and unique circumstances. Miles Standish, the Puritan captain of the Mayflower colony, is enamored of the worth and beauty of a maiden named Priscilla. His "friend and household companion" was a fair-haired, azure-eyed youth, named John Alden, Longfellow's ancestor, "Youngest of all was he of the men who came in the 'Mayflower.'" He, too, regards Priscilla affectionately. One day, while reading "Julius Cæsar," he came across the record of that martial hero's achievement, when seizing a shield from a soldier, he put himself at the head of his troops, and behaved so valorously that his men, animated by his example, won the day.

Whereupon the sturdy Captain Standish exclaimed—

"That's what I always say; if you wish a thing to be well done,
You must do it yourself, you must not leave it to others!"

There was one thing, however, which Miles Standish could not do for himself. He cherished the thought of asking "the damsel Priscilla, the loveliest maiden of Plymouth," to be his wife, but he had not the courage to do so. He, therefore, confides his heart's secret to his youthful friend, John Alden, and commissions him to go to the lady and "offer the hand and heart of a soldier." Trying to smile he stammered out the answer—

"Such a message as that, I am sure I should mangle and mar it;
If you would have it well done—I am only repeating your maxim—
You must do it yourself, you must not leave it to others!"

But the captain is not to be moved from his purpose, friendship prevailed over love, and Alden went on his errand. As he drew near the house, he heard the musical voice of Priscilla—

"Singing the hundredth Psalm, the grand old Puritan anthem, Music that Luther sang to the sacred words of the Psalmist, Full of the breath of the Lord, consoling and comforting many."

He opened the door, and the maiden was seen busy with her wheel, carding wool, and on her lap lay the well-worn Psalm-book, from which she had been singing. Priscilla, aroused by his step on the threshold, rose as he entered, and gave him her hand, in signal of welcome, saying,

"I knew it was you, when I heard your step in the passage;
For I was thinking of you, as I sat there singing and spinning."

In the course of conversation about old times and old scenes in England, the opportunity at length arrives for John to make the "offer and proffer of marriage," for Miles Standish, "Mute with amazement and sorrow," Priscilla looked into Alden's face, and presently exclaimed—

"If the great Captain of Plymouth is so very eager to wed me, Why does he not come himself, and take the trouble to woo me?"

Alden's explanations only make matters worse, and Priscilla refuses the Captain's suit. But unheeding her words, he continued to urge the cause of his friend—

"And as he warned and glowed, in his simple and eloquent language, Quite forgetful of self, and full of praise of his rival,
Archly the maiden smiled, and with eyes over-running with laughter,
Said, in a tremulous voice, 'Why don't you speak for yourself, John?'"

The well-known poem supplies the details which fill up the interval between the scene just described and the festivities which our picture represents on page 268. In a great fight with the Indians, Miles Standish is reported to be among the slain. But on the wedding morn of Priscilla and Alden, just as the service was ended,

"... a form appeared on the threshold, Clad in armor of steel, a sombre and sorrowful figure!"

It was the Captain himself, who pressing forward, grasped the bridegroom's hand, and renewed the old friendship between them. And now Alden,

"... Brought out his snow-white steer,
Covered with crimson-cloth, and a cushion placed for a saddle.
Gaily, with joyous laugh, Priscilla mounted her palfrey.
Onward the bridal procession now moved to their new habitation,
Happy husband and wife, and friends conversing together."

From among the "Tales of a Wayside Inn," we have selected for illustration that of

AFTER each series of long evangelistic services it has been my custom to be absent for some ten days for the purpose of physical recuperation, and during this last absence I have had a most delightful time, and I bring to you salutations from the cities of the South—from Charleston, and Savannah, and Augusta, and many of the most delightful regions of the southern clime.

We started with a small garden of flowers to return, but the flowers withered, and part of them we dropped at the margin of Georgia, and others we threw away at the boundary of North Carolina, and the others at the end of the State of Virginia, and by the time we arrived home all the flowers had perished, but the fragrance of Southern hospitality and kindness can never die, and I shall remember to the last hour of my life the kindness and the geniality of the vast multitudes of people I met during this recent absence. And now it is a great joy again to stand before you and present the lessons of the great Gospel.

In the palace of wicked King Jeroboam there is A SICK CHILD, a very sick child. Medicines have failed. Skill is exhausted. Young Abijah, the prince, has lived long enough to become very popular, and yet he must die unless some supernatural aid be afforded. Death comes up the broad stairs of the palace and swings back the door of the sick room of royalty, and stands looking at the dying prince with the dart uplifted.

Wicked Jeroboam knows that he has no right to ask anything of the Lord in the way of kindness. He knows that his prayer would not be answered, and so he sends his wife on the delicate and tender mission to the prophet of the Lord in Shiloh. Putting aside her royal attire, she put on the garb of a peasant woman and starts on the road. Instead of carrying gold and gems, as she might have carried, from the palace, she carries only those gifts which seem to indicate that she belongs to the peasantry—a few loaves of bread and a few cracknels and a cruse of honey. Yonder she goes, hooded and veiled, the greatest lady in all the kingdom, yet passing unobserved. No one that meets her on the highway has any idea that she is the first lady in all the land. She is a queen in disguise.

The fact is that Peter the Great, working in the dry docks of Saardam—the sailor's hat and the shipwright's axe gave him no more thorough disguise than the garb of the peasant woman gave to the Queen of Tirzah. But the prophet of the Lord saw the deceit. Although his physical eyesight had failed he was divinely illumined and at one glance he looked through the imposition, and he cried out: "Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam. Why feignest thou thyself to be another? I have evil tidings for thee. Get thee back to thy house, and when thy feet touch the gate of the city the child shall die."

She had a right to ask for the recovery of her son; she had no right to practice an imposition. Broken hearted she started on the way, the tears falling on the dust of the road all the way from Shiloh to Tirzah. Broken hearted, now she is not careful any more to hide her queenly gait and manner. True to the prophecy, the moment her feet touch the gate of the city, the child dies. As she goes in, the soul of the child goes out. The cry in the palace is joined by the lamentation of a nation, and as they carry good Abijah to his grave the air is filled with the voice of eulogy for departed worth and the groan of an afflicted kingdom.

It is for no insignificant purpose that I present you this morning, the thrilling story of the text.

I. In the first place, I learn that

WICKEDNESS INVOLVES OTHERS, trying to make them its dupes, its allies and its scapegoats. Jeroboam proposed to hoodwink the Lord's prophet. How did he do it? Did he go and do the work himself? No. He sent his wife to do it. Hers the peril of exposure, hers the fatigue of the way, hers the execution of the plot. His nothing. Iniquity is a brag, but it is a great coward. It lays the plan, gets some one else to execute it; puts down the gunpowder train, gets some one else to touch it off; contrives mischief, gets some one else to work it; starts the lie, gets some one else to circulate it. In nearly all the great crimes of the world, it is found out that those who planned the arson, the murder, the theft, the fraud, go free, while those who were decoyed and cheated and hoodwinked into the conspiracy, clank the chain and mount the gallows.

Aaron Burr, with heart filled with impurity and ambition, plots for the overthrow of the United States Government, and gets off with a few threats and a little censure, while Blennerhassett, the learned Blennerhassett, the sweet-tempered Blennerhassett, is decoyed by him from the orchards and the laboratories and the gardens and the home on the banks of the Ohio River, and his fortunes are scattered, and he is thrown into prison, and his family, brought up in luxury, are turned out to die. Abominable Aaron Burr has it comparatively easy; sweet-tempered Blennerhassett has it hard.

Benedict Arnold proposed to sell out the forts of the United States army, to surrender the Revolutionary army and to destroy the United States Government. He gets off with his pocket full of pounds sterling, while Major André, the brave and the brilliant, is decoyed into the conspiracy and suffers on the gibbet on the banks of the Hudson; so that even the tabature, the marble tabature that commemorated that event, has been recently blasted by midnight desperadoes. Benedict Arnold has it easy, Major André has it hard.

I have noticed that nine-tenths of those who suffer for crimes are merely the satellites of some great villains. Ignominious fraud is a juggler which by sleight of hand and legerdemain makes the gold that it stole appear in somebody else's pocket. Jeroboam plots the lie, contrives the imposition, and gets his wife to execute it. Stand off from all impositions and chicanery. Do not consent to be anybody's dupe, anybody's ally in wickedness, anybody's scapegoat.

II. The story of the text also impresses me with the fact that

ROYALTY SOMETIMES PASSES IN DISGUISE.

The frock, the veil, the hood of the peasant woman hid the queenly character of this woman of Tirzah. Nobody suspected that she was a queen or a princess as she passed by, but she was just as much a queen as though she stood in the palace, her robes encrusted with diamonds. And so all around about us there are princesses and queens whom the world does not recognize. They sit on no throne of royalty, they ride in no chariot, they elicit no huzza, they make no pretence; but by the grace of God they are princesses and they are queens.

Sometimes in their poverty, sometimes in their self-denial, sometimes in their hard struggles of Christian service—God knows they are queens; the world does not recognize them. Royalty passing in disguise. Kings without the crown, conquerors without the palm, Empresses without the jewel. You saw her yesterday on the street. You saw nothing important in her appearance, but she is regnant over a vast realm of virtue and goodness—a realm vaster than Jeroboam ever looked at.

You went down into the homes of destitution and want and suffering. You saw the story of trial written on the wasted hand of the mother, on the pale cheeks of the children, on the empty tray, on the fireless hearth, on the broken ture in the house. But by the grace of God a princess. The overseers of the poor there and discuss the case, and say: "It is a pauper." They do not realize that God has nished for her a crown, and that after she has through the fatiguing journey from Tirzah Shiloh, and from Shiloh back to Tirzah, there be a throne of royalty on which she shall re ever.

Glory veiled. Affluence hidden. Eternal tures hushed up. A queen in mask. A pri in disguise. When you think of a queen, y not think of Catharine of Russia, or Theresa of Germany, or Mary Queen of S When you think of a queen you think of a woman who sat opposite to your father a table, or walked with him down the path o arm in arm—sometimes to the Thanksgiving quet, sometimes to the grave, but always si side; soothing your little sorrows, adjusting little quarrels, listening to your evening p toiling with the needle or at the spinning-w and on cold nights tucking you up snug and v and then on that dark day when she lay ad putting those thin hands that had toiled for y long, putting them together in a dying pi commending you to that God in whom she taught you to trust. O! she was the queer was the queen!

You cannot think of her now without havin deepest emotions of your soul stirred, and yor as if you could cry as though you were now s in infancy on her lap; and if you could call her to speak your name with the tenderness with v she once spoke, you would be willing now to t yourself on the sod that covers her grave, cry "Mother, mother!" Ah!

SHE WAS THE QUEEN.

Your father knew it. You knew it. She wa queen, but the queen in disguise. The worl not recognize it. But there was a grander dis ing.

The Favorite of a great house looked out o window of His palace and He saw that the p were carrying heavy burdens and that son them were hobbling on crutches, and He saw lying at the gate exhibiting their sores, and He heard their lamentation and He said: " just put on the clothes of those poor people, will go down, and I will see what their so are, and I will sympathize with them, and I w one of them, and I will help them." Well, th came for Him to start. The lords of the land to see Him off. All who could sing joined i parting song which shook the hills and wol the shepherds.

The first few nights He has been sleeping the hostlers and the camel drivers, for no knew there was a king in town. He went at the doctors of the law, astounding them, for out any doctor's gown He knew more law tha doctors. He fished with the fishermen, He s with His own hammer in the carpenter's sho ate raw corn out of the field, He fried fis the banks of Genessaret, He was howled a crazy people in the tombs, He was splashed c surf of the sea. A pilgrim without any pillar sick man without any medicament. A mot with no sympathetic bosom in which He c pour His tears. Disguise complete.

I know that occasionally His divine ro flashed out, as when in the storm on Galilee, the red wine at the wedding banquet, as whe freed the shackled demoniac of Gadara, as v He turned a whole school of fish into the n the discouraged boatmen; as when He thro life into the shrivelled arm of the paralytic; bu the most part He was in disguise.

No one saw the king's jewels in His sa No one saw the royal robe in His plain coat. No one knew that that shelterless Christ owned al mansions in which the hierarchs of Heaven their habitation. No one knew that that hung Christ owned all the olive groves and all the vests which shook their gold on the hills of P tine. No one knew that He who said, "I thi Omniscience hidden in a human Infinite love beating in a human heart. asting harmonies subdued into a human Royalty en masque. Grandeurs of Heaven thly disguise.

THE MASKS TORN OFF.

My subject also impresses me with how e put on masks and how the Lord tears off. It was a terrible moment in the history is woman of Tirzah when the prophet ac- d her, practically saying, "I know who you you cannot cheat me; you cannot impose me; why feignest thou thyself to be an- ?" She had a right to ask for the restoration r son; she had no right to practice that ood. It is never right to do wrong.

ometimes you may conceal an affair; it is not sary to tell everything. There is a natural ure to the lips which seems to indicate that e sometimes is right; but for double dealing, oral shuffling, for counterfeit and for sham as nothing but anathema and exposure. They may rear t fortunes, but their dapple grays will be st on the road some day as was the ass by angel of God with drawn sword. The light of last day will shine through all such subterfuges, with a voice louder than that which accosted imposition of the text, "Come in, thou wife eroboani; why feignest thou thyself to be her?" with a voice louder than that, God will der down into midnight darkness and doom death all two-faced men and all charlatans and all knaves, and all jockeys, and all swindlers. Be- hold how the people put on the masks, and behold how the Lord tears them off!

PRECISE PROVIDENCES.

IV. My subject also impresses me with how precise and accurate and particular are God's provi- dences. Just at the moment that woman entered the city the child died. Just as it was prophesied, so it turned out, so it always turns out. The sick- ness comes, the death occurs, the nation is born, the despotism is overthrown at the appointed time. God drives the universe with a stiff rein. Events do not just happen so. Things do not go slipshod. In all the book of God's providences there is not one if. God's providences are never caught in dishabille.

To God there are no surprises, no disappoint- ments, and no accidents. The most insignificant event flung out in the ages is the connecting link between two great chains, the chain of eternity past and the chain of eternity to come. I am no fatalist, but I should be completely wretched if I did not feel that all the affairs of my life are in God's hand, and all that pertains to me and mine, just as certainly as all the affairs of this woman of the text, as this child of the text, or this king of the text, were in God's hand.

You may ask me a hundred questions I cannot answer, but I shall until the day of my death be- lieve that I am under the

of God; and the heavens may fall, and the world may burn, and the judgment may thunder, and eternal ages may roll, but not a hair shall fall from my head, not a shadow shall drop on my path, not a sorrow shall transfix my heart without being divinely arranged—arranged by a loving, sym- pathetic Father. He bottles our tears, He catches our sorrows; and to the orphan He will be a Father, and to the widow He will be a husband, and to the outcast He will be a home, and to the most miserable wretch that this day crawls up out of the ditch of his abomination crying for mercy, He will be an all-pardoning God. The rocks shall turn gray with age, and the forests shall be un- moored in the last hurricane, and the sun shall shut its fiery eyelid, and the stars shall drop like blasted figs, and the continents shall go down like anchors in the deep, and the ocean shall heave its last groan and lash itself with expiring agony, and the world shall wrap itself in winding sheets of flame and leap on the funeral pyre of the judgment day, but

GOD'S LOVE SHALL NOT DIE.

It will kindle its suns after all other lights have gone out. It will be a billowing sea after the last ocean has wept itself away. It will warm itself by the fire of a consuming world. It will sing while the archangel's trumpet is pealing forth and the air is filled with the crash of broken sepulchres, and the rush of the wings of the rising dead! O my God, comfort me and comfort all this people with this Christian sentiment!

Mr. Henry M. Stanley, the Eminent African explorer, has written a letter which has been pub- lished in the Boston Journal. The letter is dated from the Congo on January 16th, and in it Mr. Stan- ley states that the expedition is prospering, and he hopes to accomplish the object of it this year. This is Mr. Stanley's third expedition to Africa, and it was begun with the intention of opening a way to the heart of Africa along the Congo River, which falls into the Atlantic Ocean about 6° south of the Equator. Mr. Stanley went to Sierra Leone in September, 1879. He took with him up the Congo three lieutenants, and a body of sev- enty men, all armed with the best modern rifles and supplied with all the necessary tools for their work. The course of the river is a succession of rapids and waterfalls, and it could be rendered navigable only by the erection of not less than 113 locks. Mr. Stanley's avowed object, however, is to place steamers on the navigable parts and to build roads around the rapids. The expedition has, of course, made slow progress toward the in- terior. One of the first roads made was at an angle of 60° over very steep mountains. Through- out May, 1881, Mr. Stanley was so seriously sick that on the fifteenth day of his illness he gave, as he thought, his last orders to his European com- rades. The crisis was passed safely, however, and on July 4th he wrote to England that he was again strong and hearty. The natives have gen- erally treated the expedition with great respect.

A Persian Koord's Conversion.—Mr. Marden, of Zeitoon, relates that a Christian merchant visit- ing Tabreez, Persia, sat one day in his little room at the Khan reading aloud from his Bible. A Moslem Koord had come to the city on business, and was lodging in the next room. His ear had happened to catch the precious words of the Gos- pel through the broken partition, and he listened with intense interest. It was the first time he had ever heard of Christianity. He soon sought an in- terview with the Christian stranger, and on learn- ing the way to salvation he abandoned his faith in the false prophet, and declared himself a Christian. When he returned home he told his friends of his new faith, but they were fanatical Moslems, and sought at once to frighten the poor man back to his former belief. Arguments and threats did not avail, and he was imprisoned in the house of a Koordish chief and tortured. His persecutors, failing to alienate his wife from him, poisoned her. At last a woman from the chief's family came to him with a frightful story of tortures planned for the morrow, and showed him a way of escape dur- ing the night. In the deep darkness of the night, alone with his God, he started out on his dreary exile, and did not stop till he reached Marash, in Central Turkey. Here now for two years, under an assumed name, he has found employment, and, quietly identifying himself with Christians, has won the sympathy and respect of all for his Chris- tian character. He was recently baptized and re- ceived to the Church.

A Highway Robbery was Committed under strange circumstances not long ago in Italy. A gentleman was standing one evening in one of the shadowy arcades of the Coliseum, at Rome, when he was somewhat brusquely hustled by a passing figure. With a quick instinct, he clapped his hand to his watch-pocket. His watch was not there. He darted after the man who had hustled him, who turned sharply round, at the same time clutching a watch. "Give me that watch!" A dash!—the watch was snatched from him, and the startled man disappeared. What was the con- sternation of the gentleman on entering his bed- room, to find that the watch he had in his pocket was not his own, and that his watch, which he had forgotten to put on, was staring him in the face from the mantelpiece! He had been the thief, and the other wretched man had stumbled over him in the dark, and when overtaken and stopped was merely clutching his own watch, which he had not the nerve to rescue from the tourist. That tourist is now styled by his friends the Bandit of the Coliseum. In our judgments of character we may be as much mistaken as he was, and we, in turn, are misjudged by others. Well is it for us if our highest interests are in the hands of One who perfectly understands us (Psalm 139: 1-13).

A Young Lady Sceptic has Been Led to the feet of Christ, through the friendly agency of the Young Women's Christian Association, Finsbury Square, London. One of the workers writes: "She was brought to our meeting. Nothing would turn her from her scepticism—she doubted God's reve- lation. One afternoon I read out a note from a young girl who had attended some meetings of the association in another town; in it she says: 'Do you remember that afternoon when you told us that if there was a poor weary heart there longing for rest, to come just as we were? I heard you, and I said "Then I do come, Lord, if I may, and as I am." And now my burden is gone, and I am so happy.' That simple word was blessed to this sceptical young lady. 'Why,' she said, 'that is just what I am; with all my scepticism I have no rest.' She fell upon her knees, saying, 'Lord, I must come, I do come; Thou art my Lord, my Saviour.' From that time her life became entirely changed. She has been the means of the conver- sion of her servant, then of her married sister, who was even more sceptical than herself. Both are now influencing the other members of the family."

SYLPH SOMERS.

A New Serial Story, by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

Captain Vaughan Advised to Disguise Himself—His Refusal—A Walk up the Hill—Corny Seized as a Rebel—His Protests Disregarded—Threatened with Death—Capt. Vaughan's Intervention—Capt. Vaughan Again a Prisoner—A Stupid Corporal—Appeal to the Authorities—Matched Under Guard to Gorey.

THE country Captain Vaughan and Sylph Somers passed through on their route to Gorey was deserted and desolate. All the bonds of law were broken; all the restraints and amenities of civilized life were thrown aside; violence, and savagery, and havoc had been abroad; and the whole region, as though Heaven-forsaken and cursed, seemed dumb-stricken and mourning; and bearing the fruit of insurrection and civil war.

Farmer Dunne, with whom Captain Vaughan had been domiciled, and whose favor he had won, had wished him very much upon starting to take off his officer's uniform, and put on instead a suit of his own, consisting of a blue swallow-tailed coat, yellow waistcoat, and knee breeches, to be surmounted with a peaked felt, broad-brimmed hat.

"It's as much as your life is worth, Captain," he said; "to be seen in that shako and red coat. If any o' Father John's min war to spot ye, they'd be doun on ye like wolves, and id show ye no marcy. I tell you what. Yer about my size, Sir; dub me Sunday shuit, and never a won 'ill guess who or what ye are; fur I feel shure even yer own mother wouldn't know ye."

This was Captain Vaughan's own belief. Mr. Dunne's Sunday suit would, indeed, work upon him, a complete metamorphosis; not one, however, altogether flattering. He smiled as he saw in imagination the ridiculous figure he would cut; and one, too, which Sylph would look upon. Why, it would supply food forever after for inextinguishable laughter. No, he would retain his military costume. This would preserve his self-respect; and, besides, would more accord with his soldierly pride and courage. "No, Mr. Dunne," he said; "I thank you much for your kind offer, I am sure you mean it well; but I'll keep to the garb I have. It is likely no disguise would save me if we fall in with the rebels; and if I am to die, I'll die for what I am—the King's officer." In this matter Captain Vaughan set a good example to professing Christians not to be ashamed of Christ's livery which they wear, but to retain it, as loyal soldiers, at all hazards, even though it may cost them their life.

"Any way, take this wid ye," cried the farmer, as Captain Vaughan was hurrying off to the cart on the road, in which sat Sylph impatiently waiting for him. "What ye have pressed on me for yer board and lodging, sur, will also well pay for it," saying which he threw over the Captain's shoulders a large frieze coat, which if put on would conceal his uniform.

It turned out to be a very fortunate thing that Captain Vaughan did retain his own dress and would not be persuaded by the farmer.

About a mile from Gorey, he and Sylph, feeling greatly fatigued from the constant jolting of the cart, got down upon the road to ease their limbs a little, and they felt encouraged to do this from the absolute quietness for miles of the whole region they had passed through. A rather steep ascent of the road also suggested this change of locomotion.

Feeling stiff when they attempted to walk, the Captain and Sylph lagged behind, and allowed Corny to get a considerable distance before them, and at last lost sight of him as he passed over the brow of the ascent, and hence, for some minutes they were totally ignorant of his subsequent trouble.

Scarcely had Corny got beyond the ken of his mistress, when a corporal of the Antrim Militia and his guard set upon him, surrounding the cart and pointing their bayonets close to Corny's breast.

"Halt there." "Stop yer cart." "Don't budge another inch." "What's yer name?" "Where ar' ye goin'?" "Who owns the baste and the whole consarn?" were commands and questions that came like a flood upon Corny, without a moment's pause for obedience or reply to any one of them.

"Take yer bag'nettes from me stomach, iv ye plaze," cried Corny, "they'll intherfere wid me digestion—and, Mr. Corporal, will ye have the kindness to repate your questions with a reasonable intherval between thim?" Corny's reply may seem rather cool and confident under the circumstances, but he reflected that these men were of the Royalist force, and since he was virtually in the service of an English officer, they would not dare molest him.

"Purshuin' to yer impidine," said the Corporal. "How dare ye spake in that way, ye rebel, to a King's officer, a corporal as ye say, and here in full command?"

"Don't call me a rebel," answered Corny, "don't, fur it goes agin me feelins; and, besides, it isn't the thruth. My name, as ye want to know it, is Corny Fagan, Mr. Corporal, as thrue and loyal a subject o' the King—as ye are yerself."

"Whar's yer pass thim?" shouted the Corporal. "All loyal min about here has a pass; so jist git it out, me man and let us see it."

"A pass," cried Corny, "a pass? I niver h'ard o' sich a thing, barrin' a toll-bar pass, and niver a wan o' thim kind o' things is there between Gorey and Enniscorthy; anyhow, ef there be, sorra a toll-man cum to the fore to ax his toll or give us a ticket."

"Did ye say Enniscorthy?" asked the corporal sharply. "Yes," answered Corny. "And ye've cum from there, have ye?" again enquired the corporal. "Yes, Mr. Corporal, I've jist cum from it," said Corny, little thinking how this answer would compromise him in his interrogator's mind.

"Ye've got no pass, and yer come from Enniscorthy, and yet ye're no rebel," urged the corporal. "Tell it to the horse marines, me man. They may believe ye, but Corporal M'Ardle—that's meself—never will. We're not so soft, Mr. Corny Fagin. You'll be nixt telling uz, I suppose, that ye never sot eyes on Vinegar Hill. Come now, out with it—fur it's no use yer denyin' it—confess at wanst that ye've both seen the hill, and hev been on the hill, and hev been in the company o' the rebels on the hill, and hev been givin' yer presence, more or less, to their doin's. Have you, or have you not? And with no batin' about the bush, answer, fair and square, me questhuns."

Corny had to give an affirmative reply to each of the corporal's queries. He attempted to explain that though it was so, yet he was innocent of disloyalty; but the corporal, confident in his own inferences, would not permit Corny to travel beyond the words "yes" and "no"; and the consequence was he stood forth an undoubted rebel, before the settled convictions of the corporal and his band of militiamen.

"Git down this instant," cried the corporal fiercely, "and kneel there"—and he pointed to a spot on one side the road—"until we shoot ye, ye rebel; and ye may thank yer stars, me man, that it's a shootin' ye're goin' to git—and not a hangin', like a dog—for it's more nor ye desERVE, ye rascal."

"But I'm an officer's sarvant," protested Corny, "at least, I'm doin' dhuty just now for wan; and him and me mistress is only a little bit behind me on the road, and when they cum up they'll soon clear me."

"That only makes it worse and worse," shouted the corporal. "Not only are ye a rebel, ye villain, but, accordin' to yer own showin'—yer sarvin' and comfortin' wan, a chief among the rebels, who has the mischief's own assurance to call himself an officer."

"No, no!" exclaimed Corny; "yer makin' an awful mistake, Mr. Corporal. I assure you you are. The officer I spake of is an English officer. Wan o' the King's Dragoons—no less—whom I've druv in this cart for the last tin miles, hurryin' for the bare life into Gorey—him and his wife, that is to be."

"Ha! ha! ha! Ho! ho! ho!" laughed the corporal at this statement of Corny's—a laugh that was heartily joined in by the corporal's men, to whom, one and all, this assertion of Corny seemed the most absurd thing they had ever tened to.

"Oh! afther that lie," said the corporal, "there's no use in yer sayin' a single word n fur war ye to back it with a thousand and affidavies, I wouldn't believe ye. A dhra officer and his lady a-comin' from Vinegar and more betide, ridin' for tin mile, makin' a Irish cart their coach! Oh, did ye ever hear an outrageous bouncer? Ha! ha! ha! Ho! ho! Begorrah! ye'll be next telling me that F. John Murphy is commandher-in-chief o' the R army. Do ye think I havn't wan ounce o' common sinse, me man?"

"I do; and yer provin' it," boldly replied Corny. "Agin I order ye to git down from that and kneel whar I've towld ye," he commanded angrily. "Come, be quick, fur we can't a-losin' any more time wid ye."

Corny, put to his mettle, declared stoutly he would not alight, and that if they were resolved to murder him, they must do it where he sat; "I warn ye, Mr. Corporal," he said, in a sol tone, "that in killin' me not only will ye bring yees the anger of Heaven, but the just revenge thim whom I have towld ye are me employers."

The corporal's reply to these words was a stant injunction to three of his men to drag Corny to the ground. He was then pushed to the roadside and pressed down upon his knees. Other soldiers took their stand at the opposite side of the road to do the shooting business, and the corporal, with his back towards the cart and horse was about to say the word "fire!" when his arm was grasped, and a voice cried out vehemently, "H Recover arms!"

We need scarcely say that the one to interpose was the corporal's blundering and stupid procedure to rescue poor Corny at the last moment, was Captain Vaughan, who, with Sylph, had reached, at a leisurely pace, the summit of the hill. All at once he took in the dreadful mistake that was being made. Instantaneously he dashed forward to prevent it, and being swift and light of foot, he came upon the corporal—absorbed in carrying out his summary act of justice, as he deemed it—before he was aware of the Captain's approach to him.

Captain Vaughan, however, did not get the sufficient and self-assertive corporal to recognize once his rank and authority. Even the Captain's uniform did not convince him. He knew that the rebels had stripped uniforms from several soldiers of the rank and file whom they had killed, and from slain officers. Might not then, this man's military garb be one of those that had been pilfered, he asked himself, and put on now by a fellow for the purpose of deception. This explanation of Captain Vaughan's appearance seemed to the mind of Corporal M'Ardle a far more rational theory than to believe that a captain of the Royal Dragoons should be travelling from the rebel camp—Vinegar Hill—ensconced for ten miles in a common farm-cart.

Measuring with his eye Captain Vaughan from head to foot, the corporal asked in a testy voice, "Do you know, me man, what yer doin' g sayin' the ordhers o' wan who, on this ground, is no shuperior? This is a corporal's guard, and here commander-in-chief av it."

"Oh, you are," said Captain Vaughan; "thank me, Corporal, that I have saved you from a most criminal abuse of your power."

"No, I don't thank ye," was the reply; "I don't want bit, my Mr. Purtindin' Officer. D' ye think t' come it over me, me man. Yer no officer at all—no King's officer, I mane. I know what ye are, nothin' else nor a massacrein' rebel chief. Here, seize that fellow," he cried to the men; "and when we've shot Corny Fagin, a calls himself, we'll settle accounts with this savin' scoundrel."

"Do not dare to lay a hand upon me," cried the captain, as he waved back the militiamen who came near to arrest him. "I declare myself a perior officer in his Majesty's service; and it is your peril that you touch me."

"I will consent to one thing," he added, "only to one. Take me and this lady" (and turned towards Sylph, who by this time, in great alarm, had come up, "and also this, my man, whom you would criminally shoot, to headquarters in Gorey, and let the authorities there decide who and what we are."

This was a reasonable and just proposal, but it took some time to get the corporal to fall in with it. It would be a transfer of power from his own hands, he felt, and a surrender of his "brief authority." Besides, he was fully assured that Captain Vaughan's representation was false, and that he had got hold of the true merits of the case. A glance at his men, however, convinced the corporal that they were not so sure of his conclusions as he was himself. They hung back at the rebuke of Captain Vaughan—and that with a show of respect—and it was likely they would refuse to obey him if required to proceed to extremities. Corporal M'Ardle, therefore, like a prudent commander, succumbed to circumstances, and drew back.

"It's me firm belief," he said, to Captain Vaughan, "that yer not what ye say, and that yer only takin' a rise out of uz. But as I'm a merciful man, and doesn't want myself to spill yer blood, why I suppose I must take ye and yer man and yer woman into Gorey; but yees 'ill not have the cart to go in. We'll count that our loot, and yees 'ill have to fut it, I can tell yees, every inch o' the road, and undher our close guard too. Here, comrades, form lift and right, and keep a sharp eye on him."

It was no hardship to our friends to go on foot. Indeed, they would have chosen this method of entering the town in any case; but to be marched into Gorey surrounded by bayonets as convicted rebels, aroused the indignation of Captain Vaughan, and he protested against the indignity. The corporal, however, was inexorable. "It's go this way or be shot," he said, "every wan o' yees, so take yer choice."

SUFFERERS BROUGHT TO CHRIST.

S.S. Lesson for May 7, Mark 7: 24-37. Golden Text, ver. 37. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IN the records of our blessed Master's life which we find in the four Gospels, interspersed with deep and most practical teaching we find glorious accounts of His healing power. In our lesson for to-day we find Him going into the borders of Tyre and Sidon; He "entered into an house, and would have no man know it; but He could not be hid." Had it been in our day there would have been no need to get bills out and put advertisements in the papers to say Jesus was coming, words and works of mercy attended His footsteps and proclaimed His presence everywhere. And now, wherever Jesus really is in a human heart or life, the transformation is so great, the influence, not of the person himself, but of Christ within him, is such that it always makes itself felt. Where the presence of Jesus is in a believer all littleness flies, he sees things in a true light, all is real to him according to the measure in which it touches the honor of his God. The presence of Jesus in a man makes him really joyful, he cannot be disturbed by little things, because his faith is in constant exercise, and everything is measured by faith, i.e., by trust in the overruling of God, and not by sight, i.e., the visible circumstances. Of course such a person is continually calm, continually happy, continually victorious, Christ in him

CANNOT BE HID.

Somebody had spoken of Jesus to a certain woman whose young daughter had an unclean spirit, and she came to Him. She did not begin to reason about His power, and consider whether it accorded with her preconceived notions; she did not wait to think whether her coming to Jesus would be taken as a personal offence by the family doctor, or whether her friends would cast her off if she showed any reliance in a Teacher whose doctrine was diametrically opposed to the belief in which she was brought up. She thought but of one thing, her daughter's deliverance, and she was prepared to meet any consequences if only her child was set free. From St. Matthew's Gospel we gather that she had some measure of faith in Jesus as the Son of David, and probably she had attended some of the synagogue services and may have recognized Jesus as the expected Messiah, with a simplicity to which the prejudiced Jews were strangers.

"Have mercy upon me," it was her daughter who needed healing, but she knew doubtless that God had said, "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation" (Ex. 20: 5), and it may be she was conscious of sin in her past life which had given occasion to the enemy to assert his dominion over her daughter. Perhaps that daughter had heard her mother speak unkind, impure, or untrue words, and her own conscience had become seared, so that she justified herself in committing the same sins, and thus the devil, finding the door open, came in and took possession.

Thus the poor mother made her child's case her own, saying, "Have mercy upon me." How many believing mothers ask the prayers of other Christians for the conversion of their children, and wonder they are not answered, when they ought to be making their case their own, and inquiring of the Lord what in them is hindering His answer, what worldly conformity, what self-indulgence, or other hindrance. "But He answered her not a word" (Matt. 15: 24). Was this because He did not choose to be disturbed? Did He think it too bad that His privacy should always be broken in upon? O no, such a reason could never have existed in Him who "pleased not Himself" (Rom. 15: 3).

He said to His disciples who interceded for her, "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." She would not, however, take a refusal. Jesus was exercising her faith for the benefit of the disciples; He knew He could count upon her: He knew that her faith was not dependent upon feelings or circumstances; it was grounded upon what she had heard of Him. Without doubt she had inquired particularly before she placed her case in His hands, whether He was ever known to have refused to undertake a case which was brought to Him, and whether in any case He had undertaken He had failed; and being assured He never had, she drew her own conclusions, and counted on the faithfulness of Him with whom she had to do, despite present appearances. "Lord help me," was her only plea; and He answered, "Let the children first be filled; for it is not meet to take the children's bread, and to cast it unto the dogs."

Would not such words as these discourage her? Must she submit to be called a dog? Yes, gladly, if she might obtain her petition. O how many petitions are lost because we will not take the low place! The place of blessing is always low down, it is "the valley of blessing." When God is going to bless very specially, whether it be a congregation or an individual, He almost invariably brings them down into deep humiliation, deep consciousness of failure, and then He manifests His glory. The woman answered,

"YES, LORD."

O that every child of God would learn to say, "Yes, Lord," at all times, with perfect confidence in His wisdom. "Yes, Lord," when He shows them they are dogs; "Yes, Lord," when He shows them their real unworthiness, whether through the contempt of other people, or through the want of success in their efforts to serve Him, or through the taking away of their physical strength in the midst of great activity in His service. "Yes, Lord," she said, "yet the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs." As though to say, "Let me be a dog, and my portion but a crumb, what I ask for my daughter is such a little exercise of Thy mighty power and love, it is but the children's leavings." And He said, "O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt" (Matt. 15: 28), or "For this saying go thy way; the devil is gone out of thy daughter." Of course when she was come to her house, she found the devil gone out, and her daughter laid upon the bed. Could Jesus say to us, "Great is thy faith," or must He say as He did to Peter, "O thou of little faith?"

On leaving this part of the country, His mission here having been accomplished in this one case of healing, Jesus "came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis." This was the part of the country where the man who had been possessed with a legion of devils went to tell of what Jesus had done for him. (Mark 5.) Here great multitudes came unto Him, "having with them those that were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, and cast them down at Jesus' feet; and He healed them" (Matt. 15: 30). Among these "they bring unto Him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech; and they beseech Him to put His hand upon him. And He took him aside from the multitude, and put His fingers into his ears and He spit, and touched his tongue." There are many in our day who are seeking bodily healing from the Lord Jesus, in answer to the prayer of faith, and who do not obtain it because they are unwilling to be drawn aside from the multitude. It may be, their sickness has been permitted of God on purpose to separate them from some friend who exercises an undue influence over them, or from some work which God would have given up, curtailed, or allowed to pass into other hands; from some business transaction, which does not glorify Him, or which usurps too much time and thought. Or it may be that He is calling some student to renounce his darling hope of excelling others.

IN ORDER TO BE HEALED

a man must consent to be taken aside from the multitude, and so learn the mind of his God that he renounces all plans and projects, and leaves himself absolutely given up to the will of God. Then the Lord cannot but keep His promise, "If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in His sight, and wilt give ear to His commandments, and keep all His statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have put upon the Egyptians; for I am the Lord which healeth thee" (Ex. 15: 26).

Having taken him aside, the Lord "put His fingers into his ears, and He spit, and touched his tongue." For healing and for health, the deaf ear must be brought and remain in contact with Jesus, the tongue which the enemy of souls had bound must come and remain in contact with Jesus. How many there are, spiritually deaf, who hear as though they heard not, never applying that which they hear personally to themselves, they need the touch of Jesus. And O how many there are who are dumb, who cannot speak a word for Jesus, who always say, "I am so reserved," and yet find words to talk about their business, their neighbors, their trials and vexations, their "trying servants" or their exacting masters and mistresses, without a shadow of reserve. They say "I always was nervous," and yet when they are out of temper, their nervousness does not hinder a considerable flow of language. "Oh," they say, "I never could speak about my feelings;" but if anybody leaves a door open, and causes them to be in a draught, this reserve does not hinder an eloquent and vivid expression of their feelings. Alas the dumbness is only on the point where the heart is not engaged; the care that God should have His due has not yet taken possession of their heart, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. 12: 34).

Looking up to heaven He said, "Ephphatha, that is, Be opened. And straightway his ears were opened, and the string of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain." Contact with Jesus, this is the real medicine for the sick in soul, or mind, or body. Complete surrender to Him, complete self-abandonment into His hands, and undoubting faith in His written promises, these are the means whereby that contact with Him may take place. "He charged them that they should tell no man." In His former visit to Decapolis He had charged the man who had the Legion to go home and tell his friends about his deliverance, but now, when the people were all intent to share in the blessing, there was no need for special cases to be mentioned. They disobeyed Jesus, "the more He charged them, so much the more a great deal they published it; and were beyond measure astonished," saying of Him whom they had formerly besought to depart from their coasts, "He hath done all things well; He maketh both the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Two Messages were Sent to Congress by the President last week. In the first the President invites an expression of opinion on the scheme, initiated by Mr. Blaine, of an international American Congress. The message is a somewhat remarkable one, claiming as it does the right of the Executive to invite such a congress, but promising that the President's action in the matter "will be in accord with the opinion of congress in the premises." The invitation has already been issued; it is extended to all the independent countries of North and South America, and invites them to participate in a general congress to be held in the city of Washington on the twenty-second day of November next, for the purpose of considering and discussing the methods of preventing war between the nations of America. It is obvious that with so many differences pending between the powers both in Central and South America, the effect of the proposed congress may be beneficial to an incalculable extent, or it may have the effect of precipitating a war. The President therefore appears desirous that Congress should undertake the responsibility of deciding whether the assembly should take place as proposed.

An Appropriation for Restoring the Mississippi levees is recommended by the President in the second of his two messages. The sum of $1,010,000 was previously recommended, and now the President advises a supplementary appropriation of a like amount. The President says, "The immense losses and widespread suffering of the people dwelling near the river induce me to urge upon Congress the propriety of not only making an appropriation to close the gaps in the levees occasioned by the recent floods, but that Congress should inaugurate measures for the permanent improvement of the navigation of the river and security of the valley. It may be that such a system of improvement would as it progressed require the appropriation of twenty or thirty million dollars. Even such an expenditure, extending as it must over several years, cannot be regarded as extravagant in view of the immense interests involved." The President also explains why the cost of this gigantic undertaking should be borne by the nation at large rather than by the States which are suffering. He says: "The cotton product of the region subject to the devastating floods is a source of wealth to the nation, and of great importance in keeping the balances of trade in our favor. It may not be inopportune to mention that this Government has imposed and collected some seventy million dollars by a tax on cotton, in the production of which the population of the Lower Mississippi is largely engaged, and it does not seem inequitable to return a portion of this tax to those who contributed it, particularly as such an action will also result in an important gain to the country at large, and especially so to the great and rich States of the North-west and the Mississippi Valley."

The Debate in the House of Representatives on the subject of polygamy was closed on Wednesday, April 18th, by a formal vote to exclude George Q. Cannon from the seat he claimed as Delegate from Utah. The numbers on the resolution to admit him were 123 nays, to 79 yeas. A resolution declaring the seat vacant was subsequently passed without a division. Mr. Cannon made a vigorous and impassioned speech in the course of the debate, in which he denounced the anti-polygamy law recently enacted as unconstitutional, and as a measure of religious persecution adopted by timid legislators in deference to fanatical clamor. Mr. Cannon then presented an argument in favor of polygamy, in which he claimed for it the authority of a divine institution, and attempted to justify it as practised in Utah. Mr. Calkins, of Indiana, who closed the debate, delivered a scathing reply to Mr. Cannon's argument, and denounced polygamy as "a crime against civilization and society." We may hope that Congress has now listened for the last time to a polygamist defending polygamy, and that the decisive vote recorded will be accepted in Utah as the final judgment of the nation on its wickedness.

The Attempt to Secure an Immediate Appropriation for the reconstruction of the navy was defeated in the House on April 17th. Mr. Harris, the chairman of the naval committee, gave the House a description of the deplorable state of the navy, which, he said, consisted of thirty-six old ships, rated upon our Naval Register as "ships of war," none of which can ever fire a gun. "We have," Mr. Harris also stated, "a number of others utterly unseaworthy and unfit for service. With the exception of the fourteen iron-clads we have not a ship to-day that would dare to go into battle. The best ship we have is the Trenton, and the next best to this are the sloops of war. We have practically no navy whatever." The House, however, recollecting that during the two terms of General Grant, nearly one hundred and fifty millions had been appropriated to naval expenses, and that in addition the proceeds of sales of discarded stores had been applied to the same purpose, declined to take the bill out of its order under present circumstances. It is understood that the indisposition of the House to vote the appropriation arises from the fact that Mr. Robeson has been placed by the Speaker in a prominent position on the naval committees which would control the expenditure. Mr. Robeson was General Grant's Secretary of the Navy.

A Fatal and Destructive Cyclone Passed over Brownsville, Mo., on April 18th, almost annihilating the town. A telegram from St. Louis says that just before the storm struck the town the atmosphere grew suddenly close and heavy. Darkness, almost like night, ensued. A few moments after a terrible roaring noise was heard, and the next instant a huge black and angry funnel-shaped cloud was seen coming from the southwest at almost lightning speed. The large part of the funnel was downward, and it seemed to be whirling in a rotary motion, and bounded along close to the earth. When the cloud reached the southwestern limits of the town, houses were raised clear of their foundations, torn to atoms, and the pieces hurled in every direction. Trees were uprooted and twisted off close to the ground, and persons and animals were picked up and carried for yards through the air, then dropped, bruised and bleeding, to the ground. Two blocks of two story brick buildings in the northern part of the town were torn completely to atoms and the debris scattered in every direction. Frame dwellings were drawn into the vortex and crushed. It is feared that beside eleven persons already known to have been killed, many corpses will yet be found under the ruins, and several injured persons now in hospital will die. The loss of property is estimated at $250,000.

The Prohibition Fight in Iowa is Exciting considerable interest in political circles. The political managers desired to keep the question apart from party interests and to let it stand or fall on its own merits, but a Republican journal now predicts that the adoption of the amendment has been placed beyond doubt, by the avowed intention of the liquor interest to make it a political question. The action of the brewers at their State convention in passing a resolution threatening the defeat of the Republican party if it interfered with the liquor traffic has been resented by the bulk of the party. "The consequence will probably be a full Republican vote in Iowa."

An Apology is Due to Dr. Talmage from Colonel Ingersoll, is the opinion of a New York journal which has usually displayed more partiality for the atheist than the preacher. That journal calls attention to the aurora which on Sunday night, April 16th, shone with a brilliancy rarely witnessed in this latitude, and remarks on the coincidence of its appearing on the very night when Ingersoll, before a large audience was ridiculing Dr. Talmage's "theory that the world might have existed without sunlight, and have been lighted in its stead by some such contrivance as phosphorescent rocks, or the aurora borealis." That very night the aurora blazed out with such splendor as to take away a good deal of the sting of Mr. Ingersoll's ridicule; and lately, at the meeting of the San Francisco Microscopical Society, the State Mineralogist read an account of the discovery of a species of rock which, on being struck, flashed out so brilliantly as to frighten the miners. They call it Hell Fire rock. Another blow at Ingersoll. "Is there a special Providence watching over Dr. Talmage?" is the question with which the writer concludes his remarks. That may be, but in any case it is certain that there is a special Providence watching over God's truth in the world which the atheists assail.

Lady Help in the Episcopal Church is a Departure of an unexpected character, but it is now announced that Bishop Whipple, of the diocese of Minnesota, has declared his intention of licensing two women as lay readers, because no men can be found to fill the places. They are to be licensed to read the service and such sermons as the Bishop puts in their hands.

The Launching of the Gospel Ship "Evangel" is described in the Chronicle of Seattle, W. T. An account of the ship and Mr. Ludlow's purpose in having her built have already been described in these columns. She has now been launched with appropriate ceremonies. A large number of people assembled on the vessel attracted by the novelty of the occasion; among them Judge Greene, Rev. W. S. Harrington, and Rev. J. P. Ludlow. The choir sang several songs appropriate to the occasion. "Gospel bells," with the Gospel ship bell accompaniment, was given with marked effect. "Dare to be a Daniel" was also sung. The Bible was lashed across the bows of the vessel, its pages open. As the craft glided down into the water, Miss Clara Ludlow, instead of breaking, according to custom, a bottle of wine over the bows, took a quantity of leaves filled with Bible quotations, and threw them broadcast upon the air, the little slips falling on the water and among those who were present. At the same moment the young lady declared the name of the Gospel ship Evangel, and the flag bearing the name was unfurled to the breeze. A brief prayer was offered by Judge Greene, the choir sang "Pull for the Shore," "Hold the Fort," etc., and the launch was an accomplished fact. The Chronicle says, "We may truthfully say that the Evangel is as staunch a craft as was ever launched at this port."

An Atheist's Conversion at the Fulton St. Prayer-Meeting is reported. Last week a young man rose at the meeting and asked for the prayers of Christians for God's blessing on his efforts to do something for Christ among his relatives and neighbors at home. Three years ago he came to this city a miserable man. He had lived a sinful life, and when spoken to on the subject of religion he avowed himself an atheist. He left home and friends to get away from himself, to get away from his father's Christian counsels and his mother's constant prayers. His parents told him he could never get away from God and never get away from himself. He laughed at all their warnings, and left for New York. He found no peace here. His sin came with him. He bethought him that the North River was left to him. He would bury himself and his sorrows there, if brighter days did not soon dawn. He was led in the midst of his gloom to the prayer-meeting. There he heard requests for prayers for just such sinners as he was, from just such mothers as was his. It was too much for him. He was greeted kindly by Christian friends, and by the blessing of God was led to Jesus.

A Fortune in Diamonds was Worn lately by one of the guests conspicuous in the corridors of the Fifth Avenue Hotel. He came from the Pacific coast. On his shirt front he wore an enormous solitaire, worth not less than five thousand dollars; his cuff buttons were also solitaires of large size and unusual brilliancy, but the most remarkable part of the dazzling display was a large cluster ring worn on his chin whiskers, which were drawn through it and spread in such a manner as to prevent it slipping off. An inventory casually made by a jeweler placed the cash value of the entire display at not less than a hundred thousand dollars. Other guests were amused at the vulgarity of the exhibition, and some comparisons were drawn between the disposition that prompted it and that of a savage, proud of his paltry string of beads. Such a sight, however, has a more solemn meaning for the Christian, who cannot forget the thousands of starving fellow-men and the millions who have not yet heard of the gospel because the funds of missionary societies are too small to send missionaries to them. What good might have been done with the money thus consecrated on the altar of personal pride (1 Pet. 3:3).

A Passenger Train from Louisville, Ky., to Lexington was saved from destruction lately by the exertions of a colored laborer. The train was approaching Lexington when the engineer saw a colored man, whose name is Oscar Washington, standing on the track waving a light. He had also built a bonfire on the track so that the engineer would be bound to see that something was wrong. A huge walnut log had fallen from a freight train and lay across the track. The log was about four feet in diameter. The colored man, living near, observed the log on his return from work. He could not move it, so he built a fire on the log, and then went on ahead at a safe distance to give the signal. The ingenuity of the man cannot be too highly commended. Some men finding such an obstacle in the way, beyond their power to remove, might have left it there to go for assistance, or even have done nothing in the matter. It would be well if Christians seeing a moral danger to the safety of young people and the unwary, would, even if they are not able to remove it, do their utmost to give warning of the danger (Ezekiel 33:8).

The Garfield Postage Stamp which has now been issued has historical significance. It appears that when Mr. James accepted the office of Postmaster-General, he decided on issuing postage stamps of the value of two dollars each, with the object of accommodating bankers and merchants, who are often obliged to affix a large number of stamps on their weighty packages to the inconvenience of themselves and the Post-Office. After President Garfield's death it was decided that his portrait should appear on the new stamps. Then came the many expressions of sympathy and friendship from foreign lands, and the unusual proceedings of the English court mourning which showed that the President's death had drawn closer the bonds of international regard. In view of this friendly demonstration it was thought appropriate that the five-cent stamp, which is the one most used in foreign correspondence, should be that to bear President Garfield's portrait. The design was accordingly prepared, and is admitted to be the best portrait of President Garfield extant. Apart from this the many improvements effected in machinery, and the cultivated taste of the designers have combined to render the new stamp so perfect that it is pronounced by stamp connoisseurs the most beautiful in style and workmanship ever issued in the world. In associating the image of President Garfield with our international intercourse we acknowledge the pleasant associations into which his death brought us, and are reminded of that higher bond of brotherhood which unites all believers in Christ, whatever their nationality, a bond which had its origin too in death—the death of our common Saviour (Gal 3:28).

A Great Religious Tidal Wave is now Rolling over the Southern States; especially in Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee. A correspondent at Raleigh writes that: "The awakening is such as has not been witnessed for many years, and that many precious souls are being added unto the church of the living God."

A Vicious Proposal of a Singularly Disgraceful character has been made by two Mississippi young men. The New York Tribune has received from Constantinople a letter from a gentleman resident there, enclosing another letter mailed on January 5th from Brunswick, Miss., by two young men. It was addressed "To any Slave-Dealer, Constantinople, Turkey, Europe," in which they expressed a desire to purchase at a fair price two young and pretty female slaves as travelling companions during their projected European tour. The original letter and envelope have been sent to the Tribune office by the gentleman in Constantinople into whose hands they fell, accompanied by the following expression of indignation and disgust: "Every such discovery as the present one of the inner thought of foreigners rouses the stubborn religious fervor of our people into more invincible determination to resist the civilization offered to them by emissaries of every grade." The most serious view of this wicked proposal is that among the emissaries of civilization to which the gentleman alludes, must be reckoned Christian missionaries. This is not the first time that these faithful servants of God have had cause to attribute much of the prejudice excited against their efforts to the vices of their countrymen.

The Sudden Death of Three Sisters in Philadelphia within a few minutes of each other recently, is one of the most remarkable cases on record. It appears that Mrs. Watson and Mrs. Winsmore, two sisters fifty-two and fifty-eight years of age respectively, resided in the same house, while Mrs. Smith, a third sister, lived in the neighborhood. About ten o'clock on the night of April 8th Mrs. Winsmore heard a peculiar noise in her sister's room, and on going to see what was the matter, found Mrs. Watson alarmingly ill. Medical assistance was immediately obtained, and Mrs. Smith was sent for. When the physicians arrived it was found that Mrs. Watson was suffering from apoplexy, and that she was beyond help. She died shortly after their arrival, and as she breathed her last it was noticed that Mrs. Winsmore, who sat beside her in great distress, also seemed ill. In a few minutes she was seen to fall forward and was picked up dead. The physician went downstairs to inform Mrs. Smith of the death of her sisters, and was horrified to see her, on hearing the news, lapse into unconsciousness and die. In thirty-five minutes from the time of the first seizure all three sisters were dead, and the post-mortem examination showed that in the last two cases death had resulted from apoplexy brought on by sudden grief. They are said to have been tenderly attached to each other, and to have spent their lives in close proximity. We may hope that they were partakers of the blessed hope so especially precious to loving souls who have spent their lives in affectionate intercourse—that of spending eternity together (2 Samuel 12:23).

THE SINGING PILGRIM.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage."—Psalm 119:54.

A Casket of Gold Rings—David's Horror and Comfort—I. A Pilgrim—Belonging to Another Country—Hurrying through a Foreign Land—The Pilgrim's Main Business—Relatives Chiefly Elsewhere—His Own Land Where he will Remain Longest—Treated as a Stranger by the People of the Land—II. A Singing Pilgrim—Painted Christians—A World of Joy Within—The Night and the Morning—III. The Song Book—A Household Guide—A Book for All Occasions—It Tells of the Privileges of Pilgrims—Of the Place Ahead—Do You Sing from the Book?

THE one-hundred-and-nineteenth Psalm is said by many to consist of detached sentences, and to be rather a casket of gold rings than a chain of united golden links; yet the position of this verse is somewhat remarkable, for the verse before it runs thus: "Horror hath taken hold upon me because of the wicked that forsake Thy law." Most of you know for yourselves what that sentence means; for if you hear a man swear in the streets, your blood runs chill with horror; and when you think of what has been said by blasphemers against the person of our divine Lord, and against the divine truths of revelation, you are horrified that men should have had the audacity to think—much less to say—such wicked things against the Most High.

David rightly said, "Horror hath taken hold upon me," and then he added our text; as if he would say, "I am horrified that they should break the law of God, and tread it under foot, for to me it is an intense delight: 'Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage.' That which is their scorn is my song. What they count dross is gold to me. How can they treat such precious truths contemptuously?" He is horrified at the thought that what is, to him, the very soul of his life, and the life of his soul, should be to them a cast-off and a hate. Surely some connection is visible here; these rings are evidently linked to each other.

It is well to notice the following verse. David writes, "I have remembered Thy name, O Lord, in the night, and have kept Thy law,"—as much as if he had said—It is not always daylight with me; but when it is, Thy statutes are my song. My sun is not always above the horizon; but when it is dark with me, and I am in trouble, I do not forget Thee. Thou art still my solace. I remember Thy name, and I am comforted. If I may not see Thy face, it is a joy to remember Thy name; for they that know Thy name will put their trust in Thee. If I can but remember Thy name when my spirits sink, I shall have my soul stayed and upheld until the daylight shall again break in upon my spirit. Is there not much sweetness in this hopeful assurance, much to make our text overflow with meaning?

And now I invite you to consider the text itself. It seems to me to talk about three things, three things which concern us. The first is a pilgrim; who is, secondly, a singing pilgrim; and this brings before us, thirdly, his song book;—"Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage."

"Sweet strains to me Thy laws have been,
Sweet music in my heart,
Where on my lonely pilgrimage
I sojourn all apart."

I. First, here is

A PILGRIM.

David was a type of all who are true disciples of Jesus. They are all pilgrims. A pilgrim is a person who is travelling through one country to another. If we are true to our profession, we are pilgrims with an emphasis; for, first, we belong to another country. We were not born here as to our highest nature. When we were born in the most emphatic sense we were born of another country altogether; "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God." "Except a man be born again"—"from above," says the margin—"he cannot see the kingdom of God." We have been born from above. Our birth makes us citizens of the city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. We are aliens, foreigners, strangers in this world. One said of old, "I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were;" and another said, "I am a stranger in the earth;" indeed, all the faithful confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. Jesus, our leader, said, "Ye are not of the world, even as I am not of the world."

We are hurrying through this world as through a foreign land. We are in this country, not as residents, but only as visitors, who take this country en route for glory. Ungodly men live as if they never meant to die. All their plans and preparations are evidently arranged for tarrying in this country; but if God has instructed you aright, you know assuredly that you shall die, and you have become familiar with the thought of departing from these shores. Here you have no continuing city, but are like the tent-dwelling patriarchs, who by their very abodes confessed that they looked for a possession yet to be given them.

You look not upon all other men as mortal, but upon yourselves as such; nor do you at all regret it; you would not stay here for ever if you could. You know that you are emigrants to the land of the unsetting sun, and these lands are but traversed on the road to your eternal heritage. This is a rare knowledge, peculiar to the godly. You may bring an unconverted man to be conscious of his mortality, but you cannot get him to realize that he is going to another land. Nay, he is going, he is going, he is going whither he would not. He is hurried to the land of confusion and dismay, where the shadow of death forever rests on hopeless spirits. You do not wonder, therefore, that he tries to avoid the remembrance of this troublesome fact, and that he journeys on with his eyes shut, trying to forget that his life's voyage will ever end.

To you, dear friends, your passage through this world is not a transit to somewhere or to anywhere; for you know where you are going. As Jesus said to the disciples, "Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know;" you know which way Jesus went, and you know that you will go the same way, for He has promised that where He is there you shall be also. One of His solemn declarations was, "Because I live, ye shall live also;" and one of His last prayers put this promise into the form of authority and claim—"Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory."

If an Italian now in England passes through France on his way to the Eternal City, he stays at Paris, or Lyons, or Marseilles, on his journey; but all the while he is not a Frenchman, he is an Italian. Wherever he stays upon the road, he says to himself, "This is not Rome. This is not the place of my nativity. I have here; I am going onward to my own dear city, and I must hasten as best I may until I reach it." That is the condition of the Christian; his face is steadfastly set to go to the New Jerusalem, and nothing must detain him.

A pilgrim in the old crusading times started out to reach Jerusalem. You know how many were attacked with that insanity in those times; I commend them not, but I use the illustration in all soberness. The Crusader journeyed on foot across Europe. Whenever he came in sight of a goodly city, whether it was Vienna, or Constantinople, he stood and gazed upon the towers, the spires, the minarets; and when he had done so, he turned to his companion and said, "A fair sight, my friend; but it is not the Holy City to which you and I are journeying." So, whenever God brings us to any place, however pleasant or delightful it may be, it is for us to say, "A fair sight, and God be thanked for it; but it is not the Golden City yet."

Our gardens are not Paradise, our homes are not the Father's house on high, our comforts are not our heaven, our halting-places are not the everlasting rest. We must not rest contented here below. We have not come to that promised land whereof God has spoken to us in His covenant. If we were mindful of the place from which we came out, truly we have had many opportunities to return; but we are not mindful of it; our whole desire lies in the opposite direction; our burgess-rights and civic privileges connect us with a city whose jewelled walls and shining streets are waiting for our coming. Our Captain cries to us, "Forward." Beyond the river our possessions lie. In another land is our everlasting abode. We are, then, pilgrims born in another country, passing through this world to an inheritance beyond.

A PILGRIM'S MAIN BUSINESS is to get on and pass through the land as quickly as he may. You will remember how Israel desired to pass through the land of Sihon, King of Heshbon, and Moses offered these terms: "Let me pass through thy land: I will go along by the highway, I will neither turn unto the right hand nor to the left: only I will pass through on my feet." Sihon would not allow them to pass on these conditions; neither will the world grant us a similar privilege. The tribes had to fight their way, and so must we. All we ask is a road. We may also beg the loan of six feet of earth for a sepulchre, but all else we will forego if we may the better proceed towards our inheritance.

"Let me go, oh speed my journey,
Saints and seraphs lure away.

Oh, I almost feel the raptures
That belong to endless day.

"Oft methinks I hear the singing
That is only heard above.

Let me go, oh speed my going,
Let me go where all is love!"

As pilgrims, it is true in our case that our relatives are not, the most of them, in this country. We have a few brethren and sisters with us who are going on pilgrimage, and we are very thankful for them; for good company cheers the way. Where is our Father? Where but in heaven? And where is our Elder Brother? Is He not there too, at the right hand of God? And where is the Bridegroom of our soul? the truest and best Bridegroom with whom we are joined in a marriage union which death cannot sever? Where, I say, is the Bridegroom of our souls? We know right well. And may not the bride desire the happy period of the home-bringing—the joyous marriage feast, the supper of the Lamb? Where our Father is, and where Jesus is, must needs be our own country, and we are exiles till we reach it. If we have a clear eye for spiritual relationships, see what a host of our nearest and dearest ones have gone across the river already, and are in the glory land. Multitudes, multitudes are there.

And, you know, a man who is a pilgrim reckons that land to be his country in which he expects to remain the longest. Through the country which he traverses he makes his way with all speed; but when he gets home he abides at his leisure, for it is the end of his toil and travail. What a little part of life shall we spend on earth! When you and I have been in heaven ten thousand years we shall look back upon those sixty years we spent here as just nothing at all; their pain a pin's prick, their gain a speck, their duration the twinkling of an eye.

We make too much of this poor life, and this fondness costs us dear. Oh for a higher estimate of the home-country, with its delight for evermore! then would the trials of a day exhale like the dew of the morning, and scarce secure an hour of sorrow. We are only here time enough to feel an April shower of pain, and we are gone among the unfading flowers of the endless May. Wherefore let us not make the most of the least, and the least of the most; but let us put things in their order, and allot to brief life its brief consideration, and to everlasting glory its weight of happy meditation. We are to dwell throughout eternity with God! Is not that our home?

That is not a man's residence into which he enters at the front door and in a moment passes out at the back, and is gone never to return, as though it were a mere passage from one street to another; and yet this is about all that believers do as to this poor world. That is a man's home where he can sit him down at his ease and look on all around him as his own and say—

"Here will I make a settled rest,
While others go and come,
No more a stranger or a guest,
But like a child at home,"

Yes, this shows that we are pilgrims, because we are here for so short a space compared with the length of time we shall spend in the dear country beyond.

One thing that always marks us as pilgrims is this—that we are treated by the people of this land as strangers. Different races of men reveal their nationality by their speech, their dress, their manners, and their habits. That which is perfectly natural in a Dutchman seems ridiculous to a Frenchman, while the customs of a Chinaman horrify a Briton. As we who are of the hill country pass through these lowlands the people discover and take a wondering interest in us, sometimes of a friendly sort, but oftener of a hostile kind. They marvel whence we are, and as they cannot make us out they often come to the conclusion that we are acting a part, and are nothing better than hypocrites and pretenders. They, of course, are honest, and all who are not like them must be false and contemptible.

This suspicion and ill will does not happen to all professors, but more or less it falls to the lot of all genuine Christians. They cannot be hid, and yet they cannot be understood, for their life is hid. Gladly would they pass incognito through the land, but the men of the world will not have it so. They soon discover the pilgrim strangers, and they think them very odd. I suppose they are so, if judged by the customs of the world. We do not drop into the ways and customs of the ungodly; for our Master said to us, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." Hence, in this world, the true Christian is as strange as a Red Indian in Cheap-side.

When Socrates was told, "Such a man speaks well of you to-day," the philosopher was by no means gratified, but concluded that he must have done something amiss that such a fellow should speak well of him. Take censures out of a foul mouth to be your highest praise, but praises out of such mouths are worse than abuse. We are strangers, speckled birds, curious creatures, beings that are twice born, who have a new life which is an enigma to ungodly men. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit." He is an unaccountable person. "Thou canst not tell whence he cometh or whither he goeth."

II. But now, secondly, according to our text, the believer is

A SINGING PILGRIM:

"Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage." He does not say "my song" only, but "my songs," in the plural, as if he had been a great singer, and given to singing, which proves that pilgrims to heaven are a merry sort of people after all. They have their trials, some trials more than those which other men know; but then they have their joys, and among these joys are sweet delights such as worldlings can never taste. On the whole, Moses is right in his judgment of the Lord's people: "Happy art thou, O Israel." "Blessed are the people," says the Psalmist, "that know the joyful sound. They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of Thy countenance."

Holy pilgrims are happy; theirs is not the caravan of despair, but the march of those who go from strength to strength. I hear a voice objecting, "You give a rose-color to facts, for some religious people are very gloomy." I dispute not the fact. For sure some days are dark, and yet day is not the time of darkness; even noontide may be dim, and yet noon is not the hour of gloom. On earth all men must eat some bitter herbs, whether they eat the paschal lamb or not. Moreover, all are not truly godly who profess to be so. They fancied they were religious, and therefore felt themselves bound to keep up the profession; surliness and gloom are part of the buttressing by which they keep up the flimsy structure of their piety. Their religion is not real, and so they make it terrible.

If your cheek is painted you know that its ruddy hue may yield to a handkerchief or to a drop of perfume, and therefore you keep your distance and appear reserved. The countryman's rubies are not so soon dissolved; the roses of rude health are not so speedily uprooted. I have known people who painted themselves up as Christians, and they felt it incumbent upon them to look very demure, or else their paint would have come off. They thought that they must add melancholy to their profession to imitate holiness. False notion. The gloom betrays the child of darkness.

I know that there are many here who, like myself, understand what deep means, but yet we would not change our lot for all the mirth of fools or pomp of kings. Our joy no man taketh from us; we are singing pilgrims, though the way be rough. Amid the ashes of our pains live the sparks of our joys, ready to flame up when the breath of the Spirit sweetly blows thereon. Our latent happiness is a choicer heritage than the sinner's riotous glee. When suffering greatly, and scarce able to stand, I was met by one who has long enjoyed rude health and unbroken prosperity. His mind is coarse, and his tongue rasps like a file, and he is ever fond of expressing his rational ideas as proof that he is a superior person.

With politeness he stood before me, and said, "Dear, dear, what a sufferer you are! But it is what may be expected, for whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." I had barely time to admit that the chastening had been severe before he added, "You are very welcome to love which shows itself in that fashion; for my part, I had rather be without it, and enjoy the use of my limbs. I can do better without your God than with Him." Then the hot tears scalded my eyelids and forced themselves a passage. I could bear the pain, but I could not endure to hear my God evil spoken of. I flamed up in indignation, and I cried, "If instead of having pain in my legs I had a thousand agonies in every limb of my body I would not change places with you. I am content to take all that comes of God's love. God and His chastening are better than the world and its delights."

Truly I know it to be so. My soul has a greater inner gladness in her deep-despondency than the goddess have in their high foaming merriments. Yes, and even pain is tutor to praise, and teaches how to play upon all the keys of our humanity till a completer harmony comes from us than perpetual health could have produced. Was not Herbert right when he wrote of man's double powers of grief, and then found in them double founts of praise?

"But as his joys are double,
So is his trouble.
He hath two winters, other things but one—
Both frosts and thought do nip
And bite his lip;
And he of all things fears two deaths alone
"Yet even the greatest griefs
May be reliefs,
Could he but take them right, and in their ways.
Happy is he whose heart
Hath found the art
To turn his double pains to double praise."

You that are lowest down in the scale of visible joy, you that are broken in pieces like wrecks grinding upon rocks, you that are a mass of pain and poverty—you will give your Lord a good word, will you not? You will say, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." At our worst we are better off than the world at its best. Godly poverty is better than unhallowed riches. Our sickness is better than the worldling's health. Our abasement is better than the sinner's honors. We count it better that we suffer pain like to the torture of death than that we bathe in pleasure, and that pleasure be the effect of sin. We will take God at all the discount you can put upon Him, and you shall have the world and all the compound interest which you are able to get out of such a sham. "Sorrowful, yet always rejoicing." Know ye that paradox? Some of us have learned it now these many years.

The singing pilgrim is a man who has a world of joy within him, and is journeying to another world, where for him all will be joy to a still higher degree. He sings high praises unto God, and blesses His name beyond measure, for he has reason to do so, reason which never slackens or lessens. Oh that we were always as we are sometimes, then would our breath be praise. David remembered his best times. He says, "Thy statutes have been my songs." He recollected that he sang, and sang often.

I want some of you who are troubled to-night to rest with us awhile and recollect when you were the Lord's choristers and sang as heartily as any of the company. You have hanged your harps on the willows. That is a bad thing to do, but it is better to hang your harp on the willows than to break it, for it may be taken down and used again for the Lord's glory. Jesus, who has a tender heart for mourners, will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. Think not that the past has devoured all your happiness; hope lives, peace abides, and joy is on the wing. Recall those sweet songs you loved to sing.

The Psalmist bears his testimony that though now he may be mourning yet he did once sing. I wish that Christians whenever they feel discouraged and doubting would not begin telling everybody, "Oh, I am bowed down," without saying also, "I was not always so. For years I was free as a bird, and did not envy an angel; nor shall I be always sorrowful; I shall wear my plumes again and fill the air with my songs. I am not going to be bowed down always. Weeping may endure for a night; it is the time for dew. 'But joy cometh in the morning,' that is the time for sunlight and for bird-singing, and so it will be with me."

Well may every pilgrim to heaven be a singing pilgrim, because he is getting every day nearer to the land where it is all singing. There are many delights in heaven, but the main thing about heaven is the adoration of God. Oh, if I might once adore with my whole being, I would ask never to do anything else for ever, but to melt away in reverent worship of the blessed God. Oh, what singing that will be, when you will sing your best, your heart made perfect to sing worthily in accord with the place and theme. Oh for the music which is all harmony and no discord! What music that will be when all the dear voices which have been hushed, which we can hardly think of now without a tear, will all ring out clearly the praises of God—when all the myriad voices that have gone before will join in full chorus—when all shall be perfect, and all shall be there, and all shall praise God for ever. Come, pilgrim, sing, for you are going to sing for ever. Now, rehearse your blessed anthem. Sing unto the Lord now, since you are to sing unto the Lord world without end.

"Such songs have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction
That follows after prayer.

'And the night shall be filled with music,
And the cares that infest the day
Shall fold their tents, like the Arabs,
And as silently steal away."

III. Now, I must come to a close, for time admonishes me; and the last head was to be

THE SONG BOOK:

"Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage."

The Bible is a wonderful book. It serves a thousand purposes in the household of God. I recollect a book my father used to have, entitled "Family Medicine," which was consulted when any of us fell sick with juvenile diseases. The Bible is our book of family medicine. In some houses, the book they most consult is a "Household Guide." The Bible is the best guide for all families. This Book may be consulted in every case, and its oracle will never mislead. You can use it at funerals. There are no such words as those which Paul has written concerning the resurrection of the dead. You can use it for marriages—where else find you such holy advice to a wedded pair? You can use it for birthdays. You can use it for a lamp at night. You can use it for a screen by day. It is a universal Book; it is the Book of books, and has furnished material for mountains of books; it is made of what I call bibline, or the essence of books,

This one Book is enough to last a man throughout the whole of his life, however diligently he may study it. It seems that David, when he was a pilgrim, used the part which he had of this blessed Book as a song-book. It was nearly all history. What could he find to sing of there? He sang the wars and victories of the God of Israel. You and I have a bigger book than David had; can we say that, as pilgrims, we use this blessed Book for songs? Truly we ought to do so, for this is the book that started us on pilgrimage. The blessed teachings of this Book, sent home by the Holy Spirit, made us flee from the City of Destruction, and made us seek the road that leads to life eternal. We sing about this Book, for it is "perfect, converting the soul."

We use this Book for a song-book, as pilgrims, because it tells us the way to heaven. We often sing as we come to a fresh spot on the route, and bless God that we find the road to be just as we have read in the way-book, just as our divine Master said it should be. Well may we sing a song of gratitude for an infallible word.

This Book tells us

both here and hereafter, and of the care which the Lord of pilgrims shows towards all who seek the better country.

Best of all, if better can be than what we have said already, we love this Book because it tells us of the place to which we are going. Oh, how it paints that city, not in many words, but in suggestive similes. How wonderfully it talks to us of our abode! Why, if it said no more than that "they shall be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory," we should know enough of heaven to make our hearts dance for joy. To be with Jesus where He is, to behold His glory, this is bliss pressed down and running over, more than our bosoms can hold.

Have you ever seen the heavenly country? Has your eye ever been permitted to rest upon it? "No," says one, "certainly not. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard.'" A very nice text, brother. Go on with it; go on with it. You may make God say what He does not mean if you quote half a text. He says, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him; but God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit." Hence we know these joys by revelation, and that is the best of knowledge. The eye has not seen; but we have done with seeing with eyes when we deal with spiritual things. Our ears have not heard; these are poor deaf things. At best they only hear mortal sounds; but we have an inward function, faculty, power of hearing without ears. God does not speak in audible tones to His children, and yet He speaks to them, and they hear Him.

Now, dear hearers, do you sing out of this holy Book? A country may be judged by its songs; and so may an individual. Do you sing the song of songs? Are God's statutes royal music for you? A wise man once said that he would permit anybody to make the laws of a country if he had the making of the ballads, for these kindle the spirit and fashion the character. What do you sing, brother? What do you sing? I leave that question as a heart-searching one—what do you sing? Or are you one that never sings at all? Poor soul, how do you live here, and where will you live hereafter? Where must non-singers go? God give you a singing heart, and may you sing unto the Well-beloved a song touching the Well-beloved, and keep on singing it "till the day break and the shadows flee away." God bless you. Amen.

The Wedding of Priscilla.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

KING ROBERT OF SICILY AND THE ANGEL who is known in history as the " . . . brother of Pope Urbane

And Valmond, Emperor of Allemaine."

Attending church one St. John's Eve in all the pomp and pageantry of state, he listened to the chanting of the "Magnificat" in Latin, and the refrain, "o'er and o'er again repeated," arrested his attention. "What mean these words?" he inquired of one of the officiating ecclesiastics, and was informed,

"He hath put down the mighty from their seat,
And has exalted them of low degree."

The haughty king was angry, and muttered scornfully,

"'Tis well that such seditious words are sung
Only by priests and in the Latin tongue;
For unto priests and people be it known,
There is no power can push me from my throne."

Lulled by the chant monotonous and deep, he fell asleep. But while he slept, says the ancient legend, he was stripped of his magnificent array and despoiled of kingly might. Waking amid the thick darkness which had fallen, and finding himself alone, he uttered awful threatnings and complaints:

"The sounds re-echoed from the roof and walls,
As if dead priests were laughing in their stalls!"

Rushing to the portal, and pas the affrighted sexton, whom he had summoned, the king,

"Haggard, half naked, without hat or cloak, Leaped into the blackness of the night."

Arrived at his palace gate, he passed all unattended through the court-yard,

"And hurried up the broad and sounding stair,
His white face ghastly in the torch's glare.
From hall to hall he passed with breathless speed;

Voices and cries he heard, but did not heed,
Until at last he reached the banquet-room,
Blazing with light, and breathing with perfume.
There on the dais sat another king,
Wearing his robes, his crown, his signet-ring.
King Robert's self in features, form, and height,
But all transfigured with angelic light.
It was an angel."

King Robert charges the bright being before him with usurpation and imposture:

"And suddenly, at these audacious words,
Up sprang the angry guests, and drew their swords."

The Angel then pronounced his doom:

"Nay, not the King, but the King's Jester; thou
Henceforth shalt wear the bells and scoloped cape,
And for thy counsellor shalt lead an ape."

The misery he endured till morning dawned may well be imagined.

" . . . Waking with the day's first beam,
He said within himself, 'It was a dream;
It was no dream; the world he loved so much
Had turned to dust and ashes at his touch!'"

THE DYING NORMAN BARON.

Among his "Miscellaneous Poems," "The Norman Baron," perhaps carries off the palm for artistic unity and real dramatic interest. Our frontispiece represents the thrilling scene, when the baron, amid the gathering darkness of a thunder storm without, and the depression of a deeper gloom within, reflects upon "the lands his sires had plundered." The Saxon gleemen at the gates are singing a Christmas carol, whose burden is—

"In his chamber, weak and dying"

"Wassail for the Kingly stranger,
Born and cradled in a manger!
King, like David; priest, like Aaron, Christ is born to set us free!"

As he turns his weary head to listen, the vivid lightning flashes bring out into bold relief the figures of saints painted in glowing colors on the casement, and with tortured conscience, the shuddering baron exclaims, "Miserere, Domine!"

"In that hour of deep contrition
He beheld, with clearer vision,
Through all outward show and fashion,
Justice, the Avenger, rise.

"All the pomp of earth had vanished,
Falsehood and deceit were banished,
Reason spake more loud than passion
And the truth wore no disguise!"

"Every vassal of his banner,
Every serf born to his manor,
All those wronged and wretched creatures,
By his hand were freed again.

And, as on the sacred missal,
He recorded their dismissal,
Death relaxed his iron features,
And the monk replied, 'Amen!'"

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH.

Our picture on this page, is illustrative of "The Village Blacksmith," one of Longfellow's universal favorites, and which is characterized by tender pathos from its first stanza to its last.

"Under a spreading chestnut-tree
The village smithy stands;
The smith a mighty man is he
With large and sinewy hands;

And the muscles of his brawny arms
Are strong as iron bands.

* * * * *
"Tolling—rejoicing—sorrowing,
Onward through life he goes;
Each morning sees some task begin,
Each evening sees it close;
Something attempted, something done,
Has earned a night's repose.

"Thanks, thanks to thee, my worthy friend,
For the lesson thou has taught!
That at the flaming forge of life
Our fortunes must be wrought;
Thus on its sounding anvil shaped Each burning deed and thought!"

THE POEM "EXCELSIOR."

is one of the poet's most celebrated compositions. When it first appeared some misapprehensions existed as to the exact meaning of the poem. The author himself furnished the following explanation: "'Excelsior' is a series of pictures, the life of a man of genius, resisting all temptations, laying aside all fears, heedless of all warnings, and pressing right on to accomplish his purpose. His motto is 'Excelsior'—'higher.' He passes through the Alpine village—through the rough, cold paths of the world—where the peasants cannot understand him, and where his watchword is an 'unknown tongue.' He disregards the happiness of domestic peace and sees the glaciers—his fate—before him. He disregards the warning of the old man's wisdom and the fascinations of woman's love. He answers to all, 'Higher yet!' The monks of St. Bernard are the representatives of religious forms and ceremonies, and with their oft-repeated prayer mingles the sound of his voice, telling them there is something nigher than forms and ceremonies. Filled with these aspirations, he perishes; without having reached the perfection he longed for; and the voice heard in the air is the promise of immortality in Christ and progress every upward." (Our picture on page 269 depicts the final scene.)

"The shades of night were falling fast,
As through an Alpine village passed
A youth who bore 'mid snow and ice,
A banner with the strange device,
Excelsior!"

"In happy homes he saw the light
Of household fires gleam warm and bright;
Above, the spectral glaciers shone,
And from his lips escaped a groan,
Excelsior!"

Having been warned in vain by an aged man, a mountain maiden, and an alarmed peasant, he pursues his upward journey, and—

Evangeline's Farewell of her Father.

"At break of day as heavenward
The pious monks of St. Bernard
Uttered the oft repeated prayer,
A voice cried through the startled air
Excelsior !

* * * * *

"A traveller, by the faithful hound
Half buried in the snow was found,
Still grasping in his hand of ice
That banner with the strange device,
Excelsior !

"There in the twilight, cold and gray,
Lifeless, but beautiful, he lay,
And from the sky, serene and far,
A voice fell, like a falling star,
Excelsior !"

THE STORY OF EVANGELINE,
an event in which we illustrate on this page, is a fascinating story of simple earnestness, very graceful, and animated by a tranquil and lofty spirit of endurance. It is one of the most pathetic and beautiful poetic narratives which has ever enriched the language. It is founded on an occurrence which took place in the early period of British colonization in the North. Beautiful descriptions lie scattered among its stanzas, and the most remarkable narrative of constant human love must "pale its ineffectual fires" at the recital of the devotion of Evangeline and the constancy of her lover.

The British Government, in 1713, having ordered the expulsion of the inhabitants of Acadia, or, as it is now named, Nova Scotia, for supposed complicity with the French in their aggressive designs, Evangeline, her father, and Gabriel, her lover, are driven to separation, and our picture on this page is an attempt to illustrate the sorrowful parting in the village of Grand-Pré. We have no space to quote any of the exquisite poem.

AN ORDINATION HYMN.

The poems of Longfellow are all translucent with the radiancy of the Christian faith, but as he was not a hymn-writer, as Toplady, and Wesley, and Watts were, and as Dr. Bonar is, a formulated theology must not be expected in his writings. The following beautiful hymn, however, composed by him for his brother's ordination to the Gospel ministry, will sufficiently indicate the poet's own cordial love for the person of Christ, and his adoring reverence for Him as Lord and Master :

"Christ to the young man said: 'Yet one thing more ;
If thou would'st perfect be,
Sell all thou hast and give it to the poor,
And come and follow me !'
Within this sacred temple Christ again, unseen,
Those sacred words hath said,

And His invisible hands to-day have been Laid on a young man's head.

And evermore beside him on his way
The unseen Christ shall move,
That he may lean upon his arm and say,
'Dost Thou, dear Lord, approve ?'

Beside him at the marriage feast shall be,
To make the scene more fair ;
Beside him in the dark Gethsemane
Of pain and midnight prayer.

O, holy trust ! O, endless sense of rest :
Like the beloved John,
To lay his head upon the Saviour's breast,
And thusto journey on !"

"POOR FELLOW !"

A Temperance Appeal.

HE wasn't drunk. I don't know that Sam Spargo ever was drunk. And, yet, when I came across him the other day, "Poor fellow !" seemed the very expression for him. Involuntarily, before I knew I had said it, "Poor fellow !" burst from my lips.

It was the flush on his cheek, his peculiar jaunty step, the glitter of his eye, and a strange expression on his face, which drew forth my pity, and the words, "Poor fellow !"

And now that I have had time to weigh my expression, and to gauge its real force, I am more fully persuaded than ever that Sam Spargo is "a poor fellow."

But why?

Well, for one thing, because he is not a happy man. This was the first thing which struck me when I endeavored to recall the face. There was excitement, there was eagerness, there was a sort of physical elation, but happiness there was none. And I am quite sure the further he proceeds in the same direction, the greater will be his unrest. He is seeking after happiness now. He deems it to be near at hand. A few steps ahead and he thinks he will grasp it. "Poor fellow !" he must be, for who does not pity the man who is seeking a right thing in a wrong way?

Because, again, he is spending what he cannot afford. Sam Spargo receives good wages, no doubt, for he is a fair workman enough. But good wages are rarely good enough for frequent public-house visits. Such wear and tear on the pocket as indulgence in strong drink cannot but produce, needs an unusually strong and deep pocket to bear the strain. No, Sam cannot afford it. Even if he had no wife, the strain would be too heavy. How much more, therefore, when, in addition to the wife, there are some five hungry children. Now, who can look upon a man who spends on drink what should, by rights, have been spent in clothing, rent, and food, without uttering some such expression as, "Poor fellow !"

Because, also, he is ruining his health. That flushed cheek and excited expression, speaks, to my mind, of unfair treatment of the body. It is not a natural look at all. It is as though a hidden fire were burning within him. Surely, it is not possible to ill-treat the body with impunity. Surely, Sam Spargo's health will not be improved by the process. Nerves, stomach, blood, liver, and I know not what besides, must be affected by such frequent drenchings of strong drink. A delicate piece of machinery is this body of ours, and easy it is, by reckless treatment, to put it out of order. Now, who can think of even health ruined, especially when the livelihood of a family depends upon it, without using of such a man as Sam Spargo some such words as "Poor fellow !"

Because, further, the love of drink is gaining on him. Sam has greater love for the public-house than he had. There was a time when it was an easy thing for him to keep out of the tavern. He was perfect master of himself. But little by little he surrendered his freedom, until now he scarcely can pass a public-house without entering it, and once within its doors he has tremendous difficulty in dragging himself away from it. Sam Spargo is going fast down-hill, and, of course, the further down he goes, the quicker will be his speed, and the more difficulty he will have in stopping.

Because, lastly, he is neglecting his soul. This side of the grave looks bad enough. The other side looks ten thousand times worse. A lost body is a grievous thing, but how much more so is a lost soul ! Who does not know that drinking habits must lead to forgetfulness of the soul ? Where is there a man on the face of the earth who cares for his spiritual welfare at the same time that he loves the drink ? No, no, the drink gives the devil too great a command over the poor man for him ever to think seriously about his soul. As a matter of fact, Sam Spargo lives as though he had no soul whatever. Although he once had serious thoughts, and went to the house of God Sunday by Sunday, no sooner did the love of drink come, than all anxiety for his soul left him, and now, may God help him ! If he be not soon stopped, he will be lost beyond recovery. He has been pleaded with, and warned abundantly so far, but he turns aside from the gospel message with a laugh and a sneer. That Jesus died for him, and offers him a present, full, and free salvation, is no good tidings to him.

Truly, as we think of him so recklessly neglecting his soul, it is no wonder that we cannot refrain from saying, "Poor fellow !"

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Coming to Himself.

ROLAND'S children had been but vague memories to him; it was Felicity who had engrossed all his thought. All at once he comprehended that he was a father, the father of a son and daughter, who had their own separate life and career. A deep and poignant interest in these beings took possession of him. He had called them into existence; they belonged to him by a tie which nothing on earth, in heaven, or in hell itself could destroy. As long as they lived there must be an indestructible interest for him in this world. Felicity was no longer the only one in his thoughts.

The dim veil which time had drawn around them was rent asunder, and they stood before him bathed in light, but placed on the other side of a gulf as fathomless, as impassable, and as death-like as the ice-crevasse yawning at his feet. He gazed down into its cold, gleaming abyss, and across it to the sharp and slippery margin where there could be no foothold, and he pictured to himself the springing across that horrible gulf to reach them on the other side, and the falling, with outstretched hands and clutching fingers, into the unseen icy depths below him. For the first time in his life he shrank back shivering and terror-stricken from the edge of the crevasse, with palsied limbs and treacherous nerves. He felt that he must get back into safer standing ground than this solitary and perilous glacier.

He reached at last a point of safety, where he could lie down and let his trembling limbs rest awhile. The whole slope of the valley lay below him, with its rich meadows of emerald green, and its silvery streams wandering through them. Little farms and chalets were dotted about, some of them clinging to the sides of the rocks opposite to him, or resting on the very edge of precipices thousands of feet deep, and looking as if they were about to slip over them. He felt his head grow giddy as he looked at them, and thought of the children at play in such dangerous play-grounds. There were a few gray clouds hanging about the Titlis, and caught upon the sharp horns of the rugged peaks around the valley. Every peak and precipice he knew; they had been his refuge in the hours of his greatest anguish. But these palsied limbs and this giddy head could not be trusted to carry him there again. He had lost his last hope of making any atonement. Hope was gone; was he to lose his indomitable courage also? It was the last faculty which made his present life endurable.

He lay motionless for hours, neither listening nor looking. Yet he heard, for the memory of it often came back to him in after years, the tinkling of innumerable bells from the pastures below him, and around him; and the voices of many waterfalls rushing down through the pine forests into the valley; and the tossing to and fro of the interwoven branches of the trees. And he saw the sunlight stealing from one point to another, chased by the shadows of the clouds, that gathered and dispersed, dimming the blue sky for a little time, and then leaving it brighter and deeper than before. He was unconscious of it all; he was even unaware that his brain was at work at all, until suddenly, like a flash, there rose upon him the clear, resolute, unchangeable determination, "I will go to England."

He started up at once, and seized his bundle and his alpenstock. The afternoon was far advanced, but there was time enough to reach the Engstlenalp, where he could stay the night and go on in the morning to Meiringen. He could be in England in three days.

Three days: so short a time separated him from the country and the home from which he had been exiled so many years. Any day during those fourteen years he might have started homewards as he was doing now; but there had not been the irresistible hunger in his heart that at this moment drove him thither. He had been vainly seeking to satisfy himself with husks; but even these, dry and empty, and bitter as they were, had failed him.

He had lost all; and having lost all, he was coming to himself.

There was not the slightest fear of detection in his mind. A gray-haired man with bowed shoulders, and seamed and marred face, who had lost every trace of the fastidiousness which had verged upon foppiness in the handsome and prosperous Roland Sefton, ran no risk of recognition; more especially as Roland Sefton had been reckoned among the dead and buried for many a long year. The lineaments of the dead died with them, however cunningly the artist may have used his skill to preserve them. The face is gone, and the memory of it. Some hearts may long to keep it engraven sharp and clear in their remembrance; but, oh, when the "inward eye" comes to look for it how dull and blurred it lies there, like a forgotten photograph which has grown faded and stained in some seldom-visited cabinet!

Jean Merle travelled, as a man of his class would travel, in a slow train and a third-class wagon; but he kept on, stopping nowhere for rest, and advancing as rapidly as he could, until on the third day, in the gray of the evening, he saw the chalk-line of the English coast rising against the faint yellow light of the sunset; and as night fell his feet once more trod upon his native soil.

So far he had been simply yielding to his blind and irresistible longing to get back to England, and nearer to his unknown children. He had heard so little of them from Alice Pascal, that he could no longer rest without knowing more. How to carry out his intention he did not know, and he had hardly given it a thought. But now, as he strolled slowly along the flat and sandy shore for an hour or two, with the darkness hiding both sea and land from him, except the spot on which he stood, he began to consider what steps he must take to learn what he wanted to know, and to see their happiness afar off without in any way endangering it. He had purchased it at too heavy a price to be willing to place it in any peril now.

That Felicity had left Riversborough he had heard from her own lips, but there was no other place where he was sure of discovering her present abode, for London was too wide a city, even if she had carried out her intention of living there, for him to ascertain where she dwelt. Phebe Marlowe would certainly know where he could find them, for the English girl at Roland Sefton's grave had spoken of Phebe as familiarly as of Felix and Hilda—spoken of her, in fact, as if she was quite one of the family. There would be no danger in seeking out Phebe Marlowe. If his own mother could not have recognized her son in the rugged peasant he had become, there was no chance of a young girl such as Phebe had been ever thinking of Roland Sefton in connection with him; and he could learn all he wished to know from her.

He was careful to take the precaution of exchanging his foreign garb of a Swiss peasant for the dress of an English mechanic. The change did not make him look more like his old self, for there was no longer any incongruity in his appearance. No soul on earth knew that he had not died many years ago, except Felicity. He might saunter down the streets of his native town in broad daylight on a market-day, and not a suspicion would cross any brain that here was their old townsman, Roland Sefton, the fraudulent banker.

Yet he timed his journey so as not to reach Riversborough before the evening of the next day; and it was growing dusk when he paced once more the familiar streets, slowly, and at every step gathering up some sharp reminiscence of the past. How little they were changed! The old grammar-school, with its gray walls and mullioned windows, looked exactly as it had done when he was yet a boy wearing his college cap, and carrying his satchel of school-books. His name, he knew, was painted in gold on a black tablet on the walls inside, as a scholar who had gained a scholarship.

Most of the shops on each side of the streets bore the same names, and looked but little altered. In the churchyard the same grave-stones were standing as they stood when he, as a child, spelt out their inscriptions through the open railings which separated them from the causeway. There was a zigzag crack in one of the flag-stones, which was one of his earliest recollections; he stood and put his clumsy boot upon it as he had often placed his little foot in those childish years, and leaning his head against the railings of the churchyard, where all his English forefathers for many a generation were buried, he waited as if for some voice to speak to him.

Suddenly the bells in the dark tower above him rang out a peal, clanging and clashing noisily together as if to give him a welcome. They had rung so the day he brought Felicity home after their long wedding journey. This was Friday night, the night when the ringers had always been used to practise, in the days when he was churchwarden. The pain of hearing them was intolerable; he could bear no more that night. Not daring to go on and look at the house where he was born, and where his children had been born, but which he could never more enter, he sought out a quiet inn, and shut himself up in a garret there to think, and at last to sleep.

I cannot tell whether it was fancy merely, but the morning light which streamed into his room seemed more familiar and homelike to him than it had ever done in Switzerland. He was awakened by one of those sounds which dwell longest in the memory—the chiming of the church bells nearest home, which in childhood had so often called to him to shake off his slumbers, and which spoke to him now in sweet and friendly tones, as if he was still an innocent child.

The tempest-tossed, sinful man lay listening to them for a minute or two, half asleep yet. He had been dreaming that he was in truth dead, but that the task assigned to him was that of an invisible guardian and defender of those who had lost him. He had been present all these years with his wife, and mother, and children, going out and coming in with them, hearing all their conversation, and sharing their family life, but himself unseen and unheard, felt only by the spiritual influence he could exercise over them. It had been a blissful dream, such as had never visited him in his exile; and as the familiar chiming of the bells, high up in the belfry not far from his attic, fell upon his ear, the dream for a brief moment gathered a stronger sense of reality.

It was with a strange feeling, as if he was himself a phantom mingling with creatures of flesh and blood, that he went out into the streets. His whole former life lay unrolled before him, but there was no point at which he could touch it. Every object and every spot was commonplace, yet invested with a singular and intense significance. Many a man among the townsfolk he knew by name and history, whose eyes glanced at him as a stranger, with no surprise at his appearance, and no show of suspicion or of welcome. Certainly he was nothing but a ghost revisiting the scenes of a life to which there was no possible return. Yet how he longed to stretch out his hand and grasp those of these old townspeople of his! Even the least interesting of the shopkeepers in the streets, bestirring himself to meet the business of a new day, seemed to him one of the most desirable of companions.

His heart was drawing him to Whitefriars Road, to that spot on earth of all others most his own; but his resolution failed him whenever he turned his face that way. He rambled into the ancient market square, where stood a statue of his Felicity's great uncle, the first Baron Riversford. The long shadow of it fell across him as he lingered to look in at a bookseller's window. He and the bookseller had been school-fellows together at the grammar-school, and their friendship had lasted after each was started in his own career. Thousands of times he had crossed this door-sill to have a chat with the studious and quiet bookworm within, whose modest life was so great a contrast with his own. Jean Merle stopped at the well-remembered shop-window.

His eyes glanced aimlessly along the crowded shelves, but suddenly his attention was arrested, and his pulses, which had been beating somewhat fast, throbbed with eager rapidity. A dozen volumes or more, ranged together, were labelled, "Works by Mrs. Roland Sefton." Surprise, and pride, and pleasure were in the rapid beatings of his heart. By Felicity! He read over the titles th a new sense of delight and admiration ; and the first glow of his astonishment he stepped quickly into the shop, with erect head and firm step, and found himself face to face with his old school-fellow. The sight of his bland, unrecognizing gaze brought him back to the consciousness the utter change in himself. He looked down at his coarse hands and mechanic's dress, and remembered that he was no longer Roland Sefn. His tongue was parched ; it was difficult to hammer out a word.

THE INTERVAL BETWEEN THE TWO STAGES OF THE ADVENT OF OUR LORD.

by Rev. Richard Chester, A.B., Rector of Middleton and Canon of Cloyne.

Two Stages in Christ's Second Advent Undoubted—Will there be an Interval between Them?—The Question Answered Affirmatively—The Increased Study of Prophecy—Growing Brilliance of Light—Direct Arguments in its Favor—From Analogy—Necessity for Presumed Interval—One Aspect of Christ's Coming is Its Suddenness—Events Antecedent to the Second Stage of the Advent—A Difficulty Solved—Scripture References in Proof—The First Resurrection—The Translation before the Tribulation—The "Days of Noah"—Inferred Reasons for the Interval.

THAT there will be two stages in the Second Advent of our Redeemer is a fact which admits of no question upon the part of those who acknowledge the authority of the Word of God. He will come, in the first instance, for His saints to the earth. "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of God ; and the dead of Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them, in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air" (1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17). He will come, in the next instance, with His saints, to the earth : "And His elect shall stand on that day upon the Mount of Olives. . . . And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with Thee" (Zech. 14 : 4, 5)—a stage in His advent which we find was also foretold by Enoch, Jude 14, 15 verses, and which we find fully detailed in Revelation 19.

But a question—and it is, as we shall see, a most important one—which at once suggests itself upon this subject is, Will there be any interval between these two predicted stages of the Saviour's Second Advent? Will the one follow immediately after the other, or will there be a pause, as it were, and a cessation of progress for a time, between the two?

The former of these opinions—namely, that there will be no such interval, no interruption to the Saviour's progress from the highest heaven, where He is now, to this lower earth, on which He is about to stand, is still by very many degrees the most prevalent, and was, until a comparatively recent period, the universal belief upon this subject.

The latter opinion, that

and one of some duration, between these two stages of the Saviour's Second Advent, the advent to the earth and the advent to the earth, is the one which, and many who agree with me in this matter, are fully prepared to maintain, as the conclusion, which we have fully arrived at, after earnest consideration of the subject, and careful searching of the Holy Scriptures with reference thereto.

Here, however, we are met at once with the objection that the notion of any such interval is altogether a modern notion—it was not so much as heard or thought of forty or fifty years ago. The reply to this objection is, that, while it would be a very serious one indeed, were the matter in dispute a point of doctrine, it is of no weight whatsoever when our question is concerning an item in as yet unfulfilled prophecy. If it be true, as it is admittedly true, that a belief in the existence of such an interval is not more than some forty or fifty years old, it is also true that it is within this very period of the last forty or fifty years that unfulfilled prophecy, previously all but universally neglected by both ministers and people, has become, with a slowly but steadily increasing number of both, the subject of diligent and prayerful study and meditation.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PROPHETIC LIGHT.

The result of this has been, as was to be expected, the putting forth of several most important views and opinions concerning the fulfilment of prophecy, modern in their entertainment and promulgation, but as old in their reality and truthfulness as is the old prophetic Word in which they are contained, and by the searching of which, as for hidden treasure, they have been recently brought to light. Thus the belief in a personal pre-Millennial Advent of the Lord Jesus Christ, in opposition to that of a spiritual reign and a post-Millennial Advent, as also the belief of a first resurrection, consisting only of "the dead in Christ," and another resurrection, a thousand years afterwards, consisting of "the rest of the dead" (Rev. 20 : 5), in opposition to the most incongruous and unscriptural belief in a "first resurrection" of "principles," and a subsequent literal simultaneous resurrection of all mankind, are, in the same sense and for the same reason, modern beliefs.

I am myself old enough to remember well the time when no one, or scarcely any one, entertained them, when, if mentioned at all, they were only mentioned to be put aside at once, as unworthy of any serious consideration. But if these views of a pre-Millennial advent and a literal first resurrection are thus modern, are they therefore necessarily, or even probably, untrue? Is their modernness, in this sense, any argument whatsoever against their correctness? Most assuredly it is not. Held, as they were but a comparatively few years ago, only by a few, they are now held by a very large and continually-increasing number of the members of our church, as also by those of other denominations. But if so, neither is its modernness any argument against the correctness of our view concerning the interval of which we are speaking. Let us not forget the very pertinent words of our blessed Lord, which teach us that "every scribe who is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven is as one who brings out of his treasury things new and old."

But another, and what, at first sight, seems to be a more serious objection to the existence of this interval, meets us in this form : It is said, and, so far, truly said, "You cannot put your finger upon any one passage in the Word of God which expressly states that any such interval between these two stages in the Second Advent will exist." Here, again, however, I see that the objection fails, because it would prove too much.

I cannot put my finger upon any one passage of Scripture which expressly affirms that infants should be admitted to the sacrament of Christian baptism or females to that of the Lord's Supper ; or that our observance of the first day of the week, instead of the seventh, should be regarded as a sufficient conformity upon our part to the mind and will of God as revealed in the Fourth Commandment. Is our church, therefore, wrong? Are we wrong in her teachings and in our practices in these matters? Again I answer, most assuredly we are not. We gather them inferentially, but most conclusively, comparing Scripture with Scripture, from the blessed Word of God. Even so, we who hold this view of an interval between the two revealed stages in the Second Advent profess to have derived it—not directly from any one, but inferentially, and, we believe, in the way of necessary inference—from several portions of the sacred Scriptures.

Having thus far endeavored to meet and dispose of objections to the view of the existence of such an interval, and having shown it to be possible, notwithstanding such objections, I proceed to offer more

DIRECT ARGUMENTS IN ITS FAVOR.

The first in order, although not by any means the strongest, of these I take to be the argument from analogy. That there must be, as a matter of course, a very wide difference in many respects between the First and Second Advent of our blessed Redeemer—between His coming in humiliation and His coming in glory—we are all fully prepared to admit. But, nevertheless, mixed together as these advents are, spoken of as though they constituted but one event, as they are continually throughout the Old Testament, there must be, I submit, many features of resemblance between them. It is "this same Jesus" who came formerly who is to come again. He will come again to complete, in our actual possession and enjoyment of it, that wondrous work "for us men, and for our salvation," which so far, but only so far as to ensure our title to it and our meetness for it, He effected by His first coming. There must, therefore, be, it would appear, not a few points of analogy between the two Advents.

Now, surely it can neither be regarded as impossible or improbable that one of these points of analogy should be the existence, in each instance, of an interval between the different stages of His coming, which interval, nevertheless, either as to its existence or its duration, has not been anywhere absolutely revealed. I have just now alluded to the most remarkable and undeniable fact that Old Testament prophecy reveals no interval between the First and Second Advents of the Messiah, but ever predicts them and speaks of them as though they constituted but one event. An Old Testament believer, intelligently and inquiringly looking forward to the promised coming of the Messiah, could only have arrived at the expectation that there would be an interval between the Advent foretold in Psalm 22, or in Isaiah 53, and that foretold in other, and especially in the later chapters of the same prophecy of Isaiah, by concluding that the depth of humiliation and of suffering predicted in the one instance could not with any probability be regarded as to occur simultaneously with the height of glory predicted in the other. In so concluding, we now know that he would have been correct, inasmuch as we know that an altogether unrevealed interval of nearly two thousand years has already occurred between the two Advents.

In like manner, I submit that, considering the difference between the blessed, happy, joyful, character of our Lord's coming, as promised, John 14 : 3, to "receive His people to Himself, that where He is there they may be also," His coming to raise the dead in Christ, and to change the living, and to catch both up together "to the meeting of the Lord in the air, that so they may be ever with the Lord"—(1 Thess. 4 : 17)—considering, I say, the wonderful contrast between such a stage, the first stage in the Advent and the subsequent stage of it in His descent to the earth, "in flaming fire, taking vengeance upon them that know not God and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ"—(2 Thess. 1-8)—His descent in the overwhelming judgments foretold, for instance, in Isaiah 2 and in Revelation 6 and 19, may we not now be justified in expecting that there must be, in like manner, an interval between these two ; that both will not occur at one and the same time, or the one immediately after the other?

But there is another and a further fact of the same character, and one upon the significance of which I am satisfied to rest all the force of this —namely, that the First Advent of our Lord comprised within it an interval of thirty years between the birth of the Redeemer and His entrance upon His public ministry ; or shall we not rather say that it comprised an interval of thirty-three years between the coming to the stable of the inn at Bethlehem to be born and the coming to Jerusalem and to Calvary, to be rejected, to suffer, and to die?

ARGUMENT FROM ANALOGY

Yet was the First Advent ever foretold and looked forward to, even as is the Second Advent now, as one, and but one, event, and no direct intimation whatsoever was given in Old Testament prophecy of any interval of time between the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ into the world and His full performance of the object of that wondrous mission, or between the different acts of, or stages in, its performance. The existence of any such interval could only, as in the former instance, have been suggested to the mind of an Old Testament inquirer by the probable requirements of the object of the First Advent, and of the manner of its accomplishment.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The United States Steamer "Rodgers" which sailed from San Francisco on June 16th last, to carry succor to the crews of the Jeannette and other missing ships in the Arctic seas, has been burned and sunk in Lutka Harbor, St. Lawrence Bay. The intelligence was telegraphed to Washington on April 18th, from Irkutsk, in Siberia, and was carried there by a courier bearing despatches from Mr. W. H. Gilder, a Herald correspondent who was on board the Rodgers. Detailed intelligence from Mr. Gilder had not been received, the courier having been sent forward with the simple statement and a request for immediate assistance. Mr. W. H. Gilder had made a journey in order to carry the news, of fourteen hundred miles through an inhospitable country inhabited by the most uncivilized tribes of Siberia, a feat unprecedented in history, and which he accomplished. Lieutenant Berry, who commanded the expedition, was reported at Tiapka, near Cape Serdze, with his officers and crew, thirty-six in number. The last intelligence received from him prior to this of the catastrophe was of the discovery that Wrangell Land was an island, it having previously been regarded as part of the main land. Further intelligence is awaited with intense anxiety, but the fact that all the officers and crew were saved from the wreck must be regarded as a providential circumstance, as in the case of fire attacking a ship fast in the ice, the impossibility of obtaining a supply of water would render the destruction of the vessel very rapid and complete.

The Detention of American Citizens in the prisons of Ireland still continues the subject of diplomatic negotiation. The British Government offered them release some time ago on condition that they would leave the country. The imprisoned men would have accepted the offer gladly but for the orders of the Land League, which they did not feel it safe to disobey. The British authorities contend that unconditional release, after the refusal of the suspects to leave the country, would be equivalent to an implied permission for dangerous men to remain in the country and resume their mischievous practices. The government, in such case, would find itself in the dilemma either to rearrest the suspects and renew the diplomatic difficulties, or to tolerate whatever the Irish-Americans might choose to undertake. Fresh claims to American citizenship, it is reported, continue to be presented, including those of two suspects who have been imprisoned and remained silent for months. The Land League leaders are anxious, not for the liberation of the suspects, but to embroil the British and American Governments.

The Official Returns of Lawless Acts in Ireland for the month of March have now been published. Five hundred and thirty-one agrarian outrages were reported to the chief of the Irish constabulary during the month, including two murders, twelve cases of firing at persons, seven of aggravated assault, and thirty of arson. Two hundred and thirty-seven of the outrages were committed in Munster, 124 in Leinster, 122 in Connaught, and forty-eight in Ulster. Mr. Egan, the treasurer of the Land League, has informed a correspondent of the Dublin Freeman's Journal that the League's entire outlay has been $630,000, and that it has on hand $295,000.

Maclean, the Crank who Attempted to Assassinate Queen Victoria on March 2d, was tried on April 19th and acquitted on the ground of insanity. He will be confined in the criminal lunatic asylum for the remainder of his life. When placed at the bar the prisoner looked pale and haggard. He pleaded not guilty in a firm but low voice. The attorney-general in opening the case, said it was a very aggravated one. The jury had a grave responsibility in determining the condition of the prisoner's mind at the time he committed the crime. The evidence for the prosecution went simply to prove that Maclean fired the shot. The witnesses were not cross-examined. Mr. Montagu Williams, for the prisoner, made insanity the ground of defence. He said it could be shown that Maclean had had the homicidal mania for years, and had imagined the English people were against him, and also that it could be proved that Maclean had been confined in an asylum. The superintendents of the Salisbury and Broadmoor asylums testified to Maclean's insanity. They said they believed him incapable of appreciating the nature or quality of any of his acts. Mr. Williams asked for the acquittal of the prisoner on the ground of insanity. In his charge to the jury the Lord Chief Justice said that no head of any State was entirely free from the danger of regicidal attacks—neither the chief of a military empire nor the president of a great republic. The prisoner throughout the proceedings maintained a stolid indifference.

The Canadian House of Commons on Friday April 21st, unanimously voted an address to Queen Victoria, praying that a form of self-government be granted Ireland similar to that enjoyed by Canada, and that clemency be extended to persons now in prison in Ireland charged with political offences. Mr. Blake, leader of the opposition, made a powerful speech in favor of home rule for Ireland, and asserting the right of Canadians to interfere in a matter affecting millions of their fellow-subjects in Ireland. Sir John A. Macdonald also supported the proposal to forward the address, and said he would see that the necessary steps were taken to have an address prepared with all proper forms in order that it may be sent to the Senate for its concurrence.

The Russian Jews are still Undergoing the horrors of persecution. A cable despatch from Odessa, under date of Sunday, April 16th, says: "Jews are flocking here from Balta and the vicinity of that town. All their houses are said to have been wrecked and their property destroyed. The number of families that have been ruined is very large." Two hundred Jewish refugees passed through Lemberg recently on their way to America. Two hundred more are expected to arrive there from Brody. The Golos, of St. Petersburg, publishes accounts confirming the reports of anti-Jewish riots in the district of Kherson. A Jew was killed at Dubassi. The troops at Novaja-Praja had to be reinforced by local levies from Elizabethgrad.

The Attempt to Flood the Great Desert of Sahara has been undertaken by M. Lesseps with the approval of the French Government. M. Lesseps proposes to cut a canal through the neck of the land dividing the Gulf of Gabes from the salt marshes and low lying parts of the Desert of Sahara to the south of Tunis. It is expected that the sea will through this cutting once more fill up the Sahara. The French Government expect the scheme will result in a political advantage which will be the insulation of Tunis and Algeria by creating a water barrier between them and Tripoli. The cost of the canal, will be $13,000,000.

A Letter from Rev. C. H. Spurgeon was Read to his congregation at the Metropolitan Tabernacle on Sunday, April 2d, by Rev. W. Cuff, who occupied the pulpit. Mr. Spurgeon said that when he promised himself the great pleasure of preaching to them that day he hoped to have recovered his strength more rapidly, but alas! it was easy to decline, but hard to rally. Each day had been a little better till now, and he had, in a measure, the use of all his limbs. So slow, however, had been his progress that he could stand but for a minute, and to walk even the length of the room wearied him. He had got into full work when this catastrophe occurred to him. He feared he would never be able to do them good service, but they must take him for what he was worth until the Lord raised up a man better able to take his place. Till then he should do his best, relying on their prayers and divine help.

The Confessions Made by the Nihilists whose sentence of death was commuted by the Russian Czar have resulted in the capture of a nest of nihilists belonging to secondary organizations, and arrests have commenced simultaneously on all sides. The arrests comprise about five hundred persons among the lower class and a number of young men of good family. Rumors are current that the nihilist doctrines are extending among the peasantry, and an English resident of St. Petersburg says in a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette: "The peasantry have lately given ominous signs of a rising spirit of resistance to authority, and there is evidently a feeling of restlessness and of quietude spreading among the once docile agricultural population. Should the peasantry ever seriously determine to overthrow the present system of government the power of the Russian autocrat will not last an hour; but in the meanwhile would appear that the Czar and his ministers have only to deal with a very restricted class, who numbers, in proportion to the whole population are extremely small, and whose pecuniary resources are trifling. The official descriptions of the persons who have been tried and condemned during the last two years give sufficient evidence as to the classes which furnish recruits to nihilism. The male and female nihilists who have perished on the scaffold, or are now undergoing punishment in Siberia, have nearly all belonged to the growing middle class in Russia. A few enthusiasts of higher rank and fortune have been found among the revolutionists, but the great majority are discontented and impecunious members of a middle class which is trying to assert itself, but which finds no place in the autocratic system." It now, however, appears that the agitation will soon be reinforced by a contingent of educated peasants.

An English Decoration Day of a Limited character occurred on April 19th, the anniversary of the death of Lord Beaconsfield. The West End fashionables, the Stock Exchange speculators, and sportsmen all presented a large percentage of wearers of primroses, the dead statesman's favorite flower. Her Majesty sent a wreath of the same for the tomb in Hughenden Church, where, in addition to the royal monument and the banner and insignia of the Garter, a memorial window has been dedicated.

An Amusing Termination to a Quarrel which the principals intended should end in a duel is reported from Hungary. Two young noblemen having quarrelled, chose seconds to arrange a duel. The seconds met and decided upon the following method of combat: Two tiny spheres, one white, the other black, were placed in a wineglass, and the principals, having been blindfolded, were asked to draw. Both the would-be combatants, should be observed, had pledged their honor to observe the conditions of strife prescribed by the seconds in common. He to whose lot the black ball fell found himself, to his infinite surprise and discomfort, condemned to fast upon bread and water for a whole fortnight, under the supervision of his adversary's "friends." He redeemed his pledge and preserved his "honor." It would be gratifying to learn that this mode of settling quarrels had become fashionable instead of the senseless and wicked mode of duelling.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

MANUEL MATAMOROS, The Persecuted Spanish Preacher—Four Scenes in his Life.

MANUEL MATAMOROS:

The Apostle of Spain.

Birth and Education—His First Religious Impressions—Conversion—The Scene of His Earliest Work for Christ—Arrest and Imprisonment at Barcelona—Interposition of Sir R. Peel—A Divinity Student Becomes a Refugee—The Arrest of Alhama—Conversion of Some Fellow-prisoners—The Search in the Prison Cell—Interest of the British Public—Matamoros Sentenced to 18 Years' Imprisonment—Christians Charged with Fomenting Insurrection—Matamoros Removed to a Loathsome Dungeon—Commutation of His Sentence—Consecration to the Ministry—Illness and Death.

SPAIN stands conspicuous among European nations as the land in which persecution for conscience' sake has been most bitter as well as most protracted. The horrors of the Spanish Inquisition are unequalled in barbarity by the records of any court on earth; and though it is the custom to speak of such scenes as of things long gone by, events of comparatively recent date prove that the spirit of persecution has not been exorcised from the Romish Church, especially as it exists in Spain. Prominent among those who have suffered in that country was Manuel Matamoros, a Christian whose wrongs aroused the indignation of Christians throughout the world, and whose release from imprisonment in 1863 was mainly due to the intervention of other nations. The release, however, came too late to save his life. His constitution was fatally undermined by his long imprisonment, and he died from the effects. His last days were spent in peace and comfort, for an American lady travelling in Europe having heard of the persecution he had undergone, took him under her care, and while she generously defrayed the expenses of his illness, she also personally nursed him as if he had been her own son, and attended to his wants until his eyes were closed in death.

Manuel Matamoros was born at Malaga, Spain, in 1834. His father was a Lieutenant-colonel in the Spanish army, and it was in compliance with his wishes that after his death his only son Manuel was educated to be a military officer.

In 1854 there was a revolution in Madrid. There was then in the country an Englishman named Mr. William Greene, who was engaged in laying out and constructing some of the many lines of railway that now intersect the Peninsula. Mr. Greene was an earnest Christian, and he endeavored, while helping in the material progress of the country, to lead its benighted inhabitants to a knowledge of salvation. The unsettled state of the country during the revolution prompted him to do things which he dared not do in ordinary circumstances, such as print and circulate Gospel tracts, the ordinary punishment for which was to be driven out of the country. The tracts were circulated, and it has been stated that it was one of these that was blest to the conversion of Matamoros.

HIS FIRST RELIGIOUS IMPRESSIONS.

It appears that Matamoros' first religious impressions were received from hearing the preaching of Don Francisco Ruet, in the Presbyterian Church at Gibraltar, as also by attending the ministry of a Spanish preacher, at Seville, who was a convert from Romanism in that town. These impressions, deepened by the reading of the Spanish tract "Andrew Dunn," caused Matamoros to send in a formal protest against the errors of Romanism, and to inscribe his name in the books of the Presbyterian congregation at Gibraltar.

Matamoros had from boyhood been remarkable for his energetic temperament, and when he entered the service of Christ, he consecrated his energies to his Saviour. Though he was in the army he knew that he might be able to work for Jesus, and he applied for advice to Señor Ruet, who had been instrumental in first leading him to serious thought about his soul. Señor Ruet counselled him to labor in Malaga and Grenada by circulating religious books and by teaching.

Before undertaking this dangerous mission, Matamoros understood well the immense difficulties which lay in his path, and that bonds and imprisonments awaited him; but he had counted the cost, and, like Paul, had been enabled to say, "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry, which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

HIS EARLIEST WORK.

Malaga was his native town, and it was the first scene of his Christian labors. All the time he could spare from his military duties he devoted to convincing his fellow-countrymen of their need of salvation; but principally among those in whom he had most confidence. This portion of his work having been successfully completed, he then invited them to unite with the true Church of the Lord Jesus Christ; and when they decided on so doing, he showed them the importance of writing a letter, in which they expressed clearly and explicitly their views, and these letters were signed and dated in due order.

"By this plan," says Matamoros, "we guarded against betrayal, and interested them in the work, and knew with more certainty the faith and conviction of the writer of the document. By the advice of Señor Ruet, I directed them to write to him, so as to prevent a surprise; and he in his turn answered them and encouraged them in further inquiries and in deeper study of the word; sustained their faith; and his letters, being read by many, produced the most excellent results."

WHY HE LEFT THE ARMY.

Matamoros subsequently extended his work to Barcelona and resolved on leaving the army. He was led to this latter decision through a notable circumstance, which placed him in a critical position, even endangering his life. He had given to a corporal in his regiment a copy of the tract "Andrew Dunn," describing the conversion of a Roman Catholic, and had succeeded in convincing him of the truth; the corporal sent it to his mother, hoping that it might be blessed to her also; but she was incensed by his act, and resolved on bringing her son back into the Catholic Church. Threats as well as entreaties were used, and ultimately the young man consented to sign a recantation and to confess to the priest. This circumstance brought considerable obloquy and persecution upon Matamoros and led to his leaving the army.

ARRESTED AND IMPRISONED.

As he had preached at Malaga, Matamoros now preached at Seville, Granada, Barcelona, Jaen, and various towns of the province of Andalusia. In Granada particularly his evangelistic labors were much blessed, and a large and influential body of believers was gathered there. On October 9, 1860, he was arrested on the charge of being a Christian. A charge laid against him in Granada induced the civil governor of that city to send a telegraphic order to the governor of Barcelona, and his apprehension immediately followed. On being searched, there were found in his possession a packet of papers and letters from several places in Spain, and some religious documents which compromised him. He was committed to prison at Barcelona, and endured eight days' solitary confinement, and after this remained incarcerated with common criminals until December 26th.

During his examination before the tribunal a remarkable episode occurred, which showed the young man's heroism. The magistrates believed that Matamoros would deny his faith, and that the sight of the officials in legal conclave assembled would overwhelm the heretic prisoner; but they were mistaken. The question put to him by the judge was, "Do you profess the Catholic Apostolic Roman faith; and if not, what religion do you profess?" To this Matamoros replied, "My religion is that of Jesus Christ; my rule of faith is the Word of God, or Holy Bible, which, without a word altered, curtailed, or added, is the basis of my belief; and in this I am confirmed by the last few sentences of the Apocalypse, and the many distinct charges of the Apostles in their Epistles. The Roman Catholic Church not being based upon these principles, I do not believe in her dogmas, still less do I obey her in practice." The tribunal appeared astonished at these words, and the judge said to the prisoner, "Do you know what you are saying?" "Yes, sir," he replied in a firm voice,

"I cannot deny it; I have put my hand to the plough, and dare not look back." The judge was silent, and the tribunal rose.

INTERPOSITION OF SIR ROBERT PEEL.

To the Council of Granada was Matamoros referred, and on December 26, 1860, he set sail for Malaga, which he reached four days later. The same evening, when he was starting for Granada, numbers of friends and brethren accompanied him to the diligence, in which Sir Robert Peel, son of the great English statesman of the same name was also a passenger. On January 1st he arrived at his destination, and on appearing before the tribunal was ordered into solitary confinement. This tyrannical and arbitrary action coming to the ears of Sir Robert Peel, he immediately presented himself before the authorities and pleaded that the prisoner should be released from the intolerable conditions of his incarceration, and also that he, with Lady Emily Peel and Lady J. Hay, should be permitted to visit him.

The request was granted, and Matamoros having been removed from the filthy dungeon—where the only bed was a small foul mattress spread upon the floor—to a better apartment, he was visited by the distinguished English personages who had from motives of Christian sympathy interested themselves in his behalf. On leaving Granada, Sir R. Peel assured Matamoros that on his return to London he would speak about the matter in the British Parliament. Sir Robert kept his word, and by a singular coincidence another fact of a similar nature was made public about the same time.

AN EXILED DIVINITY STUDENT.

A letter published in the London papers gave many interesting statements concerning the imprisonment of Protestant Christians in Spain. The following is one of the instances described: "A young man of about twenty years of age named A—, belonging to a respectable family at Granada, was student at an ecclesiastical seminary presided over by the archbishop of that province. Having made rapid progress in his studies he became one of the favorite scholars of the rector and a protégé of the archbishop. A friend presented A— with a New Testament and two controversial works, which led him to renounce the errors of the Romish Church. He was reprimanded and kept in close confinement for a week; but his convictions remaining unchanged it was resolved that he should be arrested. His Protestant friends having heard of this advised him to escape to Gibraltar. He did so and is now a refugee in England. It was suspected that he was aided in his flight by José Alhama, a hatter at Granada, a man of high Christian character. Alhama was accordingly arrested, and carried off to a dungeon, his wife and family being wholly unprovided for.

"At midnight on February 6th four gendarmes, with their sergeant and a constable, entered the residence of Alhama and demanded all the keys to search the house. His wife was in bed seriously sick, but the emissaries of the priests had no compassion for her sufferings. They obliged her to rise, and searched the mattresses, boxes, trunks, beds, and the pockets of the clothes; for two hours the minute search continued; nothing, however, was found to incriminate the family, but several letters were found from Manuel Matamoros which increased the animosity already felt toward the writer and sufficed to convict Alhama."

CONVERSION OF SOME FELLOW-PRISONERS.

During Matamoros' imprisonment the Society of St. Vincent de Paul exhausted every possible means to induce him to retract his declaration of Protestant principles, but their attempts were unsuccessful. So far from Matamoros recanting, he commenced a Christian work in the prison which resulted in the conversion of at least three of the prisoners.

Every time that he was brought before the tribunals he boldly declared that his only crime had been that he had striven to be a follower of Christ and not of the Pope, and that the result of persecution would be to add some new names to the Christian martyrology. "Ten years of preaching," said Matamoros at this period, "would not have advanced our labor so much as our imprisonment and trial are doing. All are asking, 'What is this Protestant doctrine?' and they seek after our books from simple curiosity; and when they have read them, they condemn the cruelty of the clergy, and confess that we teach the true religion of the Son of God."

THE SEARCH IN THE PRISON CELL.

On March 7, 1861, after five months' imprisonment, seven police agents entered Matamoros' cell and began to search it minutely with great rudeness and harshness. Nothing was respected by them; the persons of the prisoners, their bedding, the sacking of their bedsteads, all were rigorously examined. They carried their search to the limit of absurdity by going so far as to empty the water in the pitchers. On the table lay a Bible and New Testament (the gift to Matamoros of Dr. Tregelles, of Plymouth, England), a copy of the Four Gospels with notes, and some tracts, among them being 'Andrew Dunn'; all of which were seized. All reasonings, supplications, and wishes for the return of, at least, the Bible, were equally unavailing.

INTEREST OF THE BRITISH PUBLIC.

Sir Robert Peel's denunciation and the publication of these additional facts thoroughly roused the English public, and loud protests were raised against this reign of terror to Protestants in Spain. Deputations waited on Earl Russell, the British Secretary of State, the newspapers willingly helped; daily the voice of public sympathy became more audible; and petitions were sent to the Houses of Parliament. But the Lord's time to deliver had not arrived; neither was this the way in which deliverance was to come. The oppressed continued to groan and sigh, but "their cries entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth."

MATAMOROS SENTENCED.

The punishment pronounced on the prisoners was officially announced to them on June 13, 1861; Alhama, Trigo, and Matamoros were condemned to eighteen years' punishment—nine at the galleys, and nine more under the constant vigilance of the civil authorities. Besides this, they were declared forever incapable of holding any office or official position, and also of teaching or instructing. Nine of the brethren were sentenced to seven years of the galleys, and another of them to four. In all, twenty-one followers of Christ were condemned in Granada alone; and with the exception of a few, against whom the charges were not proved, all were doomed by the tyranny under which they suffered to a dark and disastrous future.

MEETING IN ST. JAMES'S HALL, LONDON.

This same month a meeting was convened at St. James's Hall, London, presided over by Lord Shaftesbury, and attended by an influential and distinguished audience. Sir Robert Peel made a powerful speech, bringing before the public the errors that these Spanish Protestants were obliged to endure.

In the midst of the deep waters through which these Christian prisoners were passing, they were comforted and encouraged by Christian sympathy. God was day by day adding to the number of their friends who gladly supplied them with such comforts as prison discipline allowed, and wrote them letters full of consolation. Among these may be mentioned Mr. B. W. Newton, of London; Dr. and Mrs. Tregelles, of Plymouth; George Müller, of Bristol; and the Rev. R. Govett, of Norwich, to say nothing of a host of others whose untiring and rayerful sympathy proved invaluable. The Evangelical Alliance also sent General Alexander to intercede with the Spanish Prime Minister at Madrid, and the Rev. Mr. Dallas and Mr. Eade went on a mission from the Geneva Conference; but in spite of all remonstrances and appeals, the bars and bolts of priestly intolerance still firmly secured the prisoners.

A FALSE CHARGE.

In the beginning of July, 1861, an insurrection broke out at Loja, a quiet little town between Granada and Malaga. Nine thousand men, displaying a Republican standard, and proclaiming republican principles, appeared in arms. The enemies of Protestantism in Granada, taking advantage of the surprise and excitement of the public mind, assured the Government at Madrid that the insurrection bore evident marks of a Protestant origin, the rebels having raised the cry "Death to the Pope." Such reports, most industriously spread injuriously affected the cause of the prisoners.

Availing themselves of the panic produced, the enemies of Matamoros resolved, if possible, to incriminate him and his fellow-prisoners. For this purpose they promised a convict his liberty and a large sum of money if he would supply information against the Protestant prisoners. This man, fetched from the galleys for the purpose, was employed to carry food and water to the cells of Matamoros and Alhama. While thus engaged he contrived to steal a letter written by, and others addressed to, Matamoros, all of which he carried to the authorities. These letters were purely of a religious character, and contained no allusion whatever to politics, yet they were dishonorably used as a pretext for action.

REMOVED TO A DUNGEON.

Early, therefore, on July 8th, Matamoros was roused from his bed, and hurried off to a most loathsome dungeon. Alhama, too, and Trigo, were removed from the cells they were occupying, and placed in solitary confinement. For three days Matamoros struggled on in enfeebled health, but on the night of July 13 he was so ill that he begged for medical aid and medicine, but both were refused him. For eight days he lay there unable to rise, but at last, through God's mercy, the fever abated, and on July 25 he was dragged out to be examined by a military commission. Though the basest means, perjury and subornation, were employed by the authorities, the political charges were not established, otherwise he would have been put to death. As it was, he was again relegated to prison in prospect of aggravated and more bitter punishment. (The Picture in our Frontispiece, numbered 2, illustrates the Examination before the Tribunal.)

In a letter to an English friend, dated from the prison of the Audiencia, October 5th, 1862, Manuel Matamoros writes: "My enemies, not yet satisfied, have condemned me to suffer eight years of the galleys, to inhabilitation, and to the judgment of all costs. I am only twenty-seven, and I am going to the galleys—to a horrible place which is intended for the shame and sorrow of those who labor there. But there is neither shame nor sorrow for me! My soul rejoices in Jesus, I, a poor miserable sinner, have been chosen by the Lord to suffer; and in this there is no shame, but honor for me, and I am very grateful to my Master who has granted it me."

In the spring of 1863, Mr. William Greene, the Englishman mentioned in the earlier part of this sketch, was permitted to visit Matamoros in the prison at Granada. Alhama, Trigo, and some others were also allowed to spend a short time in the cell. They read the Scriptures together, and Matamoros himself prayed with extraordinary fervor. (The picture on our front page numbered 3, depicts this event.) The Supper of the Lord was likewise celebrated. Mr. Greene says: "After the last loving embrace we parted, and as I descended the hill from the prison I saw this dear witness for Jesus stretching out his arms between the bars of his window, to wave me his last farewell. Oh, how indelibly is impressed upon my memory that noble countenance, beaming with love, from behind that grim grating!"

COMMUTATION OF MATAMOROS' SENTENCE.

As a consequence of an influential deputation of the Evangelical Alliance to the Queen of Spain, Matamoros' sentence was commuted, and his liberation from the prison of Granada took place early in the morning of May 29th, 1863. He arrived—sick and enfeebled by his long imprisonment, prematurely aged, and with the seeds of death sowed by confinement in a damp unwholesome dungeon slowly working in his constitution—at Malaga, and proceeded thence to Gibraltar, which was reached on May 31st. After passing a few days there, he determined to visit England, and embarked for London on June 22d. Having encountered a rough passage along the coast of Spain and Portugal, they experienced finer weather in crossing the Bay of Biscay, and finally, on June 30th, entered the mouth of the Thames, and at length Matamoros arrived in London.

Of his subsequent career we can say but little. He commenced Christian work at Lausanne, in Switzerland, and at Bayonne and Bordeaux, in France, by establishing schools for Spanish young men who felt themselves called to the work of evangelistic effort in Spain. He commenced with six pupils, and the students appeared to vie with each other in their emulation to be among the number of the future preachers of the Gospel in their native land. An institution for training young Spanish women was also opened at Pau. Having organized the work at the above-mentioned places, Matamoros went to Paris to make some arrangements; but the long railway journey from Pau, and much speaking and exertion while in the French capital, prostrated him. He returned to Lausanne on May 3d, 1866. Here he enlisted the sympathy of an affluent American lady, who with ready enthusiasm listened to his views concerning his much-loved country, and helped him in bringing twelve more young Spaniards to be educated at Pau.

CONSECRATED BY THE FREE CHURCH.

Matamoros, at his own desire, was consecrated by the Free Church of the Canton de Vaud, though they considered that he had, through the sufferings and persecutions he had endured in his long imprisonment, received from the Lord a higher consecration than theirs. But he now appeared to be gradually sinking, and from the beginning of June his friends became seriously alarmed for his health. It was deemed desirable to remove him to the Hotel Gibbon, where Mrs. McE—, his American friend, was staying, and until the moment of his death she rendered him constant and invaluable attention.

The decline of the invalid's strength was very rapid, and nothing could arrest the progress of the disease. The lungs, heart, and liver were completely disorganized, breathing was difficult, and he passed restless nights, almost without sleep. After a medical consultation it was announced to him tenderly by a friend that he might be carried off in a few days, but he replied very calmly, "Bueno! Al cielo!" ("It is well! To heaven!") A celebrated doctor of Lausanne having said that there was a ray of hope, if a suitable private dwelling-house on an eminence were secured, that Matamoros' breathing might be improved and his sufferings be rendered less intense, a beautiful villa overlooking the placid lake of Geneva was kindly lent, free of all charge, by its Christian owner, and the patient was removed to it.

The name of the new abode was Belvedere. His friends there procured him an invalid's carriage, in which he was drawn about on the green turf, abundant in its lovely garden. This gentle exercise and the magnificent view and the pleasant flowers were highly esteemed by Matamoros, and much alleviated his sufferings. (The picture numbered 4 on our front page represents Matamoros in the garden.)

HIS PEACEFUL DEATH.

On the morning of his death, and after passing a troubled night, he said to friends who were near him, "From earth to heaven, by the way of Golgotha. It is a beautiful journey." The Spanish students in the locality having been summoned to his chamber, he asked them to sing, and endeavored to accompany them with his dying voice. He afterward said to them, "Live very near to God—yes, very, very near. May God bless you very much." He was exhausted, and his head fell on his breast. All around him were bathed in tears. It was midday. The young people had left, and only the elder ones had remained with Mrs. McE—. Matamoros appeared to be asleep. After a few moments he awoke, and addressed some words of blessing and farewell.

After this conversation he fell asleep, and one of the Swiss pastors prayed by his bed. But none knew whether he heard the voice of supplication, or whether his soul were not then already contemplating the face of Christ in Heaven. His death was very tranquil, for God in His infinite mercy took away all pain. A storm was raging, and while the thunders rolled in the distance, on the sleeper's placid face rested a heavenly calm. At about half-past two in the afternoon there was no sign of earthly life remaining; the heavenly life in Jesus' bosom had commenced.

UP AND DOWN.

HAPPY Paul! Could you really accommodate yourself to all circumstances in life? Could you go up without pride, and could you come down without exasperation? Teach the same lesson to us all.

We are at a season of the year when vast populations in all our cities are changing residence. Having been born in a house, and having all our lives lived in a house, we do not have full appreciation of

WHAT A HOUSE IS.

It is the growth of thousands of years. The human race first lived in clefts of rocks, the beasts of the field moving out of the caverns to let the human race move in. The shepherds and the robbers still live in caverns of the earth. The Troglodites are a race which to this day prefer the caverns to a house. They are warm, they are large, they are very comfortable, they are less subject to violent changes of heat and cold. We come on along down in the history of the race, and we come to the lodge, which was a home built out of twisted tree branches. We come further on down in the history of the race, and we come to the tent, which was a home built with a round pole in the centre and skins of animals reaching out in all directions, mats on the floor for the people to sit on.

Time passed on and the world, after much invention, came to build the house, which was a space surrounded by broad stones against which the earth was heaped from the outside. The roof was made of chalk and gypsum and coals and stones and ashes pounded together. After a while the porch was born. After a while the gate. Then hundreds of years passed on, and in the fourteenth century the modern chimney was constructed. The old Hebrews had openings in their houses from which the smoke might escape if it preferred, but there was no inducement offered for it to leave until the modern chimney. Wooden keys opened the door, or the keyhole was large enough to allow the finger to be inserted for the lifting of the latch or the sliding it.

There being no windows the people were dependent for light upon lattice work, over which a thin veil was drawn down in time of winter to keep out the elements. Window glass was, so late as two or three hundred years ago in England and Scotland, so great a luxury that only the very wealthiest could afford it. A hand-mill and an oven and a few leathern bottles and some rude pitchers and plates made up the entire equipment of the culinary department.

But the home planted in the old cave, or at the foot of a tent pole, has grown and enlarged and spread abroad until we have the modern house, with its branches and roots, and vast girth and height and depth of comfort and accommodation. Architecture in other days busied itself chiefly in planning and building triumphal arches and basilicas and hippodromes and mausoleums and columns, while they allowed the people for residences to burrow like muskrats in the earth. St. Sophia, of Constantinople, St. Mark's, of Venice, St. Peter's, of Rome, are only the Raphael walls against which lean the squalor and the pauperism of many nations.

I rejoice that while our modern architects give us grand capitols in which to legislate, and grand court houses in which to administer justice, and grand churches in which to worship God, they also give much of their time to the planning of comfortable abodes for our tired population. I have not so much interest in the Arch of Titus at Beneventum as I have in the wish that all the people may have a comfortable shelter; nor have I so much interest in the Temple of Jupiter Olympus at Athens as I have in the hope that every man may have an altar for the worship of the true God in his own house. And I have not so much interest in the science of ceramics, which goes crazy over a twisted vase or a queer-handled jug in use three thousand years ago, or a pitcher out of which the ancient Pharaohs poured their drunken debauch, as I have that every man have on his table a plate with plenty of healthful food and an appetite to attack it.

THANK GOD FOR YOUR HOME

—not merely the house you live in now, but the house you were born in, and the many houses you have resided in since you began your earthly residence. When you go home to-day count over the number of those houses in which you have resided, and you will be surprised. Once in a while you will find a man who lives in the house where he was born, and where his father was born, and his grandfather was born, and his great-grandfather was born; but that is not one out of a thousand cases. I have not been more perambulatory than most people, but I was amazed when I came to count up the number of residences I have occupied. The fact is, there is in this world no such thing as permanent residence.

In a private vehicle, and not in a rail car, from which you can see but little, I rode from New York to Yonkers and Tarrytown on the banks of the Hudson—the finest ride on the planet for a man who wants to see palatial residences in fascinating scenery. It was in the early spring and before the gentlemen of New York had gone out to their country residences. I rode into the grounds to admire the gardens, and the overseer of the place told me—and they all told me—that all the houses had been sold, or that they wanted to sell them, and there was literally no exception, although I called at many places, just admiring the gardens and the grounds and the palatial residences.

Some wanted to sell, or had sold, because of financial misfortune, or because their wives did not want to reside in the summer time in those places while their husbands tarried in town in the night, always having some business on hand keeping them away. From some houses the people had been shaken out by chills and fever, from some houses they had gone because death or misfortune had occurred, and all those palaces and mansions had either changed occupants or wanted to change.

Take up the City Directory of New York and tell me how few families live on Fifth Avenue and Madison Avenue who lived there fifteen or twenty years ago. Take up the City Directory of Brooklyn and tell me how few people live on the Heights or on the Hill who lived there fifteen or twenty years ago. There is no such thing as permanent residence.

A few days ago I saw Monticello, of Virginia, President Jefferson's residence, and I saw on the same day Montpelier, which was either Madison's or Monroe's residence, and I saw also the White House, which was President Taylor's residence, and President Harrison's residence, and President Lincoln's residence, and President Garfield's residence. Was it a permanent residence in any case?

I tell you that the race is nomadic, and no sooner gets in one place than it wants to change for another place, or is compelled to change for another place, and so the race invented the railroad and the steamboat in order more rapidly to get into some other place than that in which it was then. Aye, instead of being nomadic, it is immortal, moving on and moving on. We whip up our horses and hasten on until the hub of the front wheel shivers on the tombstone and tips us headlong into the grave, the only permanent earthly residence. But bless God, even that stay is limited, for we shall have a resurrection.

To-morrow the streets will be filled with the furniture carts and the drays and the trucks. It will be for horses, because they will be overloaded. It will be a hard day for laborers, for they will over-lift before they get the family furniture from one house to another. It will be a hard day for housekeepers to see their furniture scratched, and their crockery broken, and their carpets misfit, and their furniture dashed of the sudden showers. It will be a hard day for landlords. It will be a hard day for tenants.

Especial grace is needed for moving day. Many a man's religion has suffered a fearful strain between the hour on the morning of the first of May when he took his immature breakfast, and the hour at night when he rolled into his extemporized couch. The furniture broken sometimes will result in the breaking of the ten commandments. There is no more fearful post than the hall of a house where two families meet, one moving out, and the other moving in! The salutation is apt to be more vehement than complimentary. The grace that will be sufficient for the first of January, and the first of February, and the first of March, and the first of April, will not be sufficient for the first of May.

Say your prayers to-morrow morning if you find nothing better to kneel down by than a coal scuttle, and say your prayers at night though your knee comes down on a paper of carpet tacks! You will want supernatural help to-morrow, if any of you move. Help in the morning to start out aright on the day's work. Help at night to repent. There will be enough annoyances to make a Xantippe out of a Frances Ridley Havergal. I have again and again been in crisis of moving day, and I have stood appalled and amazed and helpless in the shipwreck, taking as well as I could those things that floated ashore from the breakers, and I know how to comfort and how to warn and how to encourage the people; so I preach this practical May-day sermon.

All these troubles will soon be gone, and the bruises will heal, and the stiffened joints will become supple, and your ruffled temper will be smoothed of its wrinkles, and order will take the place of disorder, and you will sit down in your new home seriously to contemplate.

THE MOVE UPWARD.

I. My first word then in this part of my discourse is to all those who move out of small houses into larger ones. Now we will see whether, like the apostle, you know how to abound. Do not, because your new house has two more stories than the old one add two stories to your vanity, or make your brightly polished silver door-plate the coffin plate to your buried humility. Many persons moving into a larger house have become arrogant and supercilious. They swagger where once they walked, they simper where once they laughed, they go about with an air which seems to say, "Let all smaller craft get out of these waters if they don't want to be run over by a regular Cunarder."

I have known people who were kind and amiable and Christian in their smaller house—no sooner did they go over the doorsill of the new house than they became a glorified nuisance. They were the terror of dry-goods clerks and the amazement of ferryboats into which they swept; and if compelled to stand a moment with condemnatory glance turning all the people seated into criminals and convicts. They began to hunt up the family coat of arms, and had lion couchant, or unicorn rampant on the carriage door; when if they had the appropriate coat of arms it would have been a butter firkin, or a shoe last, or a plough, or a trowel.

Instead of being like all the rest of us, made out of dust, they would have you think that they were trickled out of Heaven on a lump of loaf sugar. The first thing you know of them, the father will fail in business, and the daughter will run off with a French dancing master. A woman spoiled by a finer house is bad enough, but a man so upset is sickening. The lavendered fool goes around so dainty and so precise and so affected in the roll of his eyes, or the whirl of his cane, or the clicking of the ivory handle against his front teeth, or his effeminate languor, and his conversation so interlarded with "oh's" and "ah's" that he is to me a dose of ipecacuanha.

Now, my friends, if you move into a larger house, thank God for more room—for more room to hang your pictures, for more room in which to gather your friends, for more room in which to let your children romp and play, for more room for great bookcases filled with good reading, or wealth of bric-à-brac. Have as large and as fine a house as you can afford to have, but do not sacrifice your humility and your common sense, do not lose your balance, do not be spoiled by your successes.

Two or three years ago, we were the guests on AN ENGLISH MANOR.

The statuary, the ferneries, the botanical and horticultural genius of the place had done all they could do to make the place attractive. For generations there had been an amassing of plate and costly surroundings. At half past nine o'clock in the morning, the proprietor of the estate had the bell rung, and some twenty or thirty men servants and maid servants came in to prayers. The proprietor of the estate read the Scriptures, gave out the hymn, started the music, his daughter at the organ, and then the music over, the proprietor of the estate knelt down and commended all his guests, all his family, all his employes to the Lord Almighty.

God can trust such a man as that with a large estate. He knows how to abound. He trusted God and God trusted him. And I could call off the roll of fifty merchant princes as mighty for God as they are mighty in worldly successes. Ah my friends, do not be puffed up by any of the successes of this life, do not be spoiled by the number of liveried coachmen that may stop at your door, or the sweep of the long trail across the imported tapestry. Many of those who come to your house are fawning parasites. They are not so much in love with you as they are in love with your house and your successes. You move down next year to 320 Low-Water-Mark Street, and see how many of their carriages will halt at your door.

TIMON OF ATHENS

was a wealthy lord, and all the mighty men and women of the land came and sat at his banquet, proud to sit there, and they drank deep to his health. They sent him costly presents. He sent costlier presents back again, and there was no man in all the land so admired as Timon of Athens, the wealthy lord. But after a while, through lavish hospitality, or through betrayal, he lost everything. Then he sent for help to those lords whom he had banqueted and to whom he had given large sums of money, Lucullus, Lucius, Sempronius and Ventidius.

Did those lords send any help to him? O, no. Lucullus said when he was applied to, "Well, I thought that Timon would come down, he was too lavish; let him suffer for his recklessness." Lucius said, "I would be very glad to help Timon, but I have made large purchases and my means are all absorbed." And one lord sent one excuse and another lord sent another excuse. But to the astonishment of everybody, after a while Timon proclaimed another feast. Those lords said to themselves: "Why, either Timon has had a good turn of fortune, or he has been deceiving us, testing our love." And so they all flocked to the banquet apologetic for seeming lukewarmness. The guests were all seated at the table, and Timon ordered the covers lifted. The covers lifted, there was nothing under them but smoking hot water. Then Timon said to his guests, "Dogs, lap! lap, dogs!" and under the terrific irony they fed the room, while Timon pursued them with his anathema, calling them fools of fortune, destroyers of happiness under a mask, hurling at the same time the pitchers and the chalices after them.

O! my friends, I would not want to make you over-suspicious in the day of your success, but I want you to understand right well there is a vast difference between the popularity of Timon, the prosperous, and Timon, the unfortunate—I want you to know there is a vast difference in the number of people who admire a man when he is going up, and the number of people who admire him when he is going down.

THE MOVE DOWNWARD.

II. But I must have a word with those who in this May-day time move out of larger residences into smaller. Sometimes the pathetic reason is that the family has dwindled in size and so much room is not required, so they move out into smaller apartments. I know there are such cases. Marriage has taken some of the members of the family, death has taken other members of the family, and after a while, father and mother wake up to find their family just the size it was when they started, and they would be lonesome and lost in a large house; hence they move out of it.

Moving day is a great sadness to such if they have the law of association dominant. There are the rooms named after the different members of the family. I suppose it is so in all your households. It is so in mine; we name the rooms after the persons who occupy them. And then there is the dining hall where the festivities took place, the holiday festivities; there is the sitting-room where the family met night after night, and there is the room sacred because there a life started, or a life stopped; the Alpha and the Omega of some earthly existence. Scene of meeting and parting, of congratulation and heart break. Every door-knob, every fresco, every mantel, every threshold meaning more to you than it can ever mean to any one else.

When moving out of a house I have always been in the habit, after everything was gone, of going into each room and bidding it a mute farewell. There will be tears running down many cheeks tomorrow that the carmen will not be able to understand. It is a solemn and a touching and an overwhelming thing to leave places forever—places where we have struggled and toiled and wept and sung and prayed and anxiously watched and agonized.

O! life is such a strange mixture of honey and of gall, weddings and burials, midnoon and midnight clashing. Every home a lighthouse against which the billows of many seas tumble. Thank God these changes are not always going to continue, otherwise the nerves would give out and the brain would founder on a dementia like that of King Lear when his daughter Cordelia came to medicine his domestic calamities.

But there are others who will move out of large residences into smaller through the reversal of fortune. The property must be sold, or the bailiff will sell it, or the income is less and you cannot pay the house rent. First of all, such persons should understand that our happiness is not dependent on the size of the house we live in. I have known people enjoy and others suffer a pandemonium in twenty. There is as much happiness in a small house as in a large house. There is as much satisfaction under the light of a tallow candle as under the glare of chandelier all the burners at full blaze. Who was the happier, John Bunyan in Bedford Jail, or Belshazzar in the saturnalia?

Contentment is something you can neither rent nor purchase. It is not extrinsic, it is intrinsic. Are there fewer rooms in the house to which you move; you will have less to take care of. Is it to be stove instead of furnace? all the doctors say the modern modes of warming buildings are unhealthy. Is it less pier mirrors? Less temptation to your vanity. Is it old-fashioned toilet instead of water pipes all through the house? Less to freeze and burst when you cannot get a plumber. Is it less carriage? More room for robust exercise. Is it less social position? Fewer people who want to drag you down by their jealousies. Is it less fortune to leave in your last will and testament? Less to spoil your children. Is it less money for the marketing? Less temptation to ruin the health of your family with pineapples and indigestible salads. Is it a little deaf? Not hearing so many disagreeables.

I meet you to-morrow at the door of your new home, and while I help you lift the clothes closet over the banisters, and the carman is getting red in the face in trying to transport that article of furniture to some new destination, I congratulate you. You are going to have a better time this year, some of you, than you have ever had. You take God and the Christian religion in your home and you will be grandly happy. God in the parlor—that will sanctify your sociabilities. God in the nursery—that will protect your children. God in the dining hall—that will make the plainest meal an imperial banquet. God in the morning—that will launch the day brightly from the dry docks. God in the evening—that will sail the day sweetly into the harbor. And get joy, one and all of you, whether you move or do not move.

Get joy out of the thought that we are soon all going to have

A GRAND MOVING DAY.

Do you want a picture of the new house into which you will move? Here it is, wrought with the hand of a master: "We know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." How much rent will we have to pay for it? We are going to own it. How much must we pay for it? how much cash down? and how much left on mortgage? Our Father is going to give it as a free gift. When are we going to move into it? We are moving now.

Heads of families are very apt to stay in the old house until they have seen everything off. They send ahead the children and they send ahead the treasures and the valuables. Then after a while they will come themselves. I remember very well in the country that in boyhood moving day was a jubilation. On almost the first load we, the children, were sent on ahead to the new house and we arrived with shout and laughter, and in an hour we had ranged through every room in the house, the barn, and the granary.

Toward night, and perhaps in the last wagon, father and mother would come, looking very tired, and we would come down to the foot of the lane to meet them and tell them of all the wonders we discovered in the new place, and then, the last wagon unloaded, the candles lighted, our neighbors who had helped us to move—for in those times neighbors helped each other—came in and sat down with us at a table on which there was every luxury they could think of.

Well, my dear Lord knows that some of us have been moving a good while. We have sent our children ahead, we have sent many of our valuables ahead, sent many treasures ahead. We cannot go yet. There is work for us to do; but after a while it will be toward night and we will be very tired, and then we will start for and those who have gone ahead of us, they will see our approach, and they will come down the lane to meet us, and they will have much to tell us of what they have discovered in the "house of many mansions," and of how large the rooms are and of how bright the fountains.

And then, the last load unloaded, the table will be spread and our celestial neighbors will come in to sit down with our reunited families, and the chalices will be full, not with the wine that sweats in the vat of earthly intoxication, but with "the new wine of the kingdom." And there for the first time we will realize what fools we were on earth when we feared to die, since death has turned out only to be the moving from a smaller house into a larger one, and the exchange of a pauper's hut for a prince's castle, and the going upstairs from a miserable kitchen to a glorious parlor. O! house of God not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens!

SYLPH SOMERS.

The March to Gorey—A Providential Meeting—Captain Vaughan Recognized by the Soldiers—The History of the Insurrection—The Attack on Vinegar Hill—Meeting with Hugh—His Narrative—The Flight to Wexford—Refuge on the Ships—An Incompetent Officer—Treachery on the Ships.

THE Captain and Sylph in front, and Corny close behind (the militiamen, with shouldered arms, on each side of them) were soon on their way for the decision of the military authorities at Gorey.

Corporal M'Ardle, filled with contempt for his prisoners, and a good deal chagrined at their escape from his jurisdiction, by an appeal to a higher power, could not suppress his feelings concerning them, and in an undertone, yet sufficiently loud to be heard by all, gave expression every now and then to his opinions.

"Hatchet-faced dog," he muttered looking at Captain Vaughan. "Shure any wan with half an eye could tell what he iz, a black-hearted and blood-thirsty rebel. I'd lay my life, that if all war known, its manny and manny a good loyal man that has got his death be him. Shure he's just the man that wud count no divarshun so sweet as the pikin' o' the King's thrue subjects. Indeed, I'm right glad we didn't shoot 'im, it 'id hev been a death tin times too good for him, and it's hangin' like a cur-dog that he'll git in Gorey.

"And this rebel in petticoats, beside him," he added, directing his look towards Sylph, "with all her purtinces to be a lady, is, not a doubt ov it, just as bad as her comrade. With all her dainty steps and mock modesty, there isn't an ace to choose be-tune them. And, wan that like mysel' can look into things, wud know that her purty face has beneath it a black and wicked heart."

Captain Vaughan and Sylph several times endeavored to rebuke and check this overflow of abusive accusation, and sought to show the evil-tongued corporal the meanness, foolishness, and most unchristian nature of his conduct, assailing the character of persons for the moment totally in his power and wholly unknown to him, and in terms unbecoming a civilized being, not to speak of one who, they supposed, professed Christianity.

Remonstrance, however, was useless, indeed worse than useless, it only excited the anger of the corporal and gave new spur to his rude reproaches.

An effectual termination to his gross and contemptuous epithets, however, was at hand. When a quarter of a mile from Gorey, a cavalry picket met them on the road, and Captain Vaughan to his great delight saw that the uniform of the horse-men was that of his own dragoon regiment, the Ancient Britons. To his greater satisfaction, still, he perceived when he drew nearer that the men on duty were from his own company, the men whom, with Hugh as his orderly, he had left near Prosperous, when sent with despatches some weeks before this to Duncannon Fort. Captain Vaughan's division of the Ancient Britons was now in Gorey, and hence it came about that these, his own men from his own troop, were now on patrol upon the highway, watching and guarding this approach to the town.

Captain Vaughan joyfully whispered to Sylph the discovery he had made, but kept the knowledge of it from Corporal M'Ardle; he wished to give him a startling surprise, and a lesson which he hoped would be useful to him for the remainder of his life.

Knowing that the moment of his liberation had come, now that he saw approaching a company of his own regiment, and not wishing to be recognized sooner than he desired, Captain Vaughan drew around him the large frieze coat which Farmer Dunne had given him, when he began his flight from the infuriated rebels, and thus concealed his uniform.

When he and his party arrived close up to the dragoons, he suddenly threw back his disguise, looked up into the faces of his men, and calling them by name, he said, "If you are as glad, men, to see me as I am to see you, you'll be immensely happy."

"It's the captain. It's the captain," they shouted. "Who in the world could expect it? Thank God, sir. Why, we heard, sir, that you were killed by the rebels near Enniscorthy." And two or three of the men, not content with speaking their joy on horseback, dismounted and ran up to their restored officer, whom as a kind Christian gentleman they respected.

The effect upon Corporal M'Ardle of this recognition and greeting may be imagined. He stared, terror-stricken, and turned pale and trembled at his blind assurance. Captain Vaughan observed his tremor. Pity for the wretched man dictated pardon for his foolish self-confidence, but his future good demanded some kind of punishment.

"Come here, corporal," he said, "and make your report and transfer your prisoners."

Corporal M'Ardle, laying down his musket on the ground, came forward as he had been told, but when he drew near Sylph and the captain, he flung himself on his knees, and in piteous tones entreated forgiveness.

Upon reaching Gorey, Captain Vaughan sent Corny and Sylph on to Dublin, under a sufficient escort, there to remain until God, in His kind Providence, would enable him to rejoin them. He himself determined to abide with his regiment, to give his services in the suppression of the insurrection.

Those who are acquainted with the thrilling history of the rebellion of '98, will know that Captain Vaughan's sword was soon called into requisition. On the 9th of June, a desperate assault of the rebels was made upon Gorey, under the leadership of Father Michael Murphy and his brother priests. Twice the insurgents were driven back by the soldiery. Father Michael, with a contempt of death, then seized a standard, blazoned with a cross and the motto "Liberty or Death," and, on horseback, dashed out upon the road amid a storm of round shot and musket bullets. Taking from his pocket a handful of balls, which he declared he had caught in their flight, he cried to his hesitating followers, "Come on, boys; see, the heretic bullets cannot hurt you. You are fighting for your God and Holy Church."

Captain Vaughan, in mingled admiration and disgust, both saw and heard him. In another moment, however, the wild fanatic priest was hurled into ruin; a round shot caught him and his horse; and after it passed, nothing was to be seen on the spot where he had waved his flag but a shapeless mass of blood-stained rags and mangled flesh. Deprived of their leader the rebels sullenly and slowly drew back, leaving the ground covered with their dead.

The 20th of June saw Captain Vaughan near Vinegar Hill. Oh, what thoughts came in upon him as he again looked upon the blood-stained heights! but on this occasion the rebels were to be the assailed and not the assailants. General Lake had completed his dispositions for storming their camp at daybreak. On three sides the royal army, all moving at once, forced its way up the hill, cleared it after a hard fight, and, with terrible slaughter, drove the rebels down the southern decline before them.

Father John, who, as we know, had been rebel dictator for the time, savage and in despair hastened away with a crowd of fugitives. After many hair-breadth escapes he put himself at the head of a roving gang of murderous banditti, who, doubling backward and forward between Wexford and Wicklow, protracted through the summer the miserable struggle. Separated from his companions by accident, or in design withdrawing from them, he was recognized, though disguised, at Taghmon, near his old parish. When arrested, he struggled like a wild beast, but the vengeance he had dared had overtaken him. After a month of murder, triumph, defeat, and ruin, he closed his career on the gallows on June 26th.

When the royal army, after its victory at Vinegar Hill, moved on to Wexford, Captain Vaughan, came upon his old friends, Mr. and Mrs. Somerville, and his orderly, Hugh. This latter individual gave him an intensely warm welcome, and on the first opportunity, furnished him with an account of affairs in Wexford since, falling back with the royalists in their retreat, he entered it. What follows is actual history.

"On the day of our sore and sorrowful retreat from Enniscorthy, captain," said Hugh, "everything was in that condition of confusion and dread, that we did not miss you on the road, until a return upon our route to look you up would have been useless, and, indeed, altogether impossible. The tide of wretched fugitives on their way to Wexford was so strong and full, that to stem it was not for one moment to be thought of.

"Oh! what a state of distraction I was in upon missing you! A dreadful anxiety for you and Miss Sylph possessed me, on the one hand, and the care of those I was escorting—I mean Miss Abigail, the maid, and the three little children—pressing upon me with a heavy load of responsibility, on the other. I protest I didn't know what to do—whether to go back alone, at all risks, and search you and Miss Sylph out, or remain at my post, and fulfil the task directly incumbent upon me. In my doubt and consternation I asked guidance of our Heavenly Father, if I never did before, and besought, for Christ's sake, that I might be shown what to do.

"After some moments of hesitancy, the light seemed to dawn upon me, and I concluded, captain, to remain with those I had in charge, and continue the retreat, feeling persuaded that thus to act would meet with your approval, sir. Yet, with all my heart, I prayed for your safety—for yours, captain, and Miss Sylph's, you know—and commended you both to the Lord's kind protection. And see how He has answered my supplication."

"Yes, my faithful Hugh," said Captain Vaughan, "you cannot imagine the fearful scenes we have passed through since last I saw you. I have been repeatedly on the very brink of an awful death, but God cast His sacred shield around me, and here I am, to-day, safe and well, and right glad to see you. But I long to know something of your own experiences, Hugh. How has it fared with you, my friend? Come, tell me some of the thrilling events that befel you in Wexford."

"Well, indeed," answered Hugh, "I cannot say I have dreamed of such sights as have come before me. Why, I have witnessed and passed through circumstances that I never can forget through life, and which, I believe, I shall remember in eternity.

"When we—the whole crowd of us—men, women, and children, combatants and non-combatants, reached Wexford, as we did in the early morning, we found the town in the greatest state of terror and excitement. All the day before, fugitives from the wide district round had flocked in breathless, and pale with fright, bearing with them tales of fell destruction and heartless massacre.

"One lady told us, captain, how the rebels, breaking into her house when her husband was out on service with the yeomanry, and ransacking everything, took the orange-bordered screen in her drawing-room as a just ground of instant death to her and all her household.

"I and my household only escaped murder," said the lady, "upon the plea of another rebel, that immediate death would be a too merciful punishment for such wretches, and that we should be reserved for a lingering and torturing mode of execution. This cruel intention proved, however, the means of our safety," she said; "for while the rebels were busy in their plunder, and some of them getting intoxicated in the wine cellar, I, and those dear to me, took the opportunity of flight; and here, through the unfailing mercy and kindness of God, we have arrived, with life, indeed, but with the loss of everything else that belonged to us."

"Such was the tale of one fugitive," said Hugh; "and what was the effect, think you, of a hundred such tales brought into Wexford throughout the whole of that day. And when the evening came, there was no lessening of the terror, captain, for the burning houses of Enniscorthy, twelve miles away, filled the whole heavens toward the north of Wexford with an angry glow. What that meant they had not to wait very long to know. Our arri-al toward dawn brought the tidings of defeat to the loyal cause, and of Enniscorthy, the greater part reduced to ashes, indeed, in the hands of the wicked Father John and the rebels.

"The impulse of each one was to seek safety at once, and anywhere. And the ships in the harbor appeared to most of us the best means of refuge. Down to the quays, therefore, hundreds on hundreds of us hurried. And it was then I came upon Mr. and Mrs. Somerville, whom I hadn't seen for two days. And they, like the rest, were bargaining with the ship masters for a passage across the Channel to Wales.

"Oh! what sums o' money, to be sure, these extortionate fellows pocketed for the use of their vessels!" exclaimed Hugh. "Skin for skin; all that a man hath will he give for his life." Well, anyway, this day proved that for once, at all events, the father of lies spoke what was truth. For not a few gave all they had to get a berth, ay! even standing room, in a vessel for Wales. While those who for this purpose parted with half their wealth, cannot, it's my notion, be numbered.

"Between ourselves, captain, Father John was a general too good to have for an enemy; our leaders, without doubt o' it, made a regular mess of it. Why, when Colonel Maxwell sent off to Duncannon Fort for a reinforcement, what did Colonel Fawcett, who was there with two regiments, do? He sent on before him a lot o' men with two guns, to make haste, while he himself loitered on the road. And what happened?

"Why, Father John, at the Three Rocks, surprised an' surrounded them. Above, below, before, behind, the rebels were upon them, yelling like hyenas. Five hundred muskets flashed death in the darkness. No quarter was given, and the soldiers—all but a few artillerymen, who were kept alive to serve the captured guns—perished to a man.

"Our Colonel Maxwell, when all was over, marched out of Wexford, not knowing what had happened, hoping to meet the reinforcement he had sent for on the road. He met not the force he had sent for—no, captain—but, arrived at the Three Rocks, he found Father John in a position too strong for him, with his small force, to dislodge. Back again, then, we marched to Wexford, and there all the citizens—Catholic and Protestant—who had property to lose, and feared that the town would be set on fire, entreated Colonel Maxwell not to defend it, but to leave. He refused, brave man, to consent to this, and ordered us all to our posts.

"But in the end he had to submit. The militia, hy fifties and sixties, deserted us, and our game was up. At midnight, on the 30th of May (1798), Colonel Maxwell marched his remaining men from out the town, and that was only thirty-six hours after he had entered it; and next morning the rebels took possession.

THE LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES.

S.S. Lesson for May 14, Mark 8 : 1-21. Golden Text, Luke 12 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT was the unvarying experience of Jesus and His disciples that their teaching and their works of healing attracted large multitudes of people to them. Their sojourn in the coasts of Decapolis was no exception, the multitude was very great, and so intent on receiving both instruction and deliverance at the hands of Jesus, that the people had been three days in the wilderness without hoard or lodging. The very fact that the pangs of hunger did not so assert their sway as that these people were unable longer to keep up their attention, is a striking proof of the practical nature of that blessed truth, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth from the mouth of God" (Deut. 8 : 3 ; Matt. 5 : 4). When Moses was in the mountain "forty days and forty nights, he did neither eat bread, nor drink water" (Ex. 34 : 28); there was power in the Word of God to sustain him, soul and body. It was the same with Elijah in the desert (1 Kings 19 : 8), and with our Lord Himself in the days of His sore temptation. And how often has a weary invalid made an effort to join some meeting where the Word of God was spoken in the power of the Spirit, and has experienced

STRENGTHENING INSTEAD OF FATIGUE.

How often working-men have found physical and spiritual refreshment in seeking blessing to the souls of others after a hard day's work, in a measure in which no other kind of recreation could afford it!

As in a former instance, the Lord Jesus was the first to consider, and to provide for, the physical needs of His hearers. He "called His disciples unto Him, and saith unto them, I have compassion on the multitude, because they have now been with me three days, and have nothing to eat : and if I send them away fasting to their own houses, they will faint by the way : for divers of them came from far." There may be times of supernatural strength like those which we have quoted, but we are not on that account to draw unnecessarily on the physical strength of others. For instance, when God calls us distinctly to spend a whole night or a whole day alone with Him in prayer, we may be sure the needful physical force will be imparted ; but we doubt the wisdom of holding "all nights of prayer ;" they may be very enjoyable, but we think, unless there is some special call from God, that they are apt to lay open those engaged in them to special temptation through excitement at the time, and over-fatigue afterward. Some may say, "But I need to have a longer time with God than I can have in an ordinary meeting." Thank God for the desire, and get up at three o'clock in the morning to have some time alone with God ; you will test then whether it is really His presence or that of your fellow-Christians which makes your real joy.

The disciples answered just as though the Lord had never fed the multitude on the other side of the lake. Could it have passed away from their memories ! Has His last deliverance on your behalf, my reader, passed away from your mind ? They said, "From whence can a man satisfy these men with bread here in the wilderness?" Jesus Himself had asked and answered this question on the former occasion (John 6 : 5). From whence ? Surely from the resources of Him who had before multiplied the loaves ; but this did not occur to them. Asa had been marvellously helped against his strong enemies, but when Baasha, King of Israel, came up against him, he sought help from Benhadad, King of Syria, and God reproved him. Later on he was smitten with disease, "yet in his disease he sought not to the Lord but to the physicians" (2 Chron. 15 : 1-12). The God who had delivered him out of the hands of the Ethiopians had a right to his confidence when Baasha came against him and when disease overtook him. One deliverance from God is a warrant to expect Him to deliver at all time, because He changes not, He is always the same. With the Lord Jesus proceeded to ask the disciples what was their present supply ; and though it was larger than on the former occasion, and the multitude, reckoning women and children, not so large, they do not seem to have expected that Jesus would interpose on their behalf. He provided for the multitude, and reserved the teaching of His disciples until the present need was met. It was but a repetition of what had formerly occurred. He took the loaves, gave thanks, and brake, and gave to the disciples to set before them ; the same with the fishes. All were satisfied, and seven baskets of fragments were gathered. In the former miracle, five thousand men, besides women and children, were present, probably from ten to twenty thousand souls. On the present occasion there were but four thousand men ; as before, it was He, not the disciples, who sent them away.

There was a burden upon His heart, but we find Him patiently waiting His time to speak of it to those disciples whose distrust of Him was almost breaking His heart. So insensible were they, that we do not so much as hear any mention of grief on their part that they had not trusted Jesus, or expected His present help. "They came into the parts of Dalmanutha. And the Pharisees came forth, and began to question with Him, seeking of Him a sign from heaven, tempting Him." Just at this time we read of no works of healing—how could He heal?—the unbelief of the disciples hindered Him, and held back the arm which was "mighty to save." Not one of them testified to His mighty power in twice feeding the multitude and in twice stilling the wind. He "sighed deeply in His spirit." The hardness of heart among His own chosen ones prevented any blessing at that time and place. Are we by our unbelief hindering Jesus from doing anything which He is able and willing to do in our families, houses, or our own souls or bodies ? It is a tremendous responsibility to know the power of the deliverance of Jesus, and not to make use of it. The wife of

in Liverpool was visited one day by her brother, who had been some two years a converted man. "Mary," he said, "I cannot understand why our John does not get converted ; I pray for him, and get such a quickening of faith in prayer, that I am always expecting to hear that he is saved." "O John'll never be anything different," rejoined Mary. "Why, that's the very reason," said her brother ; "you are preventing his conversion." "Well, that is unkind ; you know there isn't a woman in all Liverpool who works harder to keep things together than I do ; I keep the children to school, and slave half the night to keep tidy clothes and a bit of food ; and bad as John is he always gets something to eat when he comes home, although it isn't often I get any of his earnings ; and you know I pray for him day and night ; but he'll never be any different." "Why, you've just said it," returned the brother ; "you've said, 'I pray day and night that John may be different, but he never will be different.' " God opened her eyes ; that day she prayed counting on God to make John different ; and sure enough, in about a week's time he came home from the fishery saying, "Mary, my lass, here's your John come back, but he's another John from him that went away," and then came the blessed story of his conversion on the very day that she had first prayed for him in faith.

Jesus' only answer to the Pharisees was a refusal to give them a sign from heaven ; but when alone again with His disciples in the ship, "He charged them, saying, Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the leaven of Herod. And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have no bread." Why did they not ask Him His meaning ? He was there. Why do not we, when we are not sure of His will, instead of trying to work out the problem in our own puny understandings ? "When Jesus knew it, He saith unto them, Why reason ye, because ye have no bread ? Perceive ye not yet, neither understand ? Have ye your heart yet hardened ? Having eyes, see ye not ? and having ears, hear ye not ? and do ye not remember ? When I brake the five loaves among five thousand, how many baskets of fragments took ye up ? They say unto Him, Twelve. And when the seven among four thousand, how many baskets full of fragments took ye up ? And they said, Seven. And He said unto them, How is it that ye do not understand ?" How could it be possible that He who had manifested the illimitable wealth of His resources, should have blamed the disciples for forgetting to take bread.

They were like blind people, for they had witnessed four distinct miracles of the Lord Jesus, besides witnessing, and even working themselves by faith miraculous cures ; they had eaten of the loaves, seen the winds and waves stilled, Peter had himself walked upon the water, and yet they acted as though the mighty Saviour were not with them, and they could not perceive that the leaven of the Pharisees was just that very unreality, that very materialism, which their own unbelief and hardness of heart was working also in them. In point of fact the dullness of perception was just as much unbelief in them as was the asking for a sign in the Pharisees. This is the only occasion on which we read that our Lord in His dealings with His disciples heaped on them reproach after reproach. They were not yet endued with power from on high, and the very presence of Jesus, and the daily experience of His power, were not enough to inspire them with the faith with which they were afterward clothed by the power of the Holy Ghost,

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill was passed in the Senate on Friday, April 28th, by a vote of 32 to 15. Owing to some unimportant amendments made in it in the Senate, it was sent back to the House for concurrence. It is substantially the same bill as the one President Arthur vetoed except that the prohibition is for ten years instead of twenty. One of the clauses prohibits Chinese naturalization by State courts or other tribunals, and another declares that the word "laborers" shall be construed to mean skilled and unskilled laborers and miners. The latter section was stricken out in Committee of the Whole, but was restored by a vote of 25 to 20 in the Senate. An effort was made to prove that the treaty only authorized the exclusion of Chinese laborers, and that the attempt to put an interpretation upon it like that proposed was subject to the objection that it exceeded the limits of our rights under the treaty, but the Senate refused to listen to any proposals modifying the scope of the bill. In preparing the bill care has been taken to render it acceptable to the President. In his veto message on the first bill he recommended that provision be made for the transit across the country of Chinese subjects who might be passing from their own to foreign lands or returning. The new bill makes provision in this regard for the admitted classes of Chinese, but does not provide for laborers. The friends of the bill say that laborers are sent direct from China to Cuba and other countries, and it is only right that they should be required to return in the same way.

Ex-Secretary Blaine's Evidence Before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs caused some excitement last week. Mr. Blaine had requested to be heard on the subject of the Peruvian scandal, and the committee was, after Mr. Shipherd's allegations, naturally desirous that Mr. Blaine's version of the matter should be had. According to Mr. Shipherd's account it appeared that an attempt had been made to purchase the influence of our government on behalf of a claim suspected of being fraudulent. The conspirators desired that Chili should be bullied into accepting from Peru a money indemnity in full discharge of her claims; that then Peru, being too poor to pay it, the Landreau Company should make a bargain with Peru to advance the needed funds and work the guano deposits in return. The company was not strong enough to dictate to Chili and therefore sought to obtain the services of the U. S. Government, by means of a bribe of $250,000 of Peruvian stock to Mr. Hurlbut, our minister at Lima, and by some arrangement with Mr. Blaine, the terms of which were not disclosed. It is known that we were on the verge of war with Chili when Mr. Blaine was removed by the President, and that upon that removal our attitude toward Chili at once became more courteous and conciliatory, but the reason of Mr. Blaine's hostility to Chili was not certainly known. Few people, however, were willing to accept Mr. Shipherd's explanation, involving as it did the character of an ex-secretary of state and that of a minister at a foreign court. It was a relief to find that Mr. Blaine could give, as he did last week, an emphatic denial to Mr. Shipherd's allegations. He, however, omitted to explain his policy toward Chili. This question was, after all, the one the committee was appointed to discover. Mr. Blaine, after he had replied to and denounced Mr. Shipherd, was invited by the chairman of the committee to make an explanation on this head, but he said he preferred replying to questions. When, however, Mr. Belmont, of New York, interrogated him, Mr. Blaine evaded the questions, declined to give direct replies, and finally lost his temper and used abusive language to Mr. Belmont, to which the latter replied in similar fashion. So far the only plausible explanation of the Peruvian matter is the one given by Mr. Shipherd, but we may hope that some less discreditable one will yet be afforded.

The Inquiry Ordered by the House into the expenses of the Naval Department is likely to lead to some remarkable disclosures of carelessness and extravagance, if not of something worse. As a specimen fact it is stated that the engines of the Miantonomoh, a third class iron-clad, cost originally, in the time of highest prices, 1863 to 1865, $240,522. During the eight years, 1869-1876, the Navy Department spent on repairs of these same engines $366,851, and left them in such a condition that in the next two years $114,417 more were spent in repairs on them; making a total charge during ten years of peace of $481,964 spent in repairs and new machinery on the engines which cost originally $240,522. The Miantonomoh is described in the Naval Register of this year as a third-class ironclad, laid up at League Island and requiring extensive repairs. Another remarkable fact in the same connection is the large stock of clothing purchased during the same period, and which was not purchased by advertisement. There was, it is now reported, when Mr. Robeson quitted office, a sufficient supply of some articles of clothing on hand to supply the navy for thirty-five years, and of others for twenty-three years.

The Senate Passed the Mississippi Improvement bill on Tuesday, April 25th. The bill was passed without a division. It appropriates six million dollars, and contains the provision prohibiting the commission which is to have charge of the expenditure from spending any portion of the money upon any work not directly connected with the improvement of the navigation of the river. If they can secure the safety of the land from overflow by the same means they are at liberty to do so, but they may not undertake any work directly intended for that purpose alone. The amendments proposed by Senators Garland, Jones, and Kellogg, were withdrawn before the bill passed. They were designed respectively to raise the amount of the appropriation to fifteen million dollars and to commit Congress to a declaration of the constitutionality of protecting the bottom lands at federal expense from the overflow of the river; and to press the construction of levees upon the favorable consideration of the commissioners.

The Death of Ralph Waldo Emerson on Thursday last removes from the world one of the best known American writers. Following so closely the death of his intimate friend, Mr. Longfellow, whose funeral he attended, the event has cast a gloom over the literary world. Mr. Emerson, though in his seventy-ninth year, had maintained his usual health up to April 19th, when the exceptionally warm weather tempted him to walk out without an overcoat; he caught cold, and three days afterward an acute attack of pneumonia set in. He rallied slightly until April 25th, from which time he slowly failed, and on Thursday, April 27th, he died placidly. Mr. Emerson was born in Boston on May 25th, 1803. His father was a Unitarian minister. The family was of English stock, the first to come to this country, being Rev. Peter Bulkeley, who had been rector of Woodhill, Bedfordshire, England. He emigrated in 1635, and became the first pastor of Concord, Mass. Mr. Emerson's father, grandfather, and great grandfather were also clergymen. Mr. Emerson was prepared for the ministry, and during three years preached in the Boston Church formerly under the pastorate of Cotton and Increase Mather. In 1832 he resigned his charge, and since that time has devoted his talents to literature and philosophy. He visited Europe on several occasions, and while there formed an intimate friendship with Carlyle, between whom and himself there was much similarity of thought and expression. The best known of his works are "Representative Men," published in 1850; "English Traits" in 1856; "The Conduct of Life," in 1860; and "Society and Solitude," in 1870.

An Appeal to the President on Behalf of the persecuted Jews of Russia was made on April 26th, by Representative Belford, of Colorado. Judge Belford reminded the president that intervention in such a cause had been practised by civilized nations for the past two centuries. In reply the President said that he felt deeply interested in the cause of the persecuted Hebrews, and was determined to do everything that could be done with propriety to induce the Russian Government to extend the fullest protection to this class of its subjects. He had within the past few days addressed a communication to our representative at St. Petersburg directing him to invite the attention of the Czar to these reported atrocities, to express the abhorrence that was felt in this country in relation to their perpetration, and entreating him to exercise his authority to prevent their recurrence.

Two Explosive Packages were Discovered in the New York mails on Saturday, addressed respectively to Mr. William H. Vanderbilt and to Mr. Cyrus W. Field. The circumstance that led to the discovery was the premature explosion of the one addressed to Mr. Field as it was being carried on the Elevated Road to its destination. The similarity of the package to the one addressed to Mr. Vanderbilt was then noticed, and that, on being opened, disclosed the explosive in a glass tube so placed as to be broken when the box in which it was fixed was opened. The fulminate of mercury in the tube would then ignite a quantity of gunpowder placed underneath. The detectives are busily engaged investigating the case. It is thought that the packages were sent by some one who has been ruined in Wall Street, and believing the millionaires to be responsible for the losses, took this ignoble method of revenge.

The Clergymen of Boston have Signed a memorial to the Governor of Massachusetts, in which they represent that the annual fast day is no longer kept as a time of penitence, but is made a day of general amusement, and they urge that fast days should only be proclaimed on occasions of great solemnity. A local journal, commenting on the action of the clergy, says, that the annual proclamation of a fast day on which nobody fasts, and people enter upon more than usual recreation, tends to destroy altogether popular belief in the duty and utility of fasting.

An Earnest Appeal was made at Worcester Mass., on April 19th, at the meeting of the Woman's Baptist Missionary Society, on behalf of the women of India. Mrs. Armstrong, who is soon to return to India to resume missionary work there, and Mrs. Durham, of New Haven, Conn., both cited facts showing the urgent need for special work among the women both of high and low caste. Mrs. Cushing, who has spent several years in India, gave interesting details respecting the Shan and Bahmo missions, the latter being a new field in Northern Burmah just occupied by the American Baptists. Mrs. Jenkins and Mrs. Knowlton, returned missionaries from China, were also present and imparted gratifying intelligence of the progress of mission work in China. The treasurer reported the expenditures to be $55,819, including $42,530 for foreign missions, $4100 for home missions, and $9129 for the Children's Home Mission. Thirty-four missionaries have been supported during the year.

The Sunday Closing Movement in Ohio is being attacked by the Boycotting tactics. A prominent advocate of the movement is Hon. Theodore Cook, the President of the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, and he voted in favor of the bill which recently passed the Ohio Legislature enacting that liquor saloons, cigar stores, and other places of the kind should be closed on the Lord's Day. A prominent brewer is reported in The Cincinnati Enquirer as saying that the whiskey men, the brewers, the maltsters, the cigar and tobacco men intend to retaliate on Mr. Cook through his railroad connection, and that they will withdraw their patronage from the Southern Railroad, and not ship a pound of freight over that route that can be sent to its destination in any other way. Mr. Cook, who is a highly respected Democrat, is unmoved by the threat and states his conviction that such tactics will recoil on those who use them.

Longfellow as a Christian is the Subject of a letter to a contemporary, evidently written by an intimate friend of the dead poet. He says from personal knowledge that Mr. Longfellow was a Christian in fact as well as in name. "Those who knew him had no doubt of it. He regarded Christ as One who came from on high to save, and One who alone is the Redeemer of men, in whom trust is to be placed for what we need in life and in death." We naturally inferred from his exquisite poetry that the author was a Christian, but it is gratifying to read this direct testimony on a matter which after all is of greater moment than questions of genius or poetic gifts.

A Short Package of Gold from the Philadelphia Mint was reported recently. It was, however, subsequently found to have been an error of a banker and not of the mint. A gentleman at Reading had occasion for the use of five thousand dollars in gold, and presenting his cheque at a bank, asked for legal tender. The cashier handed him a bag of gold marked "U. S. M. $5000." Upon inquiry he was told that it was not necessary to count the gold, as the bag had the mark United States Mint upon it, and that it contained the proper amount. He took the money to the office of an attorney, and made a tender of the money. After the tender was accepted the money was taken to the Farmers' National Bank and there counted, when it was found to be sixty-two dollars short. Complaint was at once made and an investigation ordered. It was then found that the bank which issued the bag had used one of the mint bags for its own purposes, and the cashier in cashing the cheque had inadvertently handed out the wrong bag. The mint mark on the bag had thus imposed on three people, owing to the fact that the mint had never been known to issue short packages. After this, people will be more cautious in trusting to the mark, although the mint's reputation is as good as ever; but it will not be forgotten that the bags bearing the mark sometimes pass through less careful hands. By a similar process doctrines have passed current when indorsed by a church which, when examined by the infallible Word of God, have been found false (Isa. 8 : 20).

The Discovery of the Phantom City is Announced in a telegram to the North American Review from M. Désiré Charnay, the Central American explorer. During the last few years accounts have been given by the natives of Central America to explorers of a large city they said existed in the country of the Locandones. The descriptions of the city seemed like the Arabian legends of a fairy land. It had, the natives said, white turrets gleaming in the sun, inhabitants who keep up the customs and habits of the times of the Spanish invasion, and monuments with inscriptions thousands of years old. No travellers had visited it, and Mr. Stevens and others pronounced it inaccessible. But the natives still insisted on its existence, and its wondrous beauty. At length it became known to explorers by the name of "the Phantom City." A year ago, M. Charnay, an explorer of indomitable perseverance and courage, undertook an exploration under the direction of Mr. A. T. Rice, of the Review, and nothing more was heard of him until his telegram a few days ago briefly announcing that in the mountainous region in the north-western part of Guatemala he had found the Phantom City. Further details of M. Charnay's discovery are anticipated with intense curiosity. The sceptics of our day persist in asserting that the city described by the apostle John in the Apocalypse is also a Phantom City. It certainly is inaccessible by the methods they adopt, but to the child-like soul accepting in simple faith the words of Jesus and trusting in His finished work, it is accessible, and we believe that in our Father's good time our eyes will behold its beauty (Rev. 21 : 10-27).

An Eagle's Attempt to Carry off a Child Resulted in the death of both, as reported in the Denver papers. A Denver merchant was visiting some acquaintances at North Platte, Neb., during the second week of April, and while there he was startled and horrified to see from the window of the house, an eagle swoop down upon a child who was playing on the grass. The bird fastened its talons in the baby's shoulders, and soared aloft with it. The eagle, however, found the burden too heavy, as the distance from the ground increased, and after a few vain struggles to rise, it let go its hold and dropped the child. The fall and the wounds made by the eagle's talons together proved mortal, and in a few hours the little one was dead. The father of the child was able, on hearing of what had happened, to shoot the eagle while it was still hovering over the house. This is not a common occurrence, but there are many families which have been bereaved by the death of one of their members whom the great enemy of souls has attempted to make his prey. Happy are they if the soul has been saved and only the bodily life sacrificed; too often both soul and body perish under his assaults (1 Peter 5 : 8).

A Curious Old Tree that Supports other trees is described in a Southern journal. It is stated that in Columbus, Ga., there is a china tree that grew up very tall. Several years ago the top was taken off, leaving the main trunk of the tree about twenty feet high. On the top it has become somewhat decayed, but is making up for lost life by supporting a young forest, there are several different shrubs growing on its top, among others an evergreen three or four feet in height, a blackberry bush, which has put on leaves and flowers, and a water oak which is about two inches in circumference. It is said that the spectacle is a very remarkable one, and arboriculturists take great interest in it. The old tree is a type of many lives. When God has withdrawn one of His children from active service, he is frequently able to continue his usefulness in another way, by supporting others, lifting them nearer to Heaven and sustaining them with his own stalwart spiritual growth (2 Tim. 2 : 10).

An Eruption from a Submarine Volcano is believed to have been the cause of the sudden stopping of a vessel in her course recently. The captain of the Stella, a vessel which arrived at Baltimore on April 15th from Germany, relates that while on his voyage, the weather fair and the sea calm, his vessel suddenly halted in her course, quivering from keel to keelson, conveying the impression to those below that the ship had struck a rock. The captain, who was below looking over his chart, at once ran on deck to ascertain the cause of the shock, and, finding the weather clear and the sea tranquil, was puzzled. Neither the chief mate, who was on the quarter-deck at the time, nor the look-out could account for the strange occurrence. The captain then ordered the heaving of the lead, but found no bottom at one hundred fathoms. The pumps were sounded and the ship found to be tight. The shock lasted only half a minute, after which the ship went on as before. The captain expresses the opinion that he had encountered a tremor or submarine volcanic eruption. The remarkable feature in the affair was that the peaceful and prosperous voyage should have thus been checked when there was no warning or visible sign of danger. It is so sometimes in the voyage of life. God often checks the course of His children as well as of the wicked by sickness, or disaster, or some other means. It is well in such cases if the check turns the thoughts to Him and the cause is faithfully and prayerfully sought (Job 33 : 17-24).

ONLY TRUST HIM! ONLY TRUST HIM!
A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon

"And as He entered into a certain village, there met Him ten men that were lepers, which stood afar off: and they lifted up their voices, and said, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. And when He saw them He said unto them, Go show yourselves unto the priests. And it came to pass, that, as they went, they were cleansed."—Luke 17 : 12-14.

A Fruitful Passage—One Vital Topic—Jesus Bids Sinners Believe—In Spite of Self-Condemnation—I. The Signs Commonly Looked for—Consciousness of Sin—A Blaze of Joy—Impression of a Text—Conversion Manifest from Within—Some Singular Sensation—Excitement never Saves—The Seaman and His Anchor—II. What Reason is there to Believe?—God's Witness—Jesus Himself—God's Command—The Promise—Testimony of the Saved—III. The Issue of this Faith—An Evidence of a Saving Change—Of Reconciliation—A Delightful Consciousness of Salvation—A Grand Start in Life—Grand Faith to Die With.

SEVERAL interesting topics might fairly be found in these verses. We see here the abounding fruit of sin, for here were ten lepers in a group, and the abundance of divine power to meet it, for they were all cleansed. So also we see how Christ must come first, and ceremonies second; first, the works of grace, and then the outward showing of it.

The Lord's tenderness toward outcasts, His attention to prayers from a distance, and His regard for the ceremonial law so long as it was in force, might each one yield an instructive meditation. I have, however, only one thought which I wish to bring under your notice, and to press upon you, perhaps almost to repetition and monotony. That thought I would engrave as with an iron pen upon the hearts and minds of all here present who desire to find eternal salvation. May the Holy Ghost imprint it upon every living soul.

These ten lepers were required by the Saviour to perform an act of faith in Him before they had the slightest evidence in themselves that He had wrought a good work upon them. Before they began to feel their foul blood cleansed, before the horrible dryness of leprosy had yielded to healthy perspiration, they were to go toward the house in which the priest lived to be examined by him and to be pronounced clean. They were to exhibit faith in Christ Jesus's power to heal them by going to exhibit themselves as healed, though as yet they were in the same condition as before. They were to start to the place where they should be examined by the priest, believing that Jesus had healed them, or would heal them, though, as yet, they had whatever that their flesh should become as that of a little child.

This is the point I wish to dwell upon—that the Lord Jesus Christ bids sinners believe in Him, and trust their souls to Him, though they may not yet discern in themselves any work of His grace. Just as these men were lepers, and nothing but lepers, so you may be sinners, and nothing but sinners, and yet you are bidden to exhibit faith in Jesus Christ while you are just what you are. As these men were to start straight away to the priest with all their leprosy white upon them, and to go there as if they felt they were already healed, so are you, with all your sinfulness upon you, and your sense of condemnation heavy on your soul, to believe in Jesus Christ just as you are, and you shall find everlasting life upon the spot.

Now, first, I shall notice what signs are commonly looked for by unconverted men as reasons for believing in Christ; which, indeed, are no reasons at all; then, secondly, I shall try to show what is the real ground and reason for faith in Christ; and, thirdly, what will be the issue of a faith in Christ similar to that of the lepers.

I. First, then, I say that we are to believe in Jesus Christ—to trust Him to heal us of the great disease of sin—though as yet we may have about us no sign or token that He has wrought any good work upon us. We are not to look for signs and evidences within ourselves before we venture our souls upon Jesus. The contrary supposition is a soul-destroying error, and I will try to expose it by showing that are commonly looked for by men. One of the most frequent is a consciousness of great sin, and a horrible dread of divine wrath, leading to despair. Strange to say, we constantly meet with persons who say, "I could believe in Jesus Christ if I felt more burdened by a sense of sin. I could trust Him if I were driven more entirely to despondency and to despair; but I am not depressed enough; I am not broken-hearted enough; I am sure I am not brought low enough, and therefore I cannot trust Christ. Strange notion, that if the night were darker we should see the better! Strange idea, that if we were nearer death we should have better hope of life.

Now, my friend, you are speaking and acting in distinct disobedience to Christ; for He would have you trust Himself, not on the ground of your feeling much or little, or on the ground of your feeling anything at all, but simply because you are sick and He has come to heal you, and is abundantly able to work your cure. If you say, "Lord, I cannot trust Thee unless I feel this or that," then you, in effect, say, "I can trust my own feelings, but I cannot trust God's appointed Saviour." What is this but to make a god out of your feelings, and a saviour out of your inward griefs?

It comes to this—that you are making a god of your despair, and a Christ out of your horrors, and so you are setting up an antichrist in the place where Christ alone should be. Come, young friend, though you have not been terrified and alarmed and heart-broken to the extent of some, will you trust Christ with your soul, and ask no questions? I pray you, trust Jesus once for all.

"Cast thy guilty soul on Him,
Find Him mighty to redeem;
At His feet thy burden lay;
Look thy doubts and cares away;
Now by faith the Son embrace;
Plead His promise, trust His grace."

Many other persons think that they must, before they can trust Christ, experience quite a blaze of joy. "Oh," says one, "I heard a Christian say that when he found the Saviour he was so happy that he did not know how to contain himself, and he sang like a whole band of music in one—

"Happy day, happy day,
When Jesus washed my sins away."

Oh that I could be as full of joy as these 'happy day' people!" Just so. But what mischief will you make out of that? Are you going to find evil even in our delights? Will you feed your unbelief on the joy of the Lord? What strange perversity! "Why," you say, "must I not be happy before I can believe in Christ?" What? What? Must you needs have the joy before you exercise the faith? How unreasonable! Because we tell you that such and such a root produces a sweet fruit, will you say that you must have the fruit before you will accept the root? Surely that is bad reasoning. We who have experienced this joy came to Christ in order to obtain it, and did not wait until we found it, or else we should have waited until now. We came to Jesus just as we were; some of us were very wretched, but we came just as we then were, and we trusted Christ, and we were made whole. Then followed joy and peace. We have known others who have expected to have a text impressed upon their minds. A kind of superstition has grown up that a special scripture must, somehow or other, hover over the mind, and continue there, so that you cannot get rid of it, and then you may hope that you are saved. In old families there are coming to a window before a death, and I regard with much the same distrust the more common superstition that if a text continues upon your mind day after day you may safely conclude that it is an assurance of your salvation. I hope I have never taught you to draw any such a conclusion. Far be it from me to assist you into a confidence which has so questionable a foundation.

The Spirit of God often does apply Scripture with power to the soul; but this fact is never set forth as the rock for us to build upon. Will you find anything in the Bible to support the supposition that the vivid recollection of a text is a seal of conversion? It has often happened that some word of God does greatly comfort the soul; but why should you demand the same? Have you any right to say, "I will not believe God's word unless He impresses it upon me?" Is it a lie, then? "No, it is true," say you. Remember, if it is not true, an impression upon your mind would not make it true, and if it is true, why do you not believe it? If it is true, accept it.

Furthermore, I would have you remember, it is not reading the Scripture that saves you; it is believing in Christ. What did Christ Himself say? He said to the Bible readers of his day, "Ye search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; but ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." Good as the searching of Scripture is, it is nothing without coming to Christ. You will only read your own condemnation in the Bible if you remain out of Christ. Even the Bible itself may be made into a stumbling-block if you substitute Bible-reading for closing in with Christ and putting your trust in Him. Your immediate business is to trust Jesus, and no measure of reading will compensate for neglect of faith. What if no special text of Scripture were ever laid home to your heart at all, yet here it stands, "believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

THAT IS YOUR BUSINESS,

my dear hearer, if you are to get peace at once.

There is another way in which some men try to get off believing in Christ, and that is, they expect an actual conversion to be manifest in them before they will trust the Saviour. Now, understand that Christ has wrought salvation in no man who is unconverted. There must be a perfect turning round of us—a complete conversion from sin to holiness. But that is salvation, and not a preparation for salvation. Conversion is the manifestation of Christ's healing power. But you are not to have this before you trust Him; you are to trust Him for this very thing. When a man with a disease goes to an eminent physician, does he say, "Doctor, I will trust you with my case when I have reached a certain stage?" "Nay," says the physician, "if you have reached that state you will be in a fair way of healing, and you won't want me." Your wisest plan is to go to your physician just as you are; and if you can be sure that he is an infallible healer, just put yourself into his hands as if you knew nothing and he knew everything, and as if you would not have a will or way in it, but would leave yourself entirely with him. That is the thing to do with the Lord Jesus, the infallible Physician of the souls of men.

Why, you poor wretched sinner, you say, "I am not a saint. I cannot be saved." Who said you were a saint? It is Christ's work to make you into a saint. "Oh, but I do not repent as I should." It is Christ's work to make you repent as you should, and to Him you must come for repentance. "Oh, but

"MY HEART WON'T BREAK."

It is Christ who is to break your heart—not you who are to break it, and then come to Him with it ready broken. Come to Jesus just as you are, with your hard, stony, senseless heart, and trust that and everything else to His saving power. "I do not seem even to have a strong desire," says one. Christ Himself gives every spiritual desire by His Holy Spirit. Just where you are, and as you are, trust Christ to save you, and you shall be saved. Do not look for conversion first, but expect it as the result of faith.

We have known some who have had a very curious idea, which I can hardly put into words, namely, that if they were to be saved they would experience some very singular sensation. They could believe in Christ if they felt in a mysterious fashion. It is rather difficult to understand people, but when I have been talking to some inquirers I have thought that they expected even a physical sensation—a sensation within their bodies. I remember one saying to me, "Sir, I was quite sure I was saved, for I felt so light." Poor simpleton, what does it matter whether you felt light or heavy! What has that to do with it? Perhaps you were light-headed, or half out of your mind with absurd excitement. Beware of such nonsense. To feel light may be interpreted into being weighed in the balances and found wanting; it is a sensation which may frighten as much as console.

"Oh," says one, "but I felt so singular." Yes, and many who are now in a lunatic asylum could say the same. What does it matter what you felt? It is not feeling that will save you. Believing on Jesus will bring you the blessings of grace; but strange feelings may be produced by what you have eaten, or by the weather, or by hysteria, or a hundred other things. Do you not know that when politics are being discussed, or when some other subject is under dispute, an earnest orator will often stir men with excitement till their flesh creeps? But what of that?

EXCITEMENT DOES NOT SAVE ANYBODY.

Many are melted to tears by a novel or a play; but what is the benefit? You may be moved with religious excitement, and half the emotion may be purely physical, and there may be nothing of the grace of God in it.

The wisest way is calmly to sit down and say, "Here is God's way of salvation—salvation through His crucified Son, Jesus Christ; and He has promised that if I trust His Son He will save me from sinning, and make a new man of me, and heal me of my spiritual diseases. I will trust Him, for I am sure that the witness of God is true." By that simple and deliberate act of faith you are saved; the power to believe your God is the evidence that the cure has begun, and begun well. If you have, indeed, trusted him, Jesus has undertaken your case, and He will save you.

The best evidence is not trusting marks, signs, evidences, inward feelings, impressions, and so on; but just getting out of that and trusting Jesus. There lies the essence of the saving change, the getting from self to the Lord God in Christ Jesus. A certain mariner has a fine anchor, one of the best constructed anchors ever used in the navy. He has it on board his ship, and yet it is not a pennyworth of use to him. While he has it on board his ship it does not answer the purpose of an anchor; his vessel drifts with the anchor on board. He drags it out upon the deck and looks at it. What an anchor! Would not that hold in the day of storm? He admires his anchor as if it were a mass of gold. The winds howl and the waves roar, but he feels safe with his anchor on board. Fool, this anchor is of no use to you while you can see it. A ship's anchorage cannot be in the ship itself. "Suppose I hang the anchor from the side of the vessel." It is of no use there. What must you do with it? Fling it overboard. Let it down into the deep, even to the sea-bottom. It is gone. You cannot see where it is. All right! That will do.

Now, soul, fling your anchor of trust overboard. Do not let it hang to your feelings, or to your impressions, or to anything that is in you; but overboard let it go, deep into the waters of infinite love, and let it get a grip on Jesus. Outside of you your hope must be; for as long as your confidence is within you, or has any dependence upon yourself, it is like an anchor on board, which can only increase the weight of the ship, but certainly cannot help it in the day of storm. There is the truth. God grant you grace to accept it.

II. And now, secondly, and as briefly as I can, I want to bring forward what the reason is for our believing in Jesus Christ. What warrant have I, as a sinner, for trusting myself with Jesus Christ? No warrant whatever within ourselves need be looked for.

THE WARRANT FOR OUR BELIEVING

Christ lies in this—first, there is God's witness concerning His Son Jesus Christ. God, the Everlasting Father, has set forth Christ "to be the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sin of the whole world." God the Father says to men, "I am able to forgive you justly through the death and righteousness of my Son. Trust me, and I will save you." What do you want more than that? He that believeth not hath made God a liar, because he hath not believed His witness concerning His Son. Why, surely, if God declares a thing, you do not need further evidence.

The next warrant for our believing is Jesus Christ Himself. He bears witness on earth as well as the Father, and His witness is true. Consider who this Christ is whom we are bidden to trust. Look at His person. He is God, "very God of very God." Can we doubt Him? He is perfect man, and He has taken perfect manhood upon Himself for our sakes. Can we doubt Him? He has lived a perfect life. When did He ever lie? Who can charge Him with falsehood? He has died "the just for the unjust, to bring us to God;" and God has accepted the sacrifice of His dear Son. What surer proof of His truthfulness can He give us than His death for us? O trembler, why wilt thou refuse thy confidence to one so worthy of it? Canst thou doubt Calvary? Wilt thou despise the cross? Wilt thou say, "I want some other warrant for trusting Christ besides His own person and His finished work?" I feel ashamed almost to be pleading here for such a thing as this.

Still, to put this in another shape, you want to know why you are to believe; your warrant for believing lies in the fact that God commands you to believe. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." And this commandment we have received from our Master—that we preach this Gospel unto every creature under heaven; and we do preach it in His name, commanding you in the name of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, that ye believe in Him. This divine command is warrant enough for you.

Moreover, there is the promise made to you and to every creature, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." "He that believeth in Him is not condemned." Do you hear that? "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." He has eternal life, he has it now. These are promises rich and free for you. What more do you want? Oh, I know not what more I can say, when Jesus commands you, when Jesus invites you, how can you stand back? O blessed Spirit, make this plain to men and lead them to believe.

I will add only this one more thing: I dare say these poor lepers believed in Jesus because they had heard of other lepers whom He had cleansed. Now, here stands one before you, of many more in this place, who, if this were a fit time, would stand up and say the same. I came to Jesus full of sin, guilty and lost, with a hard heart and a heavy spirit; and I looked to Him, trusting Him alone to save me; and He has saved me. He has changed my nature, He has blotted out my sin, and He has made me love Him, and love all that is good and true and generous, for His sake. It is not I, even I, that am left alone to tell you; but, as I have said, there are thousands in this Tabernacle, at this very hour, upon whom the same miracle of divine mercy has been wrought. Therefore trust my Lord Jesus, and you shall feel the same miracle wrought upon you. Where are you, friend, who who want so much persuading for your own good?

III. I must now close with the third point, which shall not occupy you many minutes; it is this: What is that I have been preaching? This doctrine of "only trust Jesus,"—what does it lead to? This trusting in Jesus without marks, signs, evidences, tokens, what is the result and outcome of it?

The first thing that I have to say about it is this, that the very existence of such a faith as that in the soul is evidence that there is already a saving change. "Oh," say you, "I do not see that. How can it prove that I am a new man because I trust myself with Christ?" Consider a little: it will be an evidence of a saving change already wrought, for it will show that you have come to be obedient to Jesus, and obedient upon a matter which your proud will has long struggled against. Every man by nature kicks against simply trusting in Christ; and when at last He yields to the divine method of mercy it is a virtual surrender of His own will, the ending of rebellion, the establishment of peace. Faith is obedience. Faith is the evidence that the warfare has been ended by unconditional surrender.

It will be an evidence, also, that you are humble; for it is pride that makes men want to do something, or to be something, in their own salvation, or to be saved in some wonderful way, that they may tell other people how wonderfully they were saved. When you are willing just to be saved like a poor, good-for-nothing sinner as you are, then you are already saved from pride. I will not compliment you; you are a good-for-nothing wretch of a sinner; and if you will trust Jesus, as a man must do who truly bears that character, it will prove that you are humble, and this will be good evidence that a change has passed over your spirit.

Again, faith in Jesus will be the best evidence that you are reconciled to God, for the worst evidence of your enmity to God is that you do not like God's way of salvation. You so much dislike God that you will not have heaven on God's terms. You, the sinner, are so much at war with God that you will go to hell rather than be saved in God's way. That is what it comes to. And when you give that up and say, "Lord, so long as I can be made whole—so long as I can be made to love Thee—I am willing to be saved anyhow," there will be evidence of a great change in you. When you cry, "Lord, I will be saved in Thine own way, and I will therefore trust Christ as Thou hast bidden me," then God and you are reconciled upon a point of the chief importance. There is no battle between you now, for you are of one mind about trusting Christ.

Now, mark you, before long, sooner or later, you will become delightfully conscious of the fact that you are saved. Many a man is saved, and for a time he questions the truth of the gracious work, but in due time the blessing is made clear to him. When a man trusts Jesus as these ten lepers did, and acts upon his trust, good always comes of it. See the ten men! They are going toward the priest, though they have not yet felt that they are healed. They are acting upon Christ's authority, and He will not make fools of them, for they that trust in Him shall not be ashamed nor confounded. They must start on their walk before they feel the healing; but as they are going they shall feel it.

And you, too, trusting Christ without any sense of any good thing, shall not be long before you shall feel His blessed power upon your heart. I wish to speak simply to help those who are coming to Jesus. While I was coming to Christ I did not know that I was coming; and when I looked to Christ, I scarcely knew whether it was the right sort of look or no; but when I felt at last that Jesus had healed me, then I knew what I had done.

Many a man wishes he was humble, and he is humble because he does not think he is humble. Many a person sighs, "I wish I had a tender heart," but I am sure that his heart is tender because he mourns its hardness. He longs to be deeply sensitive before the Lord, but it is clear that he has a tenderness which he does not himself recognize. His ideal of tenderness is very high, and properly so, and therefore he dreads falling short of it. O my dear friend, if you trust Jesus in the dark, you shall one day enter into the light; and if you never should enjoy comfort you would still be safe—if all the way between this place and heaven you should never have a consciousness of being saved, yet if you have trusted Christ, you must and shall be saved, for He cannot possibly allow faith in Him to be exercised in vain. It is for you, a poor sinner, to begin by trusting Christ alone, saying, "I, without anything good in me whatever, without anything that I can lay hold of as a hope for me, do cast myself, whether I sink or swim, upon Christ Jesus the Saviour of sinners, and 'if I perish, I perish.'" This is a glorious beginning. To many a saintly life such a faith in the Lord alone has been a crowning act, and yet you, poor sinner, may exercise this same faith while yet you are a babe in Christ. You will often have to trust in this fashion in future life, and therefore it is well to begin as you will have to keep on.

You will be brought, in business, in the family, and in the various trials of life, into such a condition that you will have to exercise a faith just of the same sort as that which you begin with; I would, therefore, have you learn the lesson while you are young. You will have to say, "Though I am weakness itself, and poverty itself, and do not see how I may be provided for, yet as the ravens and the sparrows are fed, so shall I be; and therefore I cast my nakedness upon God for clothing, and my hunger upon God for food, and my very life I cast upon Him that He may preserve it to me between the jaws of death." This is grand faith, and you must begin there, for if you do not you have not begun to build on the rock. Your first course must be the live rock, or else all will be insecure. To begin well is half the battle; mind that you get a foundation which can never be moved; for life has many trials, and woe to the man whose foundation fails him.

as well as to live with. Now the curtains are drawn and the light of the sun is shut out, and the voices of friends begin to fail, and the ear is dull, and the eye-strings break. My soul, thou art now about to launch into the unseen world. What wilt thou do now? What, indeed, but faint into the arms of thy Father and thy God! Oh, my dear hearer, if you have learned to trust at the very first because of what Jesus is, and not because of what you are, then you will know how to die; for standing there, in the prospect of the great account, or rather lying there upon the bed, in prospect of the Lord's coming, fears will come, and doubts will come, and terrors will come, if you are looking within, or looking back upon your past life and trying to find a reliance there. But if you can say, "My Saviour, into Thy hands I commit my spirit; my naked soul I put into Thy pierced hands again," then may you breathe your last in peace, knowing whom you have believed, and being persuaded that He is able to keep that which you have committed to Him until that day.

When John Hyatt lay a-dying, one of his friends said, "Mr. Hyatt, can you trust your soul with Jesus now?" "Man," said he, "trust Him with one soul? That is nothing. I could trust Him with a million souls if I had them. I know that He is able to save all who trust Him." I want you to begin, then, as these poor lepers did, by just taking Christ at His word, and going your way in the strength of that word before you feel any hopeful change within. In this fashion when you come to die you may look out for glory and expect it though the brilliance has not yet transfigured you.

Before you pass the gates of pearl, or cross the chilly sea, you may enjoy the sight of the beatific vision by an unshattering faith. Hope that is seen is not hope; but glorious is the faith which seeth Him who is invisible, and grasps the substance of the things not seen as yet. By this power I even now anticipate the joys of the upper skies. Try, beloved, to do the same. O for more faith! It will be grand to know all heaven, though you have not seen it and felt it, because you knew and trusted the Lord of heaven. Hitherto you have found the promise true; now trust the Lord for glory as once you trusted Him for grace, and you shall find ere long that His richest promises are sure. Amen.

A Missionary's Visit to a Chinese Hotel.

THE CHINESE INN.

MR. C. H. JUDD, of the China Inland Mission, describing a six days' preaching tour in China, says: "Our first night's resting place was at a small hamlet of about five houses, with others at a distance. We sat down in a little store; some cakes of plain rice, with a little sugar, formed my evening meal. Having omitted our dinner, we had the best of sauce—a good appetite—which made the cakes seem very nice.

"Before we had finished our supper, we found a considerable number of men and women (chiefly the latter), with children, seated on rows of seats, placed for the purpose by our host, who quietly said, 'Do not hurry over your suppers, gentlemen; but when you have done, these people will like to hear your doctrine.'

"The Chinese inn in which we were seated was open to the street. There was a high shed, under which the people sat, with such patience and evident attention, for about an hour, as I have seldom seen. The meeting over, the people dispersed to their cottages by moonlight; and we sat down in the little store for evening worship, greatly to the amazement of a few listeners. After this we retired to our bed-room, which was about six feet by four, built of unburnt mud bricks, and having no window—for which, however, there was no need by day, as plenty of light came through the holes and tiling; and, of course, there was plenty of ventilation. Wrapped in my Chinese bed I lay down; a day's walk and happy work gave such sweet sleep that it was not long before I knew not whether I was on a downy bed in England, or on hard boards in a Chinese hovel.

"The second night's bedroom was similar, with the only addition of a cesspool, which drained a pig-stye, within two feet of our bedroom door, and a straw-platted mattress to soften our bed.

"One evening we could not obtain an empty room, and therefore slept in a small thatched store built of rushes and poles. The sound of a few fowls in a hamper near my head told of more than human lodgers taken in there. In some villages neither meat nor fish could be had; but our friends would hardly believe how good a basin of rice, with greens and bean curd, tastes, after a long journey over the hills. These hints may be useful to any who think that missionary life in China is a nice romance."

A WORLDLING'S SUNDAY AND ITS SEQUENCE.

"I CAN'T come to-day, Ruth. Papa expects company. You must excuse me coming with you to your district to-day."

The speaker, seated on the sofa, was a beautiful young lady, about twenty years of age, and the person she addressed was an old companion and schoolfellow, a year or two younger. Alice Mayburn was the only child of a wealthy city merchant, and as Mrs. Mayburn had been dead some years, Alice had become the very apple of her father's eye. No expense had been spared in her education, and her every whim, whether in matters of dress or of amusement, was freely indulged. While her mother lived Alice had been taught to walk steadfastly in the footsteps of Jesus; but Mr. Mayburn, although upright and honorable, was a man of the world. Alice herself was amiable and generous, but, like her father, she found her happiness more in the things of this life than in those of the life to come.

A very different person was Ruth Halford, and very different were her circumstances. Her father, a poor curate, in a poor and most densely populated parish, fell sick one day, after visiting a laborer's fever-stricken family, and in a few days his disease reached a crisis and he died. His devoted wife never left his bedside while he lived. The day after his funeral she was stricken by the pestilence, and that day week she lay side by side with her husband in the cold earth. Ruth was the eldest of three children, and when her mother died she was but sixteen years of age. She, and her two younger sisters were not left wholly destitute. The kindly vicar commenced a subscription, and the congregation contributed according to their means. But their means were scanty, and when all was done Ruth found that a life of hard work was before her. She did not shrink from her duty. Though young, she had, happily acquired some of her father's solid attainments, and so was able, by daily teaching, to earn enough to keep both herself and her sisters respectably.

Alice Mayburn and she had been school-fellows and companions in her better days, and they had remained true and fast friends throughout the two years that had elapsed since then. In spite of her pressing cares, Ruth found some time for missionary work among the poor in her father's parish, and, among other things, to distribute tracts through a city district on Sunday afternoons. Anxious to lead her worldly-minded friend, Miss Mayburn, to the Fountain of Life, if haply she might drink thereof, Ruth had persuaded Alice to take part in the work. Alice's heart, however, was never in it—it was an irksome task, and not a labor of love. Ruth saw this, and, therefore, called for Alice each Sunday afternoon, on her way to the district.

"I can't come to-day," said Alice, when Ruth called on this particular Sunday. "I can't come to-day: papa expects company."

"But my dear," responded Ruth; "does your papa desire you to remain away to-day?"

"Well, he does not exactly desire it," replied Alice, a trifle peevishly; "but he does not object. And I am going to stay at home because I have taken a fancy to do so."

"Alice! Alice!" exclaimed Ruth hurriedly, "pray do not talk like that! You know it is only my love for you that makes me concerned about you. Why are you dressed so to-day? Who are the visitors your papa expects?"

"My dear Ruth," said Alice, moved by her friend's evident anxiety, "do not distress yourself on my account. There is no cause for alarm. My father's visitors," she added, with a touch of stateliness, "are gentlemen!"

"Alice," replied her old school-fellow seriously; "I am sure a Sunday afternoon spent in worldly society is not well spent. Good-bye now, dear; it is time for me to go."

So saying, Ruth Halford hurried off praying all the way for Alice Mayburn's soul.

* * * * *

Twelve years have rolled by, and Ruth Halford is now a happy wife and mother. It is a wild wintry night, the wind whistling shrilly among the house-tops, and the blinding rain pattering thick and fast upon the window panes.

"Please, ma'am," said the parlor-maid, opening the drawing-room door, "there is a woman down stairs who wishes to see you."

The next minute she was in the hall.

"Mrs. Marriott," said the woman, huskily, shading her face with her hand, "I have come to you to tell you—" But she could get no further. A violent fit of coughing seized her, shaking her thinly-clad frame much as the howling wind outside was shaking the leafless branches of the trees. Ruth led her gently into a side-room, and seated her before the fire. Then tenderly removing the cold white hands from the cold white face, she uttered a low cry of pain and fell upon the woman's bosom.

"Oh! Alice! Alice!" she exclaimed. "Why did you not come to me before? You are ill! you are very ill! Oh, why did you not come to me before?"

"I am ill, very ill," echoed her visitor. "I am dying. And why should I come to you before? To tell you of my father's bankruptcy and death, of my husband being a swindler, of I being a—"

"Oh, hush! hush!" implored Ruth. "Spare yourself now. When you are stronger you shall tell me all. Do not weep, there is a refuge for the weary and the bereaved still open to you."

"Oh, you know not what you ask," groaned Alice, "religion is not for such as I am. It would be shameful having turned from God in my prosperity, if I went to Him now that I am poor."

"They that are whole," quoted Ruth, "have no need of a physician, but they that are sick."

Here a violent fit of coughing seized the poor outcast and it seemed as if her life were near the close. When she ceased coughing, her weakness and prostration were pitiful to witness, and after administering to her some simple remedies Ruth conducted her to her own chamber and in a few minutes had the pleasure of seeing her fall into a childlike sleep.

Ruth was in her friend's room with the morning light arranging clothing of her own for Alice's use, and when an hour afterward she descended to the breakfast room the wanderer of the night before was unrecognizable. Very delicately and with much consideration Ruth drew from Alice the details of her sad story, very pitiful both in its sorrows and its sins.

Alice never left her friend's house while she lived. She seemed at one time to be on the way to recovery, but the hopes entertained of her life were delusive. She faded away and was soon unable to leave her room. But as health and strength declined, her faith grew from the trembling flickering spark to a bright flame, which shone with increasing brilliancy to the hour of her death. Her life from that memorable Sunday when she chose pleasure before duty had been a series of struggles after happiness, she had drunk the cup of the world's delights to the bitter dregs, but it was not until the world had used her and cast her out that she found real happiness and then it was in the love of Him who overcame the world.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Glimpse into Paradise.

"Do you want anything, my good man?" asked the bookseller quietly of Roland Sefton.

"There are some books in the window by Mrs. Roland Sefton," he said, "how much are they?"

"That is the six shilling edition."

Jean Merle was on the point of saying he would take them all, but he checked himself. He must possess them all, and read every line that Felicitas had ever written, but not now, and not here.

"Which do you think is the best?" he asked.

"They are all good," was the answer; "we are very proud of Mrs. Roland Sefton, who belongs to Riversborough. That is her great uncle yonder, the first Lord Riversford; and she married a prominent townsman, Roland Sefton."

"She is famous then?" said Jean Merle.

"She has won her rank as an author," replied the bookseller. "I knew her husband well, and he always foretold that she would make her mark; and she has. He died fourteen years ago; and, strange to say, there was something about your step as you came in which reminded me of him. Do you belong to Riversborough?"

"No," he answered; "but my name is Jean Merle, and I am related to Madame Sefton, his mother. I suppose there is some of the same blood in Roland Sefton and me."

"That is it," said the bookseller cordially. "I thought you were a foreigner, though you speak English so well."

"There was some mystery about Roland Sefton's death?" remarked Jean Merle.

"No, no; at least not much," was the answer.

"He went away on a long holiday, unluckily without announcing it, on account of bank business; though Mr. Clifford, the senior partner, was on his way to take charge of affairs. There was but one day between Roland Sefton's departure and Mr. Clifford's arrival, but during that very day, for some reason or other unknown, the head clerk committed suicide, and there was a panic and a run upon the bank. Unfortunately there was no means of writing to Sefton, who had started for the continent."

"Mr. Clifford did not see any necessity for his return; but just as his six months' absence was over—not all holiday, as folks said, for there was foreign business to see after—he died by accident in Switzerland. I know the truth better than most people; for Mr. Clifford came here often, and dropped many a hint. Some persons still say the police were seeking for Roland; but that is not true. It was an unfortunate concatenation of circumstances."

"You knew him well?" said Jean Merle.

"Yes; we were school-fellows and friends," answered the bookseller, "and a finer fellow never breathed. He was always eager to get on, and to help other people on. We have not had such a public-spirited man among us since he died. It cuts me to the heart when anybody pretends that he absconded. Absconded! Why! there were dozens of us who would have made him welcome to every penny we could command. But I own appearances were against him, and he never came back to clear them up, and prove his innocence."

"And this is his wife's best book," said Jean Merle, holding it with shaking, nerveless hands. Felicitas's book! The tears burned under his eyelids as he looked down on it.

"I won't say it is the best; it is my favorite," replied the bookseller. "Her son, Felix Sefton, a clergyman now, was in here yesterday, asking the same question. If you are related to Madame Sefton, you'll be very welcome at the Old Bank; and you'll find both of Madame's grand-children visiting old Mr. Clifford. I'll send one of my boys to show you the house."

"Not now," said Jean Merle. If Mr. Clifford was yet living he must be careful what risks he ran. Hatred has eyes as keen as love; and if any one could break through his secret it would be the implacable old man, who had still the power of sending him to a convict prison.

A shudder ran through him at the dread idea of detection. What would it be to Felicitas now, when her name was famous, to have it dragged down to ignominy and utter disgrace? The dishonor would be a hundred-fold the greater for the fair reputation she had won, and the popularity she had secured. And her children too! Worse for them past all words would it be than if they were still little creatures, ignorant of the value of the world's opinion. He bade the bookseller good-morning, and threaded his way through many alleys and by-lanes of the old town until he reached a ferry and a boat-house, where many a boat lay ready for him, as they had always done when he was a boy. He seated himself in one of them, and taking the oars, fell down with the current to the willows under the garden-wall of his old home.

He steered his boat aside into a small creek, where the willow-wands grew tall and thick, from which he could see the whole river frontage of the old house. Was there any change in it? His keen, despairing gaze could not detect one. The high tilted gables in the roof stood out clear against the sky, with their spiral wooden rods projecting above them. The oriel window cast its slowly moving shadow on the half-timber walls; and the many lattice casements, with their small diamond-shaped panes, glistened in the sun as in the days gone by. The garden-plots were unchanged, and the smooth turf on the terraces was as green and soft as when he ran at his mother's side along them.

The old house brought to his mind his mother rather than his wife. It was full of associations and memories of her, with her sweet, humble, self-sacrificing nature. There was repose and healing in the very thought of her, which seemed to touch his anguish with a strong and soothing hand. Was there an echo of her voice still lingering for him about the old spot where he had listened to it so often? Could he hear her calling to him by his name, the name he had buried irrecoverably in a foreign grave? For the first time for many years he bent down his face upon his hands, and wept many tears; not bitter ones, full of grief as they were. His mother was dead; he had not wept for her till now.

Presently there came upon the summer silence the sound of a young, clear, laughing voice, calling "Phebe"; and he lifted up his head to look once more at the house. An old man, with silvery white hair was pacing slowly to and fro on the upper terrace, and a slight girlish figure was beside him. That was old Clifford, his enemy; but could that girl be Hilda? A face looked out of one of the windows, smiling down upon this young girl, which he knew again as Phebe Marlowe's. By-and-by she came down to the terrace, with a tall, fine-looking young man walking beside her; and all three, bidding farewell to the old man, descended from terrace to terrace, becoming every minute more distinct to his eyes.

Yes, there was Phebe; and these others must be his girl Hilda and his son Felix. They were near to him, every word they spoke reached his ears, and penetrated to his heart. They seemed more beautiful, more perfect than any young creatures he had ever beheld. He listened to them unfastening the chain which secured the boat, and to the creaking of the row-locks as they fitted the oars into them. It was as if one of his own long-lost days was come back again to earth, when he had sat where Felix was now sitting, with Felicita instead of Hilda dipping her little white hand into the water. He had scarcely eyes for Phebe; but he was conscious that she was there, for Hilda was speaking to her in a low voice which just reached him. "See," she said, "that man has one of my mother's books! And he is quite a common man!"

"As much a common man, perhaps, as I am a common woman," answered Phebe, in a gentle though half-reproving tone.

As long as his eyes could see them they were fastened upon the receding boat; and long after he gazed in the direction in which they had gone. He had had the passing glimpse he longed for into the Paradise he had forfeited. This was his place, appointed to him by God, where he could have served God best, and served Him in as perfect gladness and freedom as the earth gives to any of her children. What lot could have been more blessed? The lines had fallen unto him in pleasant places; he had had a goodly heritage, and he had lost it through grasping dishonestly at a larger share of what this world called success. The madness and the folly of his sin smote him with unutterable bitterness.

He could bear to look at it no longer. The yearning he had felt to see his old home was satisfied; but the satisfaction seemed an increase of sorrow. He would not wait to witness the return of his children. The old man was gone into the house, and the garden was quiet and deserted.

With weary strokes he rowed back again up the river; and with a heavier weight of sorrow and a keener consciousness of sin he made his way through the streets so familiar to his tread. It was as if no eye saw him, and no heart warmed to him in his native town. He was a stranger in a strange place; there was none to say to him, here or elsewhere on earth, "You are one of us."

There was one other place he must see before he went out again from this region of many memories, to which all that he could call life was linked—the little farmstead on the hills, which, of all places, had been his favorite haunt when a boy, and which had been the last spot he had visited before fleeing from England. Phebe Marlowe he had seen; if he went away at once he could see her home before her return to it. Next to his mother and his wife, he knew that Phebe was most likely to recognize him, if recognition by any one was possible. Most likely old Marlowe was dead; but if not, his senses would surely be too dull to detect him.

The long, hot, white highway, dusty with a week's drought, carried back his thoughts so fully to old times that he walked on unconscious of the noontide heat and the sultriness of the road. Yet when he came to the lanes, green overhead and underfoot, and as silent as the mountain-heights round Engelberg, he felt the solace of the change. All the recollections treasured up in the secret cells of memory were springing into light at every step; and these were remembrances less bitter than those the sight of his lost home had called to mind.

He felt himself less of a phantom here, where no one met him or crossed his path, than in the streets where many faces looking blankly at him wore the well-known features of old comrades. By the time he gained the moorland, and looked across its purple heather and yellow gorse, his mind was in a healthier mood than it had been for years. The low thatched roof of the small homestead, and the stunted and twisted trees surrounding it, seemed like a possible refuge to him, where for a little while he might find shelter from the storm of life. He pressed on with eagerness, and found himself quickly at the door, which he had never found fastened against him.

But it was locked now. After knocking twice he tried the latch, but it did not open. He went to the little window, uncurtained as usual, and peered in, but all was still and dark; there was not a glimmer of light on the hearth, where he had always seen some glimmering embers. There was no sign of life about the place; no dog barking, no sheep bleating, or fowls fluttering about the little farm-yard. All the innocent, joyous gayety of the place had vanished; yet he could see that it was not falling into decay; the thatch was in repair, the dark interior, dimly visible through the window, was as it used to be. It was not a ruin, but neither was it a home. A home might have received him within its hospitable walls, or a ruin might have given him an hour's shelter. But Phebe's door was shut against him, though he felt it would have done him good to stand within it once more, a penitent man.

He was turning away sadly, when a loud rustic voice called to him; and Simon Nixey, almost hidden under a huge load of dried ferns, came into sight. Jean Merle stepped down the stone causeway of the farmyard to open the gate for him.

"What are you doing here?" Simon inquired suspiciously.

"A wood-carver, called old Marlowe, used to live here," he answered, "what has become of him?"

"Dead!" said Simon; "dead this many a year. Why, if you know anything, you ought to know that."

"What did he die of?" asked Jean Merle.

"A broken heart, if ever man did," answered Simon; "he'd saved a mint o' money by scraping and moiling; and he lost it all when there was a run on the Old Bank over thirteen years ago. He couldn't talk about it like other folks, poor old Dummy! and it struck inwards, as you may say. It killed him as certain as if they'd shot a bullet into him."

Jean Merle staggered as if Simon had struck him a heavy blow. He had no thought of anything like this, old Marlowe dying broken-hearted, and Phebe left alone in the world. Simon Nixey seemed pleased at the impression his words had produced.

"Ay!" he said, "it was hard on old Marlowe; and it drove my cousin, John Nixey, into desperate ways o' drinking. Not but all the money was paid up; only it was too late for them two. Every penny was paid, so as folks had nothing to say against the Old Bank. Only money won't bring a dead man back to life again. I offered Phebe to make her my wife before I knew it 'ud be paid back; but she always said no, till I grew tired of it, and married somebody else."

"And where is she now?" inquired Jean Merle.

"Oh! she's quite the fine lady," answered Simon. "Mrs. Roland Sefton, Lord Riversford's daughter that was, took quite a fancy to her, and had her to live with her in London; not as a servant, you know, but as a friend; and she paints pictures wonderful. My mother, who lives house-keeper with Mr. Clifford, hears say she can get sixty pounds or more for one likeness. Think of that now! If she'd been my wife what a fortune she'd have been to me."

"Has she sold this place?" asked Jean Merle.

"There it is," he replied; "she gave her father a faithful promise never to part with it, or I'd have bought it myself. She comes here once a year with Miss Hilda and Mr. Felix, and they stay a week or two; and it's shut up all the rest of the time. I've got the key here if you'd like to look inside at old Dummy's carving."

THE INTERVAL BETWEEN THE TWO STAGES OF THE ADVENT OF OUR LORD.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B., Rector of Middleton and Canon of Cloyne.

Two Stages in Christ's Second Advent Undoubted—Will there be an Interval between Them?—The Question Answered Affirmatively—Direct Arguments in its Favor—From Analogy—Necessity for Presumed Interval—One Aspect of Christ's Coming is Its Suddenness—Events Antecedent to the Second Stage of the Advent—A Difficulty Solved—Scripture References in Proof—The First Resurrection—The Translation before the Tribulation—The "Days of Noah"—Inferred Reasons for the Interval.

THE NECESSITY FOR SUCH AN INTERVAL.

Now if, in what I have thus far advanced, I have at all succeeded in removing the objections to, and in intimating first the possibility, and in the next place the probability, of the occurrence of an interval between the two stages of the Advent—I shall have so far cleared the way for more positive argument for the necessity of such an interval, and for further and more direct proof that such will actually occur.

The argument which first brought conviction to my own mind as to the necessity for this interval, and the certainty of its occurrence, is as follows:

When we take up the words of our blessed Lord Himself upon the subject of His Second Advent, viewed, as we should at all times endeavor to view it, in its solemn, searching, personal, practical application to ourselves, we find an Advent put before us for the sudden occurrence of which we are to be ever and always on the watch, as an event which may on any day, at any hour, at any moment, take place, and of which He solemnly warns us that when it does take place, it will be "at such an hour as we think not." (Luke 12:40.) He will come, He tells us, to raise dead saints and to change living ones, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." He will come to do this, with a suddenness upon His part, and an absence of foreknowledge upon theirs, which will find "two women grinding together at the same millstone," "two men working together in the same field," of whom one, being ready, will be "taken"; the other, being unready, will be "left." "Behold!" He says, "I come as a thief." Therefore, He bids us to be ever on the watch for His coming, "with our loins girt about and our lamps burning," in an attitude of unremitting expectancy, "like men who wait for the coming of their Lord when He will return from the wedding, that when He comes and knocks they may open to Him immediately."

ONE ASPECT OF CHRIST'S COMING.

He speaks of a coming of which He expressly forewarns us that it may take place "in the second watch or in the third watch." (See Luke 12 : 35-40.) He says, further, "Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the Master of the house cometh, at even, at midnight, at cock-crowing, or in the morning, lest, coming suddenly, He find you sleeping." (Mark 13 : 35-37.) Here is one aspect of the Advent. But it is not the only one. We also find our blessed Lord speaking of His Second Coming thus : "Immediately, after the tribulation of these days, the sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers that are in the heavens shall be shaken" (very sure and solemn premonitory signals, these), "and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory" (no suddenness, no unexpectedness here !)

We have, further, in exact accordance with this language, the prediction of the Advent (Zechariah 14), when He comes at a time at which, after the Jews shall have been restored to Jerusalem, all nations shall be gathered in siege against them, and when, in the midst of this siege, He shall descend, and all His previously translated saints with Him, and "His feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives." We have, exactly corresponding with this, the prophecy of Enoch, as recorded in the epistle of Jude, of the descent of the Lord, accompanied by His saints, in overwhelming judgment upon the world of the ungodly. And we have, lastly, the perfectly accordant prediction in Revelation 19 of the descent from the open heavens of the Son of God, followed by "the armies in heaven," to tread the winepress of His wrath, and to crush and destroy the last Antichrist and all His adherents with a judgment, the account of which is more than enough to make us shudder as we read it.

THE SECOND STAGE OF THE ADVENT.

Here is another and very different aspect of the Advent. I ask any unprejudiced person, Is it conceivable that these two stages of the Second Advent should be simultaneous? Is it not probable that there should be some, is it at all likely, or almost possible that there should be no interval between them? If there be no interval between them, if, unlike the First, the Second Advent of the Lord Jesus Christ be altogether one event, which is in its entirety to take place in a very brief period of time, then, and here to my mind is the incontrovertible point in our argument—we are solemnly bidden and enjoined to watch for, and to be in hourly expectation of, an Advent between which and us nevertheless there are several predicted events, such as the restoration of the Jews to Jerusalem, the exceeding great tribulation, the portentous signs in sun and moon and stars, the gathering of the armies of the nations in siege against Jerusalem—which must each and all occur before this Advent can possibly take place ; and not only none of which events had occurred before our blessed Lord gave utterance to these exhortations to watchfulness and expectancy, but none of which have as yet occurred : all of which are as yet in the future.

If this indeed be so, it is manifestly and utterly impossible for us to comply with these injunctions of our Lord to incessant watchfulness—just as impossible as it would be for us now, in the mid-winter to expect and to watch for the coming harvest. We know that the harvest will come, but we know that the winds of March, the showers of April, the verdure of May, the sunshine of June, the heat of July, are all between us and that harvest, and therefore to watch for and expect it now would be the height of foolishness. Not less foolish would it be for us to watch for and expect the Second Advent now, if we are to believe that there are several predicted events, each one of which must occupy more or less time in its accomplishment, and all of which are put between us and it in the unerring Word of God. Yet to regard His Second Coming as an event which may happen any day, or hour or moment, is, as we have seen, expressly a duty enjoined upon us by the Lord Himself, and in the non-performance of which, if so be that we do not perform it, we are positively disobedient to His will, and lay ourselves open to loss.

THE ONLY SOLUTION OF THE DIFFICULTY arising from such a view of the Advent—the only alternative that I can conceive possible between the view, on the one hand, which blindly and ignorantly overlooks and ignores the events which are positively affirmed to precede the Lord's return to the earth—and the view, on the other hand, which, recognizing these events, and regarding them as intervening between us and His coming, thereby renders all watchfulness and all expectancy of the character which He has himself enjoined, altogether out of the question. 'Tis simply this—that the stage of His Advent which we are bidden thus always to watch for and to expect, is that first stage of His coming for His saints to the air, and between which and us there is no necessarily intervening occurrence whatsoever ; while between this first stage, always thus imminent, and His subsequent descent with His saints in judgment to the earth, there will be an interval unrevealed, and possibly of no very brief duration—during which interval all the, up to that time, unfulfilled prophecies of events which are to precede the commencement of His righteous reign over this world shall be, every one of them, exhaustively fulfilled. Thus do we arrive, as it seems to me, at the actual necessity for that interval between these two stages in the Second Advent, which is the subject of our consideration at present.

SCRIPTURE REFERENCES IN PROOF.

I shall now conclude with a brief reference to some few passages of God's blessed Word, which seem to me to intimate, and that not obscurely, the occurrence of such an interval, as also to shed happy light upon its purpose with regard to Christ's believing people. I refer in the first instance to Isaiah 26 : 19-21.

We find here a prophetic address to the Jewish nation, concerning true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ among them, "Thy dead shall live, My dead body shall they arise." So closely united to the Lord are these dead members of the Jewish nation, that He regards them and speaks of them as "His dead body," members of His mystical body, which, while they continue in the grave, He regards as still dead—not yet brought to life.

The address then continues, "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust, for your dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead,"—language which proves that it is a literal resurrection which is here spoken of—the resurrection of the dead in Christ, which shall take place at that first stage of His Advent, His coming for His saints to the air, to which the Lord here refers.

He then addresses a further summons to these risen saints, "Come, My people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee—hide thee, as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast, for the Lord cometh out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity." Unless this summons to a place of refuge and safety during the execution of judgments upon the earth, and addressed to risen saints, refer to their being caught up to the Lord to the air, there to abide with Him in safety during the intervening period of the great tribulation, and before His final descent with them in judgment upon the earth, I can form no idea of what the passage refers to, or of how it is to be interpreted or fulfilled.

THE TRANSLATION BEFORE THE TRIBULATION.

Again in Luke, chapter 21, after our Lord has foretold the tribulation, the wrath, the judgments, the fearful signs and portents which shall precede His Advent to the earth, we read the exhortation, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always that ye may be counted worthy to escape (Greek, fly out of) all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (verse 36). The Greek word here employed is, I submit, such as to exclude the possibility of the escape from these things being effected as some have supposed, by being preserved in safety in the midst of them :—while the last clause of the passage, "And to stand before the Son of Man," would seem not uncertainly to indicate the nature of the escape, and the place of safety, which the subjects of this escape are to occupy above, while all these things are coming to pass below.

In apparent conformity with this injunction, we meet with the promise (Rev. 3 : 10) "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I will keep thee from the hour of trial, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

THE "DAYS OF NOAH."

Again, in Luke 17 : 26, 37, we find a striking analogy instituted by our blessed Lord between the days of Noah and those of the coming of the Son of Man, one feature of which in the latter He affirms to be the taking of the one, and the leaving of the other, of the two in the bed, and at the mill, and in the field. In looking for a parallel in this respect, between the days of Noah and the period of the Advent, we find that there was an interval of seven days between the summons addressed to Noah by the Lord to enter into the ark, and all his household with him, and the outpouring of the waters of the flood upon the earth (Genesis 7 : 1, 10). It seems worthy of notice that St. Peter, also speaking of the resemblance between these two periods, says (2 Peter 2 : 4-9), "If God spared not the old world, but saved Noah, the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of trial, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished."

INFERRED REASONS.

Once more, turning to the book of Revelation, we are shown, in chapters 4 and 5, "in the midst of the throne and round about the throne" of the Lord a company, not of disembodied spirits, for they sit upon thrones and have crowns of gold upon their heads, but of embodied, risen, glorified saints, singing a new song to Him who has "redeemed them by His blood out of every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, and has made them kings and priests unto God," and adding that they shall "reign on the earth." All this, be it specially noticed, before yet one of the seven judgment seals of the Apocalypse has been broken—one of its seven woe trumpets has been sounded, or one of its seven vials of wrath has been poured out. This would seem to be the last link in the chain of, it may be indirect, but not for that reason, inconclusive evidence, not only that there will be such an interval as that which we are considering between the two stages in the Second Advent of our Lord ; but also that one of the blessed purposes of this interval will be the delivering and sheltering of His people from the scenes of "indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish," which shall then be about to be enacted upon the earth, when, in accordance with the fearfully expressive language of the same book, "Men shall seek death, but shall not find it, and shall desire to die, but death shall flee from them."

Another purpose of this interval would seem to be that of the Lord's reckoning with His servants—as represented in the parables of the talents and the pounds, and assigning to them their several positions of office and authority in His kingdom, prior to their actual entrance into, and taking possession of it, with Him ; and, further, the public completion and ratification of the union between them and Him which is spoken of as "the marriage of the Lamb," and which it is clearly intimated will take place above, and not upon this earth. I have thus endeavored to set forth, as it has presented itself to me, the line of argument whereby a searcher of the Scriptures upon the subject of the Second Coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, may satisfy himself that an interval of unrevealed duration is to occur between the Advent to the air and the Advent to the earth. The importance of the question in its bearing upon that Advent and the events connected with and consequent upon it, and more especially in its bearing upon our own personal position of watchfulness therefore, can scarcely be overrated, and must be evident to all who give any thought or attention to the subject.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Lieutenant Danenhower, of the Jeannette Expedition, arrived in Moscow on Saturday, and after a day's rest set out for St. Petersburg. It is expected that while in that city he will undergo an operation upon his eyes. The Siberian doctors informed him that the left eye would have to be removed, as its recovery was hopeless, and unless it was taken out it would probably cause the loss of sight in the other eye. He was able to give to a New York Herald correspondent a graphic narrative of the first year of the Jeannette's voyage, from which it appears that the hardships the explorers underwent, the tedium of their lives, and the constant danger they were in of being crushed by the ice, which pressed and ground the sides of the vessel, made the expedition one of the most remarkable in the annals of Arctic exploration. During the long Arctic night, which lasted from November 10th to January 25th, various expedients were resorted to to amuse the men and prevent them becoming dispirited. Lieutenant Danenhower says "the discipline of the ship was excellent, and during the whole twenty-one months in the pack there was but one punishment given, and that was for profanity." No intelligence has yet been received from the party searching for Captain De Long and his men.

The Financial Statement of Great Britain is always anticipated with some interest, it being regarded as one of the safest indications of the European trade and prospects. Mr. Gladstone on April 24th delivered his annual speech on the subject. He stated that the surplus of revenue over expenditure for the past year had been equivalent to $1,760,000. The revenue from tea had increased, while that from beer had fallen below the estimate. The total revenue of the year amounted to $430,950,000. The increased cost of the army and police for duty in Ireland had been $2,250,000 over that of the previous year. Mr. Gladstone said the Americans had shown extraordinary vigor and fortitude in reducing their debt and in bearing heavy taxation for that purpose. He thought English modern history was hardly so creditable. Mr. Gladstone quoted statistics showing that in 1879-80 fifty-one per cent of the revenue was raised from alcohol, whereas during the past year only forty-three per cent was realized from that source. Meanwhile, although wages were lower than in the very prosperous year of 1872, the deposits in savings banks were larger. He stated that the national debt had been reduced by $35,845,000 during the year.

The Execution of Dr. Lamson, the American physician convicted of murdering his wife's brother, in England, took place on Friday, April 28th. The prisoner had been twice respited at President Arthur's request, in order to afford opportunity for transmitting evidence of his insanity from this country. When it arrived, however, it failed to satisfy the British authorities that Dr. Lamson merited clemency, and he was accordingly hanged. Previous to his execution he wrote a letter confessing that he was guilty of the murder, but attributing his act to mental disease produced by indulgence in morphia, the drug which is now so freely used in American society. He forwarded a request to the authorities that his body might be dissected in order that a scientific examination of the effects of morphia might be made, but the request was denied and his body was buried in the jail yard according to the English custom.

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl Cowper, has resigned, and Earl Spencer has been appointed to succeed him. The change is regarded as a hopeful sign by the Irish leaders. It is well known that Lord Spencer is opposed to coercion, and his appointment encourages hope that the system will be abandoned. Administered as it has been by the government, the coercion act has irritated the people while it has failed of its purpose in stopping the outrages. There are other indications of a change of principle in the government's policy. Among them are Mr. Gladstone's remarks on the bill prepared by Mr. Parnell and introduced in the House of Commons on his behalf of Mr. Redmond. Its object is to extend the benefits of the Land Act. Mr. Gladstone said the Land Act must not be disturbed; but this opinion did not apply to the purchase and arrears clauses of it. The latter clause certainly fell far short of its object and should be legislated upon early in the present session. The government would approach the question impartially, listening to the suggestions of all qualified persons, and settling the question effectually. He praised the system for settling arrears sketched in the Irish bill, and said he knew that many landlords thought a settlement should be compulsory. He considered that relief should take the form of a gift and not that of a loan. Mr. Gladstone stated that he would discuss the purchase clauses on Mr. Smith's motion. He said he saw in the Irish bill the first gleam of hope on a dark subject, for, although he was confident of the power of the empire, compulsion, he declared was completely alien to the spirit of the constitution.

A Serious Crisis in the Affairs of Zululand is reported. The London News states that a deputation of Zulus, numbering one thousand persons, and including three brothers of Cetewayo, is awaiting an audience with the Governor to protest against the authority of John Dunn. Great care is necessary to prevent terrible bloodshed. Another despatch states that Governor Sir Henry Bulwer has declined to see the deputation of Zulus and has directed them to return home. John Dunn is the Englishman who became a Zulu chief after the war, and was charged before the war with having supplied the Zulus with arms and liquor.

Araby Bey, who was Formerly the Leader of the Egyptian Insurgents, but who now holds office as Secretary of War, has assumed a friendly attitude toward the representatives of the foreign Powers. The London Times publishes a letter from him to the British Consul at Cairo, dated April 6th, in which he declares that the European control will not be hindered in the discharge of its duty. It never has been the intention of the Egyptian Ministry, he says, to touch the rights of the controllers or trespass upon any international treaty. All rumors spread in Europe about excessive military expenditure in Egypt are unfounded.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has so far Recovered from his recent illness as to be able to resume his duties. He preached on April 9th, at the Metropolitan Tabernacle to a crowded congregation. The report of his sermon has been delayed in arriving at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, until too late for publication this week, but will appear in our next issue.

Mr. Samuel Morley, M. P., the Philanthropic friend of young men, made an eloquent appeal for temperance on April 4th, at a large meeting in Exeter Hall, London. He said that during his fifty years' experience of the city he had witnessed the social ruin of many young men through giving way to the temptation of drink, men who started life with equally as good prospects as he had. Speaking as a magistrate, he said he had not the least doubt of the essential soundness of the principle of local option; and he knew that Mr. Gladstone had arrived at the conclusion that some substantial measure was requisite to diminish existing temptations to drink, and to render less numerous, obnoxious, and obtrusive those traps and pitfalls into which not only young men but men of all ages and classes too readily fell. Public-houses were far too numerous. Short of seeing them abolished altogether, which he heartily wished, he should like to see them greatly reduced. In the city of Bristol the proportion of public-houses to other houses was as 1 to 30, and as 1 to every 200 inhabitants.

The Marriage of Prince Leopold, the Youngest son of Queen Victoria, with the Princess Helen of Waldeck-Pyrmont, was solemnized on Thursday, April 27th, at Windsor. The ceremony was conducted with imposing magnificence. The young bridegroom, who is severely afflicted, being subject to epileptic fits and other maladies, limped to the altar with the aid of a stick, having barely recovered from the effects of his recent attack of sickness. The correspondent of the New York Herald, in cabling an account of the proceedings, said that the Princess Helen is quite a scholar, although a simple, ladylike country girl. Her pleasure at Arolsen, which is a secluded and picturesque spot, was found in study. The Princess is, as her portrait indicates, spontaneous and frank. She recites with taste and is quite musical. An interesting scene was witnessed when she left her father's court which indicates that the Princess was popular there. When the day of her departure was near, the maids and matrons of her fatherland came to bid her farewell, to offer her their best wishes and to present their parting gifts. One brought tapestry, others cushions and work-baskets and many trifles made or used by the home-loving people. Perhaps the most touching offering was a small engraving in a simple frame of black wood, sent by the orphans of the Principality, in whom the Princess has always taken a warm interest. Afterward all partook of a plentiful supper, while the young Princess moved about among the friends of her youth and childhood with a bright smile and pleasant word for all. Prince Leopold's portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 30th, 1880.

A German Emigrant Recently Sent a Significant reply to Prince Bismarck on being notified that he must present himself at a certain place in Prussia for military service under the conscription, under penalty of six months' imprisonment. He wrote: "My dear Bismarck—I feel highly flattered by your kind invitation, addressed to me at my native town, to join the German army, but am afraid I shall not be able to accept it, for I am now in England, engaged in the more useful work (as I consider it) of expounding mental science and teaching people how to make the best use of their faculties. I have altogether given up fighting since I left school. I do not know that I have anything particular to fight about now, and hardly care to engage in fighting at any one else's bidding. If you have a quarrel with anybody, I would advise you to settle it amicably if possible, or else fight it out yourself."

A Christian Lady-Physician now Working in the missionary field in Madras, India, in a letter recently addressed to a friend thus describes the result of concentrated labor: "Before I first began to speak to people about their sins, I think I was satisfied in trying to do good in a general way. But I was aroused from this state, one evening, by hearing an eminent Christian in a public meeting, mention the short number of years in which the entire population of India would be converted, if each year every professed Christian would succeed in converting one other. I resolved that night that I would give up trying to do good generally, and bring all my powers to bear on one soul. I never spoke and prayed so earnestly before, and the lady whom I selected that night is not only converted, but also her husband and others besides. Will you, too, begin in the same way to strive for the conversion of some one soul, and write me the result? Do not leave off until that soul can say that he or she has given up everything for the Master, and has found that peace which only His Holy Spirit can give. That is the only true test of thorough conversion."

Vol. IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1881, with complete index. Price, $3 including postage: ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

A VERY general expression of sorrow came forth from all denominations of Christians when the news was received that the good Bishop of Ohio was dead. Though he was an old man and his health had not been robust all through his life, his death was not regarded as imminent. He had gone to Europe for rest and recuperation, as he had done several times before, and it was hoped that, as on previous occasions, he would return invigorated in body and mind. But his earthly course was run, the Master had need of him and his friends here saw him no more. A sense of loss was then felt not only in the Episcopal Church, to which he belonged, but among Christians of other communions; for the Bishop had been a man of broad sympathies, ready to extend the hand of fellowship and to render hearty assistance to all followers of the Lord Jesus by whatever name they might be known among men. Both here and in Europe, where his eminent piety and high attainments attracted many friends, Dr. McIlvaine's death was mourned, and his name still occupies an honored place in the memory of the Church of Christ. It is now nearly nine years since he passed away, but it will be long before his name, his character, and his work are forgotten here, and we may be sure that in the Church above they will be held in everlasting remembrance.

Charles Pettit McIlvaine was born at Burlington, N. J., January 18th, 1799. He came of

AN ANCIENT AND DISTINGUISHED FAMILY, which traces its genealogy on the one hand to the royal House of Stuart, and on the other to the Kennerlys, a Scottish house of which the Marquis of Ailsa is the head. It was in the early part of the eighteenth century that the McIlvaine from whom the Bishop is directly descended emigrated from Scotland to this country, and settled in or near Philadelphia, Penn. His descendants subsequently resided at Bristol, Penn., where the Bishop's father, Joseph McIlvaine, was born. He entered the profession of the law, and was very successful. He removed to Burlington, N. J., where his aunt resided. She had married General Bloomfield, who served with distinction in the war of 1812, and who afterward became Governor of New Jersey. Joseph McIlvaine prospered in his adopted State and was elected United States Senator by the Legislature, which honorable position he occupied until his death in 1826. He married Miss Maria Reed, of Burlington, the niece of Joseph Reed, Washington's confidential secretary and the first Governor of Pennsylvania. All through his life Bishop McIlvaine spoke in terms of the highest veneration of both his parents, who though moving in the best society in their own State and at Washington were not ashamed of their Christian profession.

HIS CONVERSION AT COLLEGE.

Senator McIlvaine and his wife were deeply impressed with their parental responsibility, and their solicitude for the spiritual welfare of their son, the future Bishop, was incessant. He received his preliminary education at the Burlington Academy, and proceeded thence to Princeton, where he graduated in 1816. It was during his college course at Princeton that his soul was awakened by the power of divine truth, and his heart opened to the teachings of the Holy Spirit. Writing about this long afterward Bishop McIlvaine says: "It is more than fifty years since I witnessed such a revival of religion. It was in the college of which I was a student. It was powerful and prevailing, and fruitful in the conversion of young men to God; and it was quiet, unexcited, and entirely free from all devices or means, beyond the few and simple which God has appointed, namely, prayer and the ministry of the Word. In that precious season of the power of God my religious life began, I had heard before; I began then to know."

A MESSENGER FROM SATAN.

Of this period also he wrote in 1869: "I think it was just after, or a little before I graduated at college, when I was about seventeen or eighteen years of age, and about a year or eighteen months after I had been turned to the Lord, I was at my father's house in Burlington, N. J. I had a rule of going each evening at the setting of the sun to my chamber for prayer. One afternoon, as that time approached, I was sitting in the parlor with some company that had just come in. Presently I said to myself, 'The sun is down—go to your room.' But I answered to myself, 'They will go directly, and I will wait.' As I waited, the disposition to go decreased. I said to myself, 'I had better go at once,' and arose and went. I had no sooner got out of the parlor into the hall, where I was to ascend the staircase, than an indescribable dread came over me, as if some mysterious agency of terror were resisting me. I began the ascent by force. As I went up, the dread increased to such a degree that I trembled in every limb, and perspiration broke out at every pore; I took hold of the banister and dragged myself up.

"My room was at the end of a passage; I pushed forward and got hold of the handle of the door. The dread increased. It seemed a horror of great darkness. I stood for a moment questioning whether I dare open the door. I opened, and rushed to the chair at which I was accustomed to kneel at the opposite side of the room. I knelt and in broken sentences prayed, two or three times looking behind me as if I expected to see some being there. I could not pray but briefly; I rose and instantly the whole dread began to vanish away as a cloud. I believe it was a messenger of Satan. It was an awful encounter. It has helped me to believe solemnly in the Bible-teaching of that adversary, whom we must resist with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit."

HIS ORDINATION AND FIRST CHARGE.

Mr. McIlvaine's ordination to the diaconate was solemnized in June, 1820, by the venerable Bishop White, in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia. He had previously been actively engaged in Sunday-school work, and had been instrumental in connection with his classmate, afterward Dr. Hodge, of Princeton, in founding Sunday-schools near Princeton and at Burlington. While a candidate for orders he continued active in this and other Christian work, and after his ordination he received a call, which he accepted, in August, 1820, from the vestry of Christ Church, Georgetown, D. C., to succeed the Rev. Reuel Keith. This important step taken he entered upon a bright course of ministerial usefulness which continued unobscured for half a century.

In October, 1822, Mr. McIlvaine was married to one whom he "had known from her childhood," and to whom he was devotedly attached—a young lady name Emily Cox. On attaining his twenty-fourth year he was ordained priest, March, 1823, in St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, by Bishop Kemp. While still in deacon's orders, he had the honor of being elected Chaplain to the Senate of the United States, and was probably the youngest clergyman ever appointed to serve in that capacity.

APPOINTED CHAPLAIN OF WEST POINT.

In January, 1825, his health being affected by the climate of Georgetown, he accepted the appointment of Chaplain and Professor of Ethics at the United States Military Academy, at West Point, on the river Hudson, which position he retained for about three years. Bishop Lee, who knew him well and who throughout his life was one of his most intimate friends, thus wrote of this period after Bishop McIlvaine's death: "This was an era in the history of West Point. The chapel service, which had been looked upon as a weariness, became full of interest. The cadets laid aside their books to listen to the powerful expositions of the Word, and earnest appeals to the conscience. New convictions of the truths of Christianity, and their own personal concern therein as immortal beings, redeemed by the blood of the Cross, thrilled many souls. It is said that half the corps became Christian men, many of whom, eminent in military and civil life, adorned the doctrine of God their Saviour."

Brooklyn, N. Y., was Mr. McIlvaine's next sphere of ministerial labor. In November, 1827, he undertook the rectorship of St. Ann's, in which position he spent more than four years, in delightful and abundant labors for Christ; and of the impression there made there are yet many living witnesses.

FIRST VISIT TO EUROPE.

An attack of neuralgia necessitated a period of entire rest in 1830. His physician recommended a sea voyage, and he set sail for England on March 8th. On his arrival in London he received hearty greeting from men like Lords Gambier, Bexley, Lorton, Mount Sandford, besides clergy, and Christian officers, military and naval, and seemed especially gratified by meeting the late Honorable and Rev. Baptist Noel, and the Rev. D. Wilson, afterward Bishop of Calcutta.

A SUNDAY IN PARIS.

During this transatlantic trip Mr. McIlvaine paid a visit to Paris, where he witnessed the shocking reality of a Parisian Sunday. Rising from bed in the morning and forgetful of the peculiarity of the land, he was astonished to see on going to the window the market as much studded with vegetables and crowded with business and surrounded with noise as usual. After breakfast he walked out a little way to see the state of things in the street, and, writing of what he then saw, he says, "My spirit seemed loaded with the daring atheism of this people. I never had such an impression of a state of general rebellion against God. It is a horrible city. All the worship that I have seen in the churches is nothing better than baptized heathenism. How fast such a city must be ripening for the judgments of God! He will honor His Sabbath, if men do not."

HIS VISIT TO CAMBRIDGE.

Having returned to England, he visited the University of Cambridge, and was entertained by the saintly Charles Simeon, of King's College, who became an intimate friend of Mr. McIlvaine's.

LECTURES ON CHRISTIAN EVIDENCES.

Upon his return to Brooklyn, Mr. McIlvaine was requested by the Chancellor of the University of New York to deliver and publish a course of lectures on the Evidences of Christianity. The English friends of Mr. McIlvaine were so much impressed with the great value of this work that in 1834 they unanimously decided it should be reprinted, and Dr. Olinthus Gregory undertook the editorial duty.

A very interesting fact was related in New York not long before Bishop McIlvaine's death, by St. Meille, a Waldensian pastor from the College of Florence, which shows the happy effect of a study of the Bishop's powerful book. An Italian officer of good family lost his young wife three months after their marriage. Deeply distressed and desolate, he withdrew from society, and occupied much of his solitude in reading a Bible which had come into his hands. Like many of his fellow-countrymen, he had imbibed sceptical opinions, and though struck with the beauty of its passages, could not receive them as the truth of God. In this condition of mind he saw, on the stall of a colporteur in Venice, an Italian translation of Bishop McIlvaine's book on the "Evidences of Christianity." At once he said, "This is exactly what I want." He purchased and studied the volume, and by God's blessing was not only convinced of the truth of Holy Scripture, but also enlightened by the Holy Spirit to believe and rejoice in its saving truths. Since that time, as a private gentleman, he has done the work of an evangelist.

AN INFIDEL POSTMAN CONVERTED.

A similarly happy effect of this work on the "Evidences" came to Bishop McIlvaine's knowledge only a few weeks before his death. He was spending a few days, during his last transatlantic trip, in London, when the postman, who from frequently bringing letters to him there knew who was staying in the house, called one day when he was off duty, and inquired of the servant if the Bishop was in. On being informed that he was, the man seemed much moved, and asked if he might see him. This was, of course, readily granted; and at the interview (represented in the frontispiece picture) he said, "I greatly desired to see you and express my gratitude for the benefit I have received from your valuable work on the 'Evidences.' I was once an infidel, but now, on reading your book, by God's grace I am a believer; and as on Sunday I have no public duty as a letter-carrier, I go among some of my companions who are sceptical, and endeavor to convert them to the faith I now enjoy."

ELECTED BISHOP OF OHIO.

Mr. McIlvaine's growing popularity was strongly indicated by the anxiety to secure his services in other fields of labor. While giving earnest consideration to two important calls which he had received in 1831, on September 10th of that year he was unanimously elected to the Bishopric by the Convention of the Diocese of Ohio.

Bishop McIlvaine then went to live at Gambier, where he remained until the autumn of 1846, when he removed to Clifton, near Cincinnati. The devout and faithful spirit in which he commenced the duties of his high office characterized the whole of his Episcopate. Gentle, kindly, and affectionate in his private intercourse, when truth and principle were concerned he was unyielding as a rock. The centre of his doctrinal system, the strong foundation of his building, the sun of his firmament, the pole-star of his course, was "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." In a letter, describing the closing scene of a diocesan convention, he writes: "I have chosen a sweet hymn, 'Just as I am,' and have adopted it for all time to come, as long as I shall be here, as my hymn. This hymn contains my religion, my theology, my hope."

SECOND AND THIRD TOURS IN EUROPE.

The combined cares and duties of the diocese and Kenyon College, of which he had undertaken the presidency, began to tell very seriously upon the Bishop's health, and made another voyage, with entire cessation from all work, absolutely necessary for his recovery; and on November 20th, 1834, he again set sail for England. He availed himself of the opportunity again to visit Cambridge and the venerable Charles Simeon, and also addressed the undergraduates of the university. He returned to his episcopal and academical duties in Ohio in May, 1835.

The third visit of Bishop McIlvaine to England was in 1853, when, in consequence of an urgent request, he attended the Jubilee meeting of the British and Foreign Society in London, as a delegate from America. He left New York on April 2d, accompanied by Mrs. McIlvaine, and was received by Bishop Sumner, with the request that they would be his guests during the ordination at Farnham Castle, in July, and also that the Bishop would preach the sermon in the chapel. Previous to their going to Farnham, the American visitors took a short tour on the continent, and during the journey the Bishop had the pleasant surprise of an invitation to the University of Oxford, to receive, in company with some other distinguished persons, the honor of the degree of D. C. L., on the occasion of the installation of the Earl of Derby as Chancellor of the University.

THRILLING INCIDENT ON THE RIVER OHIO.

The closing months of the year found the Bishop in the midst of his diocese again, journeying hither and thither, wherever his counsel was most needed, and his organizing skill laid under requisition for the spiritual good of destitute frontier districts, and the glory of God. On the morning of January 30th, 1855, says the Western Episcopalian, he started for Cincinnati, on his return from a visit to Louisville. He took the steam ferry-boat at Louisville for the purpose of crossing the river, and taking his seat in the Jeffersonville train. The day was bitterly cold, and the Ohio was full of running ice going down in large fields to the falls, which lie below Louisville. The boat became fixed in the middle of the river in a large mass of solid ice, and could neither advance nor recede. Instantly she was at the mercy of the current, and began to move towards the falls. The imminence of the danger became at once apparent. There were two hundred passengers on board—men, women, and children—and it seemed almost certain that all must be lost. The boat and passengers were given up on shore.

WHERE WAS HELP TO COME FROM?

Some there were on board who did know where to look, where all true help is found in time of need. The Bishop and a Methodist minister of Louisville, named Sehon, resolved to draw the women together for prayer. And now

THE HAND OF THE LORD APPEARED.

Man could do nothing. The boat was drifting on to its apparent inevitable wreck. But—was it not God's guiding in answer to prayer?—she struck the hidden reef at the very commencement of the rapids! Thus was salvation effected, though at the moment it was not recognized as such. As the ice struck against the boat, it formed such a mass that it rested on the rock beneath, and constituted a breakwater; and the more violent was the onset of the ice, the more strong and massive did it become.

BOATS TO THE RESCUE.

In this passive resistance to the assaults of the current and the ice, the boat lay about two hours before help came. At length a lifeboat was launched, and three men came out in her, and took out a youth and two young women. In the course of another hour four or five boats and a flat boat manned by a gallant crew, came to the rescue. All the passengers were taken off and Bishop McIlvaine was one of those rescued by the flat boat. On the flush deck, which was even with the sides and covered with straw, about fifty men, of whom Bishop McIlvaine was one, were placed. As there was not room to stand, because of the oars, nor room to sit, they were compelled to kneel. As the crew started for their fearful trial of the falls, the captain ordered silence. When he found that the draught of the boat was only fifteen inches, he said, "It is a poor chance," and evidently thought the case very desperate. He had not expected that the boat would be so heavily loaded.

A MOMENT OF TERRIBLE SUSPENSE.

The powerful current had brought the flat boat almost to the spot where, in another instant, she was to be wrecked, and all lost in the breakers and ice, or they were to be safe. In the crisis of passing down (as shown in our frontispiece picture) the boat struck! It seemed that all was lost! The silence was unbroken. Grating over the rock, she was a moment free, and then struck again. Again she was free, and again struck. Her bottom grated on the reef. Not a word was spoken. The boat floated on. The captain cried out, "Try the pump!" "No water!" was the answer. God had delivered them. Three miles below Louisville, at Portland, the passengers were landed safely, with a great sense of gratitude to the intrepid pilots and their brave crew, and most deeply indebted to the mercy of God.

THE BISHOP PREACHES IN ROME.

In July, 1858, some months of absolute rest were again prescribed, as the Bishop was suffering from an overworked brain, threatening cerebral disease or apoplexy. Accordingly, he once more visited England, France, and Italy. Arriving in Rome, he preached the Gospel on the Pincian Hill, in view of the massive dome of St. Peter, with the stately palace of the Vatican by its side. Realizing the past history of the "City of the Seven Hills," and her present corruptions, he selected as the theme of his discourse John 7:37: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink."

Before he again returned home, he once more visited Cambridge, and had conferred on him the same degree as he had previously received at Oxford. He arrived in Ohio in March, 1859, and renewed his duties with characteristic energy. In consequence of the state of his health and the increase of diocesan work, it was found necessary, in June, 1859, to elect an Assistant-Bishop, and the Convention appointed Dr. Bedell to this position. The choice was exceedingly gratifying to Bishop McIlvaine.

INTERVIEWS WITH THE PRINCE OF WALES.

In the year 1860, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales visited Canada and the United States; and, taking Cincinnati en route, he and his party called upon the Bishop and remained about half an hour in his house. On the next day, which was Sunday, the royal party attended service in St. John's Church, where the Bishop preached. During the latter part of the same month, the Bishop again met the Prince at West Point, and was greeted by the young man with great cordiality; once afterward when driving in his open carriage, on recognizing the Bishop walking at some distance, the Prince at once drove up to him, stopped the carriage, and alighted to converse with him. (Our frontispiece, represents this interview.)

LAST DAYS AND PEACEFUL DEATH.

In the year 1873, Bishop McIlvaine visited Italy. On February 17th, he called upon his banker at Florence, and, being rather oppressed with the heat, he unadvisedly threw off his cloak, and got a severe chill. The two next days he was exceedingly languid; on the evening of the 19th, his breathing became difficult, and the next morning he was evidently seriously ill. Physicians were anxiously consulted by his friends, but, after examination, they announced that the patient was suffering from pulmonary apoplexy, with violent inflammation of the lungs, that there was really no hope of recovery, and that he might depart any hour that very day. But the Bishop lingered on until March 12th. After taking some nourishment on the evening of that day, a change suddenly came on, and he gently laid his head back on the pillow and closed his eyes. His friends were immediately with him, but though they were feeling the pulse, so quiet and gentle was the end that they could not precisely say when the spirit went into the presence of the Divine Lord. It was, indeed, a literal falling asleep in Jesus.

With reverent care the remains of the Bishop were conveyed from Florence, through France, to England, and on the evening of Easter Monday were carried to Westminster Abbey, where the body laid for four days, near the illustrious dead who have been laid to rest in this grand old sanctuary. A special service was conducted on April 18th, and among those who acted as pall-bearers were the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Earl of Harrowby, the Bishop of Winchester, and the American Minister. The remains were conveyed the same night to Liverpool, for transportation to the United States, and the final burial ceremonies were performed in Spring Grove Cemetery, Clifton, Cincinnati, on May 9th.

ADDRESS ON THE SECOND ADVENT.

A short extract from Bishop McIlvaine's New Year's address to the clergy and laity of his diocese, issued January 1, 1871, will appropriately close this sketch of his life. After referring to the war recently ended between Germany and France, and the taking of Rome from the Pope by the Italians, the Bishop said: "There is a prediction, a promise, an expectation, which stands before us continually in the Scriptures, in the fulfilment of which the joy of the people of God will be full, and for which they are expected to look and wait as the chief glory of the Church's future, the consolation of Israel. I mean the second appearing in power and glory of Him whose first coming in humiliation and suffering we have recently celebrated. . . . Present events should turn our minds with great seriousness to the signs of those things which are coming on the earth and give impressiveness to the exhortation of St. Paul founded on that coming as a thief in the night. It is the voice of warning that has been sounding through the ages ever since the Lord Jesus just before He went away, pronounced those words, 'Watch—for ye know not at what hour your Lord doth come.' Oh, brethren, that we all may be like unto that faithful servant who waits for his Lord, that when He cometh he may open to Him immediately."

We are indebted for the foregoing details of Bishop McIlvaine's life and work to a valuable biography of the Bishop, published by Mr. Thomas Whittaker, of the Bible House New York, which contains, beside the facts incorporated in this sketch, many letters, extracts from addresses, and other interesting particulars furnished to the author by the Bishop's family and friends.

CHRISTIANITY AS A DELUSION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
May 7, 1882.

"He made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver."—EZEKIEL 21 : 21.

The Delusions of the Ages—The Delphic Oracle—Modern Delusions—Never Beneficial nor Philanthropic—The Charge Against Christianity—A Champion Delusion—What Christianity has Accomplished—Wonderful Transformations of Character—Admiral Farragut a Glorious Dupe—Saul of Tarsus—A Remarkable Feature of the Delusion—Strong Intellectuals who have Bowled before it—Prominent Infidels not Steadfast against it—Its Conquest of Music—Of Architecture—Of Avarice—Law and Medicine—It Goes to the Bereft—To the Sick and Dying—It Opens Hospitals—The Testimony of Dying Christians—A Reformed Drunkard's Experience—A Mighty Powerful Delusion—Midnight or Mid-noon.

Two modes of divination by which the King of Babylon proposed to find out the will of God. He took a bundle of arrows, put them together, mixed them up, then pulled forth one, and by the inscription on it decided what city he should first assault. Then an animal was slain, and by the lighter or darker color of the liver, the brighter or darker prospect of success was inferred. That is the meaning of the text: "He made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver."

Stupid delusion! And yet all the ages have been filled with delusions. It seems as if

THE WORLD LOVES TO BE HOODWINKED, the delusion of the text only a specimen of a vast number of deceptions practised upon the human race. In the latter part of the last century, Johanna Southcote came forth pretending to have divine power, made prophecies, had chapels built in her honor, and one hundred thousand disciples came forth to follow her. About five years before the birth of Christ, Apollonius was born and he came forth, and after five years being speechless, according to the tradition, he healed the sick and raised the dead, and preached virtue, and, according to the myth, having deceased, was brought to resurrection.

The Delphic Oracle deceived vast multitudes of people; the Pythoness seated in the Temple of Apollo uttering a crazy jargon from which the people guessed their individual or national fortunes or misfortunes. The utterances were of such a nature that you could read them anyway you wanted to read them. A general coming forth to battle consulted the Delphic Oracle, and he wanted to find out whether he was going to be safe in the battle, or killed in the battle, and the answer came forth from the Delphic Oracle in such words that if you put the comma before the word "never," it means one thing, and if you put the comma after the word "never" it means another thing just opposite. The message from the Delphic Oracle to the general was, "Go forth, return never in battle shalt thou perish." If he was killed, that was according to the Delphic Oracle; if he came home safely, that was according to the Delphic Oracle.

So the ancient auguries deceived the people. The priests of those auguries, by the flight of birds, or by the intonation of thunder, or by the inside appearance of slain animals, told the fortunes or misfortunes of individuals or nations. The sibyls deceived the people. The sibyls were supposed to be inspired women who lived in caves and who wrote the sibylline books afterward purchased by Tarquin the Proud. So late as the year 1829, a man arose in New York, pretending to be a divine being, and playing his part so well that wealthy merchants became his disciples and threw their fortunes into his discipleship. And so in all ages, there have been necromancies, incantations, witchcrafts, sorceries, magical arts, enchantments, divinations and delusions. The one of the text was only a specimen one of that which has been transpiring in all ages of the world. None of these delusions accomplished any good. They deceived, they pauperized the people, they were as cruel as they were absurd. They opened no hospitals, they healed no wounds, they wiped away no tears, they emancipated no serfdom.

But there are those who say that all these delusions combined are as nothing compared with the delusion now abroad in the world, the delusion of the Christian religion. That delusion has to-day TWO HUNDRED MILLION DUPES.

It proposes to encircle the earth with its girdle. That which has been called a delusion has already overshadowed the Appalachian range on this side the sea, and it has overshadowed the Balkan and Caucasian ranges on the other side the sea. It has conquered England and the United States.

This champion delusion, this hoax, this swindle of the ages, as it has been called, has gone forth to conquer the islands of the Pacific, and Melanisia and the Micronesia and Malayan Polynesia, have already surrendered to the delusion. Yea, it has conquered the Indian archipelago and Borneo, and Sumatra and Celebes and Java have fallen under its wiles. In the Fiji Islands, where there are 120,000 people, 102,000 have already become the dupes of this Christian religion, and if things go on as they are now going on, and if the influence of this great hallucination of the ages cannot be stopped, it will swallow the globe. Supposing then that Christianity is the delusion of the centuries, as some have pronounced it, I propose this morning to show you this fallacy, this hoax, this swindle of the ages.

And in the first place I remark, that this delusion of the Christian religion has made wonderful transformations of human character. I will go down the aisle of any church in Christendom, and I will find on either side that aisle those who were once profligate, profane, unclean of speech, and unclean of action, drunken and lost. But by the power of this delusion of the Christian religion they have been completely transformed, and now they are kind and amiable and genial and loving and useful. Everybody sees the change. Under the power of this great hallucination they have quit their former associates, and whereas they once found their chief delight among those who gambled and swore and raced horses, now they find their chief joy among those who go to prayer meetings and churches; so complete is the delusion. Yea, their own families have noticed it—the wife has noticed it, the children have noticed it. The money that went for rum now goes for books and for clothes and for education. He is a new man. All who know him say there has been a wonderful change. What is the cause of this change? This great hallucination of the Christian religion. There is as much difference between what he is now and what he once was, as between a rose and a nettle, as between a dove and a vulture, as between day and night. Tremendous delusion!

ADMIRAL FARRAGUT,

one of the most admired men of the American navy, early became a victim of this Christian delusion, and seated not long before his death, at Long Branch, he was giving some friends an account of his early life. He said: "My father went down in behalf of the United States Government to put an end to Aaron Burr's rebellion. I was a cabin boy and went along with him. I could swear like an old salt. I could gamble in every style of gambling. I knew all the wickedness there was at that time abroad. One day my father cleared everybody out of the cabin except myself, and locked the door. He said: 'David, what are you going to do? What are you going to be?' 'Well,' I said, 'father, I am going to follow the sea.' 'Follow the sea! and be a poor miserable, drunken sailor, kicked and cuffed about the world and die of a fever in a foreign hospital.'"

"O! no," I said, 'father, I will not be that, I will tread the quarter deck, and command as you do.' 'No, David,' my father said, 'no David, a person that has your principles and your bad habits will never tread the quarter deck or command.' My father went out and shut the door after him, and I said then, 'I will change, I will never swear again, I will never drink again, I will never gamble again, and, gentlemen, by the help of God I have kept those three vows to this time. I soon after that became a Christian, and that decided my fate for time and for eternity.'"

Another captive of this great Christian delusion. There goes Saul of Tarsus on horseback at full gallop. Where is he going? To destroy Christians. He wants no better play spell than to stand and watch the hats and coats of the murderers who are massacring God's children. There goes the same man. This time he is afoot. Where is he going now? Going on the road to Ostia to die for Christ. They tried to whip it out of him, they tried to scare it out of him, they thought they would give him enough of it by putting him into a windowless dungeon, and keeping him on small diet, and denying him a cloak, and condemning him as a criminal, and howling at him through the street; but they could not freeze it out of him, and they could not sweat it out of him, and they could not pound it out of him, so they tried the surgery of the sword, and one summer day in 66 he was decapitated. Perhaps the mightiest intellect of the 6000 years of the world's existence hoodwinked, cheated, cajoled, duped by the Christian religion.

Ah! that is the remarkable thing about this delusion of Christianity, it overpowers the strongest intellects. Gather the critics, secular and religious, of this century together, and put a vote to them as to which is the greatest book ever written, and by large majority they will say "Paradise Lost." Who wrote "Paradise Lost?" One of the fools who believed in this Bible, John Milton.

Benjamin Franklin surrendered to this delusion, if you may judge from the letter that he wrote to Thomas Paine begging him to destroy the "Age of Reason" in manuscript and never let it go into type, and writing afterward, in his old days: "Of this Jesus of Nazareth I have to say that the system of morals He left, and the religion He has given us are the best things the world has ever seen or is likely to see."

Patrick Henry, the electric champion of liberty enslaved by this delusion, so that he says: "The book worth all other books put together is the Bible." Benjamin Rush, the leading physiologist and anatomist of his day, the great medical scientist—what did he say? "The only true and perfect religion is Christianity." Isaac Newton, the leading philosopher of his time—what did he say? That man surrendering to this delusion of the Christian religion, crying out: "the sublimest philosophy on earth is the philosophy of the Gospel." David Brewster, at the pronunciation of whose name every scientist the world over uncovers his head, David Brewster saying: "O! this religion has been a great light to me, a very great light all my days." President Thiers, the great French statesman, acknowledging that he prayed when he said: "I invoke the Lord God in whom I am glad to believe." David Livingstone, able to conquer the lion, able to conquer the panther, able to conquer the savage, yet conquered by this delusion, this hallucination, this great swindle of the ages, so when they find him dead they find him on his knees. William E. Gladstone, the strongest intellect in England to-day, unable to resist this chimera, this fallacy, this delusion of the Christian religion, goes to the house of God every Sabbath, and often at the invitation of the rector, reads the prayers to the people. O! if those mighty intellects are overborne by this delusion, what chance is there for you and for me?

Beside that, I have noticed that cannot be depended on for steadfastness in the proclamation of their sentiments. Goethe, a leading sceptic, was so wrought upon by this Christianity that in a weak moment he cried out: "My belief in the Bible has saved me in my literary and moral life." Rousseau, one of the most eloquent champions of infidelity, spending his whole life warring against Christianity, cries out: "the majesty of the Scriptures amazes me." Altemont, the notorious infidel, one would think he would have been safe against this delusion of the Christian religion. O! no. After talking against Christianity all his days, in his last hours he cried out: "O! Thou blasphemous but most indulgent Lord God, hell itself is a refuge if it hide me from Thy frown."

FIRST-RATE INFIDELS

Voltaire, the most talented infidel the world ever saw, writing two hundred and fifty publications, and the most of them spiteful against Christianity, himself the most notorious libertine of the century—one would have thought he could have been depended upon for steadfastness in the advocacy of infidelity and in the war against this terrible chimera, this delusion of the Gospel. But no; in his last hour he asks for Christian burial, and asks that they give him the sacrament of the Lord Jesus Christ. Why, you cannot depend upon these first-rate infidels; you cannot depend upon their power to resist this great delusion of Christianity.

Thomas Paine, the god of modern sceptics, his birthday celebrated in New York and Boston with great enthusiasm—Thomas Paine the paragon of Bible haters—Thomas Paine, about whom his brother infidel, William Carver, wrote in a letter which I have at my house, saying that he drank a quart of rum a day and was too mean and too dishonest to pay for it—Thomas Paine, the adored of modern infidelity—Thomas Paine, who stole another man's wife in England and brought her to this land—Thomas Paine, who was so squalid and so loathsome and so drunken and so profligate and so beastly in his habits, sometimes picked out of the ditch, sometimes too filthy to be picked out—Thomas Paine, one would have thought that he could have been depended on for steadfastness against this great delusion. But no. In his dying hour, he begs the Lord Jesus Christ for mercy.

Powerful delusion,

ALL CONQUERING DELUSION, earthquake delusion of the Christian religion. Yea, it goes on, it is so impertinent and it is so overbearing, this chimera of the Gospel, that having conquered the great picture galleries of the world, the old masters and the young masters, as I showed in a former sermon, it is not satisfied until it has conquered the music of the world.

Look over the programme of that magnificent musical festival in New York last week, and see what were the great performances, and learn that the greatest of all the subjects were religious subjects. What was it on Friday night when three thousand voices were accompanied with a vast number of instruments? "Israel in Egypt." Yes, Beethoven deluded until he wrote the High Mass in D Major. Hadyn deluded with this religion until he wrote the "Creation." Handel deluded until he wrote the oratorios of "Jephtha" and "Esther" and "Saul" and "Israel in Egypt," and the "Messiah." Last Friday night, three thousand deluded people singing of a delusion to eight thousand deluded hearers.

Yes, this chimera of the Gospel is not satisfied until it goes on and builds itself into the most permanent architecture, so it seems as if the world is never to get rid of it. What are some of the finest buildings in the world? St. Paul's, St. Peter's, the churches and cathedrals of all Christendom. Yes, this impertinence of the Gospel, this vast delusion is not satisfied until it projects itself and in one year gives, contributes, $6,250,000 to foreign missions, the work of which is to make dunces and fools on the other side the world—people we have never seen. Deluded doctors—two hundred and twenty physicians meeting week by week in London, in the Union Medical Prayer Circle to worship God.

ILLUSTRIOUS DUPES.

Deluded lawyers—Lord Cairns, the highest legal authority in England, the ex-adviser of the throne, spending his vacation in preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the poor people of Scotland. Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, the Secretary of the United States, an old-fashioned evangelical Christian, an elder in the Reformed Church. John Bright, a deluded Quaker. Henry Wilson, the Vice-President of the United States, dying a deluded Methodist or Congregationalist. Earl of Kintore dying a deluded Presbyterian.

The cannibals in South Sea, the Bushmen of Terra del Fuego, the wild men of Australia, putting down the knives of their cruelty, and clothing themselves in decent apparel—all under the power of this delusion. Judson and Doty and Abeel and Campbell and Williams and the three thousand missionaries of the cross turning their backs on home and civilization and comfort, and going out amid the squalor of heathenism to relieve it, to save it, to help it, toiling until they dropped into their graves, dying with no earthly comfort about them, and going into graves with no appropriate epitaph when they might have lived in this country, and lived for themselves, and lived luxuriously, and been at last put into brilliant sepulchres. What a delusion!

Yea, this delusion of the Christian religion shows itself in the fact that it goes to those who are in trouble. Now, it is bad enough to cheat a man when he is well and when he is prosperous; but this religion comes to a man when he is sick, and says: "You will be well again after a while; you are going into a land where there are no coughs and no pleurisies and no consumptions and no languishing; take courage and bear up." Yea, this awful chimera of the Gospel comes to the poor and it says to them: "You are on your way to vast estates and to dividends always declarable."

This delusion of Christianity comes to the bereft and it talks of reunion before the throne, and of the cessation of all sorrow. And then to show that this delusion will stop at absolutely nothing, it goes to the dying bed and fills the man with anticipations. How much better it would be to have him die without any more hope than swine and rats and snakes.

SHOVEL HIM UNDER!

That is all. Nothing more left of him. He will never know anything again. Shovel him under? The soul is only a superior part of the body, and when the body disintegrates the soul disintegrates. Annihilation, vacancy, everlasting blank, obliteration. Why not present all that beautiful doctrine to the dying, instead of coming with this hoax, this swindle of the Christian religion, and filling the dying man with anticipations of another life, until some in the last hour have clapped their hands, and some have shouted and some have sung, and some have been so overwrought with joy they could only look ecstatic. Palace gates opening, they thought—diamonded coronets flashing—hands beckoning, orchestras sounding. Little children dying actually believing they saw their departed parents, so that although the little children had been so weak and feeble and sick for weeks they could not turn on their dying pillow, at the last, in a paroxysm of rapture uncontrollable they sprang to their feet and shouted: "Mother, catch me, I am coming!"

THE DEATHBEDS OF THE DELUDED.

And to show the immensity of this delusion, this awful swindle of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, I open a hospital and I bring into that hospital the deathbeds of a great many Christian people, and I take you by the hand this morning and I walk up and down the wards of that hospital, and I ask a few questions.

I ask, "Dying Stephen, what have you to say?" "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." "Dying John Wesley, what have you to say?" "The best of all is God is with us." "Dying Edward Payson, what have you to say?" "I float in a sea of glory." "Dying John Bradford, what have you to say?" "If there be any way of going to heaven on horseback, or in a fiery chariot, it is this." "Dying Neander, what have you to say?" "I am going to sleep now—good-night." "Dying Mrs. Florence Foster, what have you to say?" "A pilgrim in the valley, but the mountain tops are all agleam from peak to peak." "Dying Alexander Mather, what have you to say?" "The Lord who has taken care of me fifty years, will not cast me off now; glory be to God and to the Lamb! Amen, amen, amen, amen!"

"Dying John Powson, after preaching the Gospel so many years, what have you to say?" "My deathbed is a bed of roses." "Dying Doctor Thomas Scott, what have you to say?" "This is Heaven begun." "Dying soldier in the last war, what have you to say?" "Boys, I am going to the front." "Dying telegraph operator on the battlefield of Virginia, what have you to say?" "The wires are all laid, and the poles are up from Stony Point to headquarters." "Dying Paul, what have you to say?" "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand; I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. O! death, where is thy sting? O! grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

O! my Lord, my God, what a delusion, what a glorious delusion. Submerge me with it, fill my eyes and ears with it, put it under my dying head for a pillow—this delusion—spread it over me for a canopy, put it underneath me for an outspread wing—roll it over me in ocean surges ten thousand fathoms deep. O! if infidelity, and if atheism, and if annihilation are a reality, and the Christian religion is a delusion,

GIVE ME THE DELUSION.

The strong conclusion of every man and woman in the house is that Christianity producing such grand results cannot be a delusion. A lie, a cheat, a swindle, an hallucination cannot launch such a glory of the centuries. Your logic and your common sense convince you that a bad cause cannot produce an illustrious result; out of the womb of such a monster no such angel can be born.

There are many in this house this morning, in the galleries and on the main floor, who began with thinking that the Christian religion was a stupid farce, who have come to the conclusion that it is a reality. Why are you here to-day? Why did you sing this song? Why did you bow your head in the opening prayer? Why did you bring your family with you? Why, when I tell you of the ending of all trials in the bosom of God, do there stand tears in your eyes—not tears of grief, but tears of joy such as stand in the eyes of homesick children far away at school when some one talks to them about going home? Why is it that you can be so calmly submissive to the death of your loved one about whose departure you once were so angry and so rebellious?

There is something the matter with you. All your friends have found out there is a great change. And if some of you would give your experience you would give it in scholarly style, and others giving your experience would give it in broken style, but the one experience would be just as good as the other. Some of you have read everything. You are scientific and you are scholarly, and yet if I should ask you, "What is the most sensible thing you ever did?" you would say, "The most sensible thing I ever did was to give my heart to God."

But there may be others here who have not had early advantages, and if they were asked to give their experience, they might rise and give such testimony as the man gave in a prayer meeting when he said: "On my way here to-night, I met a man who asked me where I was going. I said, 'I am going to prayer meeting.' He said, 'There are a good many religions and I think the most of them are delusions; as to the Christian religion, that is only a notion, that is a mere notion, the Christian religion.' I said to him: 'Stranger, you see that tavern over there?' 'Yes,' he said, 'I see it.' 'Do you see me?' 'Yes, of course I see you.' 'Now, the time was when everybody in this town knows if I had a quarter of a dollar in my pocket I could not pass that tavern without going in and getting a drink; all the people of Jefferson could not keep me out of that place; but God has changed my heart, and the Lord Jesus Christ has destroyed my thirst for strong drink, and there is my whole week's wages, and I have no temptation to go in there; and, stranger, if this is a notion I want to tell you it is it is a notion that has put clothes on my children's back, and it is a notion that has put good food on our table, and it is a notion that has filled my mouth with thanksgiving to God. And, stranger, you had better go along with me, you might get religion too; lots of people are getting religion now."

Well, we will soon understand it all. Your life and mine will soon be over. We will soon come to the last bar of the music, to the last act of the tragedy, to the last page of the book—yea, to the last line and to the last word, and to you and to me it will either be midnight or midnight!

SYLPH SOMERS.

Treachery on the Ships—The Fugitives Carried Back—Free Passage Offered for Recantation—The Prisoners Indignantly Refuse—The Sufferings in the Prison—The Massacre on the Bridge—Release—A Barn full of Victims Burned—Captain Vaughan Rejoins Sylph—Their Marriage.

"I HAVE told you," said Hugh, "of the crowds in the ships; well, when they were filled—holds, decks, and all—with wretched and terrified men, women, and children, the vessels were moved out from the quay, but not to cross the Channel! Alas! no, sir, but merely to be anchored in the harbor. Ladies, on their knees, entreated the captains and seamen to spread their sails and make for Milford Haven. It was all in vain; these fellows had other intentions.

"A white flag was hoisted from the town; the next moment a similar flag was run up to the mast-head of each vessel in the bay; and immediately every one of the ships but two returned to the quay and the river.

"When I saw the vessels coming back, I rushed to the quay, sir, to learn the reason. From the shore I saw Abigail and Mr. and Mrs. Somerville on the deck of one of the ships that came near the landing-place, and beheld in their white faces, and heard from their trembling speech, what they feared. How could I leave them, sir, until I should find out what would be the issue? At all events, I felt riveted, as by an awful fascination, to the spot, and could not tear myself away. For long I continued thus at hand in a dreadful state of suspense, until, worn out with anxiety, I set off to the upper part of the town and found my soldier comrades had all departed, and that I was in for it.

"Making my way back toward my lodgings, it was not long until I found myself laid hold of by the rebels, and was soon, with a crowd of other prisoners, placed in the town jail.

"The feeling of those who had us in their power was, for some time, nothing at all so bloodthirsty as that which you tell me, sir, prevailed on Vinegar Hill. Indeed, for a few days, the rebels in Wexford town were carried away with a lofty sense of exultation and triumph; and their zeal, sir (would you believe it?), took the shape—for some days—of saving our souls rather than of destroying our bodies. They would drag us in batches to the Roman Catholic chapels to 'recant our heretic errors,' as they said, 'and to be baptized by a priest, and to hear mass.' Most of us were urged against our will, but, I am sorry to say," said Hugh, "that there were some few Protestants among us cowardly enough to renounce Christ, and renounce their religion, in presence of the pistol and the pike, and, to save their mortal life, pretend to be converts to the Romish superstitions.

"We deputed Mr. Somerville to be our spokesman, sir, and right well did he discharge the perilous duty that we placed upon him.

"Come, gentlemen, submit to the real kindness that we would force upon you," the priest said, addressing us. "It will be only following in the steps of many Protestants, your neighbors, who have been here this day before you. Enter, by baptism, at my consecrated hands, the door of the church; and let me tell you, once within that sacred bound not a hair of your heads shall be injured. See, there is a pass which I am authorized to give to every Protestant that abjures his heretic faith." And Father Furlong held forth in his hand a slip of paper for each of us to read. (The writing upon it ran thus: Protect, in the name of Jesus Christ, A.B., he having been made a Christian.) "With that docket in your possession signed by me," said Father Furlong, "you will be safe to go over the whole country, for not one of our men would dare to molest you."

"Mr. Somerville, however, was equal to the occasion, sir. 'I am glad to see, Father Furlong,' he said, 'that you base the right of protection upon the fact of a man being a Christian—a principle which I highly approve of. But on that ground I claim from you one of these valuable paper slips that you have to furnish. I solemnly declare myself a Christian, sir; and I thank God that for years I have been able so to account myself; made so—not, indeed, by baptism, sir, but, as the pure Word of God, has it—'By faith in Jesus Christ and the renewing of the Holy Ghost.' And I am happy to be able to add that I can thus speak, not only for myself, but for the most of my fellow-captives here around me."

"No more was needed, sir, to seal our doom. Fierce men, their eyes flashing with rage, closed in upon us.

"Take them away!—take them away!" shouted the infuriated priest. Out through the chapel door we were bundled; but not, in God's mercy, to instantaneous death. No! The rebels' purpose was to massacre us Protestants in batches; and to carry out this plan, we were not driven back to the jail, but to a malthouse in the town, there to pass the night, until we should be taken to execution in the morning.

"We found three other men in this extemporized prison, who had been shut in there before ourselves, and their tale was a woeful one. For three days they had been closely confined, with scarcely any food or water. And a hundred times had their jailers come in, holding pikes up to their very throats to put an end to them.

"Our houses burned, our property destroyed, our wives and children torn from us, we wished more than once they would carry out their threat," said one of the men. "And last night, so given up to despair were we, that we agreed between ourselves each to open a vein and bleed ourselves to death, and thus put an end to our misery, and even sharpened a knife upon a stone for this purpose.

"Before carrying out, however, this dreadful resolve, we thought we should pray over it; and this we did, and oh, with what an agony! Upon rising from our knees better feelings we found had taken possession of our minds. We saw that to God alone belonged the issues of life and death, and that it was not for us to force ourselves into His immediate presence. And here, fellow-captives, we continue alive," he said, "still, to abide God's will concerning us."

After passing a night of prayer to God, the prisoners were surprised just after daybreak by a message from the rebels telling their intended victims that their hour of execution had come.

"They seemed," said Hugh, "to be more than usually excited. The reason of this we did not know at the time, but it has come out since, that news had come in that the national cause, as it was called, had suffered a severe check at New Ross.

"With execrations and threats from a crowd of women that followed us, they conducted us—with pikemen on each side and back and front—to the great wooden bridge over the Slaney, and, blindfolding us, they made us all kneel down upon the bridge causeway.

"No less than ninety-eight of us had been brought out for massacre—the greater part of us from the jail where I and Mr. Somerville had passed the first night of our captivity. The rebels, one man told me, would have killed him and his comrades when out in the street at once were it not for a Mrs. Dixon, the wife of a rebel chief, who cried out—'Stay yer hands, boys, and let the people on the bridge have the pleasure of seeing the death of the cursed heretics.'

"The work of murder, was carried on," said Hugh, "with a grim and settled order. Each prisoner, when his turn came to die, was stripped nearly naked, and was then placed on his knees beside the bridge rampart. Four executioners, two in front and two behind, were then told off, with pike in hand, for the task of vengeance.

"Strange to tell, before their crime of blood they knelt down on the ground beside their intended victim, and offered a prayer from the Mass that Heaven would consecrate their heinous act and give them strength to perform it. Their blasphemous prayer over, they rose to their feet. Then, at a signal, ran upon their still kneeling prisoner, buried their pikes in his quivering flesh, raised him aloft, all writhing and gory, and pitched him over the parapet into the stream.

"In this way, sir, ninety of us, or thereabouts—some gentlemen, some magistrates, some merchants, some clergymen, others of us men of lower degree, were deliberately and cruelly murdered; our sole crime, being that we were Protestants.

"For three hours Mr. Somerville and I waited in an agony of suspense for the summons of our executioners. Yet, for all that, our coming doom neither halted nor lingered. Continuously and steadily the bridge was being cleared of its kneeling crowd of victims, and we could tell this, not only by the footsteps of the executioners coming nearer to us, as they returned, time after time, to lead off each captive to the central spot on the bridge which had been chosen for the work of slaughter, but also by the shout after shout of exultation that was raised by those looking on, as each of the condemned, when transfixed, was hurled over the parapet."

"At last only two or three were before us in the lists of death. Ten minutes or so, we judged, would only pass, and then we should be in eternity. We were surprised, however, to notice some unaccountable pause in the work of murder, and to hear a mysterious stir and a strange buzz among the assembled spectators, and then the sound of departing footsteps told us that many were leaving the bridge.

"The bitterness of death, however, over, and our minds half stunned and our feelings all absorbed, we remained upon our knees, deeming, a reprieve utterly hopeless.

"Hopeless though it seemed then, a reprieve did actually come; for after a while some of the rebels told us to rise, and when we got to our feet they took off the bandages from our eyes and marched us back to prison. A battle had been going on all the afternoon two or three miles off from the town, at a place called Foulk's Mill, and an express came in to say that the fight was going hard against the patriots, and that every man able to handle a pike was wanted in the field.

"Next day everything was changed in the town; our jailers came in and offered us arms and our liberty, and on stepping out into the street not a rebel was visible. All the green branches had been torn down and every flag and emblem removed, and men and women who a few hours before had abused and threatened us, now cowered before us in entreaty to save them from the avengers.

"Two companies of the Queen's Royals were the first to enter the town, hastening from Vinegar Hill, where two days before the troops had gained a victory.

"Oh! how we, the remnant that had escaped massacre, madly welcomed them and huzzaed! We pressed forward, we flung ourselves upon the necks of our deliverers.

"And then free, to search out those who had escaped, and to ascertain the missing, we spread ourselves in all directions through the town to satisfy our hunger of suspense.

"After a long and laborious search, Mr. Somerville and myself came upon Mrs. Somerville and her maid Abigail. They had been imprisoned in a barge on the river; beneath them the hold was covered with straw, and above them the hatchway was barred with an iron grating. There they had lain for several days with many others, women and children, furnished only with the most nauseous food, and even that in the most meagre quantity.

"It did not take long for us to give them liberty," said Hugh. "We forced the grating, and lifted the captives out, and thus it came to pass, sir, that when you and the Ancient Britons marched into Wexford, you found us waiting to receive you."

"Thank you for your narrative, Hugh," said Captain Vaughan. "And how true it is that 'God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble!'"

* * * * *

Our narrative, we feel, contains enough of tragic scenes, and yet our history—which is a true one—compels us to set before the reader another.

* The writer has visited this bridge recently and stood upon the spot made memorable by these foul murders. He was in his boyhood acquainted with an elderly gentleman, a neighbor, who was one of those led out for massacre on that dreadful day.

Captain Vaughan had not been long in Wexford before tidings reached him from Sylph that several of her Methodist friends had been seized and driven into captivity by the rebels.

Upon making inquiry of the authorities in Wexford town, he was told that on the day of the battle of New Ross, which has been mentioned (New Ross, a town in the South of Wexford County), on the evening of the fight a fearful tragedy was enacted a few miles off—at Scullabogue, in a barn.

Into this barn had been crowded a large number of aged men, women, and children—Protestant farmers and their families driven in from the surrounding neighborhood. And during the heat of conflict at New Ross a party of rebels coming to the barn of Scullabogue reported that the day was lost, and wildly demanded the deaths of the prisoners, protesting that they had orders to that effect.

The officer in charge, a Captain Murphy, hesitated, but a commission was produced signed by a priest. Some male prisoners not in the barn, but in farm-houses, were then brought out and shot; but this by no means satisfied the surrounding rabble. Captain Vaughan was assured that some wretches rushed for the barn, set it on fire, and consumed every one within it. Could these tidings be true? Captain Vaughan resolved that he would make inquiry on the spot.

An hour or two of hard riding brought the Captain and his men to Scullabogue, and there he soon learned that not one half of the dreadful tragedy had been told him. The barn, which had been a building thirty-four feet long and fifteen wide, was now a blackened ruin. Drawing near to it and looking in, Captain Vaughan beheld a sight that petrified him with terror. The barn was full of blackened bodies all in a standing posture—one hundred and eighty-four of them that had died, packed together so close, that they could not fall to the earth in their last agony. And the details furnished to the Captain by some protesters against the devilish deed—who had looked on—did not mitigate his indignation and horror.

The rebels, having firmly secured the doors of the barn outside with their pikes raised blazing faggots to the thatch, and set it on fire. The dense smoke soon, one is glad to think, suffocated many; but those who were near the walls, Captain Vaughan was told, sought every crevice and chink for air, and thus prolonged their dreadful sufferings. "The groans, the prayers, the cries, the shrieks of the expiring victims," said Captain Vaughan's informant, "sound in my ears up to this present moment." One man told him how one poor woman, making up her mind herself to die, pushed her little child beneath the barn-door, and begged a rebel outside for pitying heaven's sake to spare it. "Never!" shouted the fiend in human shape. "This is what I'll do to the heretic slawn;" and so saying he ran his pike into it as a peasant would his pitchfork into a sheaf of corn, and violently tossed it back into the devouring flames.

It was far into the autumn before Captain Vaughan could fulfil his promise to rejoin Sylph at Dublin. Here shortly afterwards their wedding took place. Mr. and Mrs. Somerville and some friends from Wales, and the trustees of Dr. Gilbert's will, and several of the Captain's brother officers, were present.

A day or two subsequently another marriage in the same church, St. Peter's, Dublin, was contracted, that between Hugh and the Protestant maid, who had been in Mr. Somerville's service at the time when he had to shut up his house and fled with his household into Enniscorthy.

The Captain and Sylph usually abode on their beautiful estate at Berwyn. The house in the Rows, Chester, however, they managed after a time to get into their hands and made it their town house.

Many of Sylph's old friends had passed into the spirit world, but a good many survived; and among them, in addition to others, she carried on anew her work of Christian instruction and benevolence. We have been informed that the remembrance of her name has not yet died out in Chester, and that she and her husband, after becoming the parents of sons and daughters, lie side by side in the Cathedral burial-place, awaiting, with Doctor Gilbert, who sleeps in the same grave, the sure and certain hope of "the Resurrection to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ, who is Himself the Resurrection and the Life."

THE END.

COMING TRANSLATION OF WATCHFUL CHRISTIANS.

By the Rev. C. H. Pember, M.A.

Consternation of those Left Behind—An Error in a Word—The Word in other Passages—The Exhortation to Watch—Some Christians will be Left—The Worldly-Minded—Only the Watchful—The Case of Judas—The Full Assembly of the Church when the Lord Appears in Glory.

THE world will one day be surprised by the sudden and unaccountable disappearance of many persons in the midst of their ordinary occupations. Two men will be working in the field; one will instantaneously vanish. His bewildered comrade may still see upon the ground the garment which had been put off for labor, but the man will be gone. Two women will be grinding the daily supply of corn in the early morning; the hand of one will fail; her companion will look up and see that she is no longer in her place. Two persons will be in the same bed at night; the one will be taken away, and the other will awake to solitude and bereavement (Matt. 24: 40, 41; Luke 17: 34). As soon as this sign is given, then woe for the earth and the sea! Those who shall be accounted worthy to escape will have been removed from the world; the Holy Spirit will no longer restrain the mystery of lawlessness, nor will the judgments of God be delayed.

With regard to the meaning of the words, "one shall be taken," an error has sometimes been made through ignorance of the original. Comparing the clause with that of Matt. 24: 39, "the flood came and took them all away," some have interpreted, "the one shall be taken away in judgment, the other shall be spared in mercy." But an examination of the Greek immediately dissipates this idea. In the 39th verse the verb used means "to take away by destruction." But in the 40th and 41st verses we find a very different word which properly signifies "to receive," or "take alongside," and then sometimes, "to take with one as a companion." Thus the word is most appropriately used of those who shall be caught up to Christ, that they may walk with Him in white, that they may follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth.

In the 14th chapter of John it occurs in

A VERY SIGNIFICANT PASSAGE.

"For if I go and prepare a place for you, I am coming again, and will receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." Here it is used of the very act of which the Lord speaks in Matthew.

Again, in another place, we are told that the Lord "taketh" Peter, James and John, as His companions to the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17: 1). He selects three out of the twelve disciples to behold His glory; while the nine are, in the meantime, left at the bottom of the hill to struggle hopelessly with Satan in the person of the demoniac youth, and consequently to be subjected to the scorn of the world, until at length the Master is seen descending the hill in company with those whom He had taken with Him.

Surely this scene is typical of the fact that the one is taken to be a companion of the Lord and to see His glory, while the other is with the world and Satan as a further discipline; for the admonition to watch in the next verse seems to imply that both of the two are disciples.

Having thus described the sign of His presence, the Lord proceeds to urge upon His followers the necessity of watching, and intimates, by the parable of the householder and the thief, that grievous loss will be sustained by those who neglect His directions. Many other such warnings may be found in the Scriptures, and the special object of watching is plainly set forth in the Lord's own exhortation, uttered just after He had been portraying the terrors of the last week of seven years that will close this dispensation:—(Luke 21: 24-27)—"Watch ye, therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man" (Daniel 9: 27; Luke 21: 24-27, 36).

These words certainly intimate that a Christian, though sure of eternal life, is not sure of being removed before the commencement of the final Great Tribulation. This favor will be granted only to those who have progressed in holiness, only to those who have been so strengthened with might in the inner man that they have been able to endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. Such a growth in grace may, indeed, be attained by all believers; the power of prayer and watching is given to every man at his conversion; but he must be willing to deny himself, to take up his cross, and to follow his Master. Then there will be no doubt as to the issue: for "faithful is He that calleth you, Who will also do it."

But the Lord has no thought of translating

from the toils of life into the joy of His presence, of admitting them to immortality by the gate of glory instead of the dark valley of death. Those who vainly expect such a thing are like the Jews, who would have had Christ put Himself at their head as the all-victorious King, when as yet He had not saved them from their sins. But He will not grant to the careless and slothful servant that blessing which Paul craved, yet did not receive (2 Cor. 5: 2-4)—the joy of being clothed upon, without the necessity of shuffling off this mortal coil. Hence, in His promise to the Philadelphians, He says: "Because thou didst keep the word of my patience, I will also keep thee from the hour of trial, that hour which is to come upon the whole world, to try them that dwell upon the earth" (Rev. 3: 10).

It thus appears that not all believers will be caught up to the Lord at the commencement of his Second Advent, but

ONLY THOSE WHO ARE FOUND WATCHING.

It is, indeed, true that Paul, after speaking of Christ's descent into the air, adds, "Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up," without any mention of exceptions to the rule (1 Thess. 4: 16, 17). But other Scriptures show that his words are to be regarded as a general statement, expressing what ought to be, and potentially may be, the case with every Christian. Similarly, in another place, he says, "It is appointed unto men once to die;" yet the very next verse reveals the secret that some will escape death. And in his first Epistle to the Corinthians he discloses the mystery that we shall not all sleep.

Just in the same general way the Lord said to His disciples, "Verily, I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, . . . ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." But Judas had followed Him, and was at that time one of the twelve; will he also occupy a throne in the regeneration? Nay, we know from the authority of Scripture that his own "place," to which he went, was in the realms of the lost. There need, therefore, be no difficulty in regard to the passage in the Epistle to the Thessalonians. The members of the body of Christ will not be completely gathered to Him until the close of the Second Advent.

Accordingly—although we have previously heard of some who were tabernacling in the heaven, of a hundred and forty-four thousand who were purchased from among men, to be the first fruits unto God and unto the Lamb, and of others who are standing on a sea of glass mingled with fire, singing their song of victory over the Beast and his image—there is no mention of a full assembly of the Church until the Lord appears in glory when He is followed by the armies (Rev. 19: 14) which are in the heaven, the different divisions which make up the one body. And then we read in Rev. 20: 5, "This is the First Resurrection."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate Received the Report of the Committee instructed to investigate the affairs of the Soldier's Home, on Wednesday, May 3d. The report shows the total receipts and expenditures of the Home since its foundation, and makes several suggestions for improving its management. It also calls attention to the practice of supplying certain members of the Board of Commissioners with flowers, fruits, and vegetables from the greenhouses and gardens of the Home. The report says: "The testimony of the gardener and farmer is to the effect that products of the farm and garden to the extent of several hundred dollars each annually were delivered to the members of the commission. The continuous and regular furnishing of vegetables and fruit from the institution to these officers gave rise to considerable scandal, which should have been avoided, and the furnishing of flowers from the Home to these officers at regular and stated periods when there was an entire absence of the same at the hospital was, in the opinion of the committee, an abuse in the management which should not have occurred." It is deserving of note that when the same supplies were offered to the Adjutant-General, he refused to receive them. The principal source of the income enjoyed by the Home is derived from the contributions of the soldiers, who each pay a regular monthly sum toward its maintenance.

The House of Representatives Passed the Tariff Commission Bill on Saturday by a majority of 66 in a total vote of 236. This result was arrived at after a desultory debate extending over six weeks, during which some lengthy speeches have been delivered for future use as campaign documents. The real question at issue has been, not whether the tariff needs to be revised and reformed—that the majority of the speakers admitted—but what is the best means of doing the work. The bill which has now passed the House places the subject in charge of a commission of nine members to be selected from civil life by the President. "The commission is to take into consideration and to thoroughly investigate all the various questions relating to the agricultural, commercial, mercantile, manufacturing, mining and industrial interests of the United States so far as the same may be necessary to the establishment of a judicious tariff, or a revision of the existing tariff upon a scale of justice to all interests; and for the purpose of fully examining the matters which may come before it, the commission, in the prosecution of its inquiries is empowered to visit such different portions and sections of the country as it may deem advisable." Each commissioner is to receive ten dollars per day for his services, and in addition "travelling and other necessary expenses." The results of the investigation are to be reported to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1882. It may be hoped that in conducting the inquiry the commissioners will not confine their attention to the needs of the capitalists, but will take into consideration the fact that the struggling poor are now enduring severe privation through having to pay heavy duties on necessities, and that the burden of taxation is pressing upon that class with undue severity.

A Committee of Five Members to Investigate the whiskey bill scandal was appointed on May 5th, at the instance of Senator Windom. The committee is instructed to inquire whether any money was raised by the promoters of the Carlisle Whiskey bill to secure its passage, and, if so, what was done with it. The Washington correspondent of a New York journal says: "It is understood that one piece of information which has reached Senator Windom, and which will be investigated, is to the effect that a certain prominent distiller was assessed $8000 in advance to secure the passage of the Carlisle bill, and that he refused to pay the money. If a single distiller was assessed so large a sum, it is inferred that the aggregate sum raised, or attempted to be raised, was something enormous." The Carlisle bill alluded to is designed in the interest of the distillers, to release them from the necessity of giving bonds for the full amount of the taxes due on whiskey held in bond and to further their interests in other ways.

The Subject of Indian Education was Brought before the House on May 6th, when the Conference report on the Indian Appropriation Bill, was presented. It appropriates $150,000 for the purpose of educating Indian children in government industrial schools, a number of which are located on reservations. It also permits the placing of Indian children among white families where they may be educated in return for their labor. It appropriates $17,000 to be expended in educating Indian youth in agricultural, industrial, and mechanical schools in the several States, not more than twenty children to be placed in one State. The conference report also contains a clause appropriating $50,000 for the establishment of two industrial schools, one near the Ponca Agency, Indian Territory, and one near the Sioux Agency, in Dakota. The results which have already attended the efforts to educate the Indian children show that in this path lie the most hopeful prospects of solving the difficult Indian problem.

The Anti-Polygamy Bill, which has Caused so much consternation in Utah, will be rendered still more stringent in its operations if the bill to amend it, introduced last week, should be passed. It provides that the first election held in Utah under the act shall be at the time fixed by law for the election, of delegate to the Forty-eighth Congress, and that all elections which are now by law to be held at an earlier date shall be postponed to that time; that all vacancies in office resulting from the passage of the act of March, 1882, not otherwise provided for, shall be filled by the Governor of the Territory, until other provisions be made for filling such vacancies; that in all prosecutions for polygamy, no person shall be incompetent as a witness by reason of any marriage between the witness and the accused; that the act of the Legislative Assembly of Utah incorporating the Church of Latter Day saints be annulled.

The Howard Mission and Home for Little Wanderers held its twenty-first anniversary on Thursday, May 4th. Mr. A. S. Hatch, Mr. William Phelps, and other friends of the mission were present to assist the indefatigable superintendent, Rev. W. C. Van Meter, in the exercises of the evening. Mr. Van Meter, who founded the mission twenty years ago, described the work that has been done. It had, he said, been begun under great discouragements, but it had been supported, and the work had not been allowed to fail in any of its cardinal principles. To the extent of the means it possessed it welcomed, sheltered, and provided for the poor. No hungry or helpless person was ever turned away from its door. It sought suitable employment for the children who grew up under its care and watched over them. It gave instruction, food, clothing, and homes to the children whose parents cannot or will not provide for them. Mr. Van Meter said also that he knew of cases of these little ones snatched from the last extremity of want and danger who have now grown up in the good Christian homes in which they had been placed by the mission, and had become worthy members of society. Fifteen thousand dollars are needed for the work of the coming year and the meeting was held with the view of showing the character of the work accomplished. The platform of the Academy of Music was crowded with two hundred children, educated at the mission, who sang choruses, glees, and hymns.

The Ohio Sunday Liquor Law, which Prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays, was put in force on April 30th for the first time since its enactment. At Cincinnati, out of over 3000 saloons some five hundred ventured to defy the new law. The majority of the saloons were closed at Cleveland. At Columbus the day is said to have been the quietest of the year, the law being strictly observed. The arrests for drunkenness, which are generally about twenty-five, were on April 30th only three. A saloon keeper of Cincinnati who was arrested for neglecting to close his place was tried by a jury on May 6th and convicted. He was sentenced to pay a fine of one hundred dollars and to be imprisoned for thirty days. An appeal was taken to the Common Pleas, but Ohio lawyers of eminence predict that the decision of the lower court will be sustained.

In the Fierce Prohibition Conflict now in progress in Iowa a significant fact is reported which must seriously confuse the calculations made by the opponents of prohibition. The German vote it was expected would be cast solid for the lager interest. It is now announced that the German Evangelical Association has adopted strong resolutions in favor of the amendment.

The Summer Retreat for Sick Children established through the munificence of the late Mr. Thomas Wilson, of Baltimore, is now organized. The secretary of the Wilson Sanitarium thus writes of the progress made: "Our trustees have purchased a tract of 160 acres, well watered and with considerable timber, a half-hour's ride by rail from the centre of the city, and with an altitude of 600 feet above tide water. The seacoast is not accessible, and the bay shores malarial. We propose to deal principally with children under two years of age, taking the mother with her infant, and, if necessary, one or two other children if they are too young to be left at home; to keep them till restored to health and then return them to their homes. The Sanitarium will be open only during the summer months, probably about fifteen weeks; the diseases those incident to bad weather, not chronic cases. We deal only with the poorer classes, and the institution will be free."

An Attempt to found a Hungarian Colony in New Jersey is being made. A movement has been noticed in Hungary for some time past among the more intelligent class of agriculturists in favor of exchanging Austrian rule for free republican institutions. The Hungarians see no prospect of attaining their ideal in their native land, and have shown a tendency to cross the Atlantic. With the view of facilitating their settlement a company has been formed to acquire tracts of land upon the best negotiable terms and conditions, and it is the intention first to secure about 100,000 acres in lots of 20,000 acres. These lots will be laid out in villages with adjacent farms, the villages to give accommodation to fifty families each, with a corresponding number of farms of from 50 to 150 acres, contiguous to each village. The land so surveyed and allotted, it is said, will be sold to the colonists at cost price. Five hundred families are expected to arrive this season.

The Daily Noonday Prayer Meeting in Washington, D. C., commenced last December through the instrumentality of Mr. George A. Hilton, is now a recognized and highly valued institution. It was commenced in faith in God, but with no little doubt as to the reception it would have in the society of the national capital. The meetings have, however, been held every day except Sunday, since they were inaugurated, there has been a large attendance, and God has used the means to the salvation of souls.

Theatrical and Musical Licenses in New York needed renewal last week, as they all expired May 1st. There were fifty-one of these places in the city last year, but as the mayor announced his intention of refusing licenses to the places in which the laws were violated relating to the sale of liquor and the admission of boys, it is probable that the number for the current year will be reduced. The cost of a theatrical license is $500, and of a musical license $300. By a curious arrangement the money thus raised is given to the Society for the Reformation of Juvenile Delinquents. This may be accepted as a practical admission that the theatre is in some measure responsible for the existence of juvenile delinquency.

An Innocent Man was Released from Prison a few days ago, in Iowa, after a year's incarceration. He was arrested, tried and convicted on a charge of swindling, but now it has been discovered that the crime was committed by a man who skilfully personated him. The real culprit has been captured, and the innocent man released. There is no law in the State by which he can recover compensation, but Governor Sherman is urging the Legislature to pass a special act to make him some atonement. This is not the first instance by a great many that through a judicial blunder the innocent has suffered instead of the guilty. So Jesus suffered and died for guilty men, but He suffered voluntarily and in His death divine justice was vindicated (Acts 2: 23).

Two Sisters Fighting over their Mother's grave was the shameful spectacle witnessed in a cemetery at Plainfield, N. J., on April 30th. The dead woman had two daughters, one of whom was a Roman Catholic, and the other a Protestant. When she died, the husband, who was too poor to pay the funeral expenses, applied to his Romanist daughter for assistance. She, however, did not help him, so he applied to his Protestant daughter, who agreed to pay them on condition that her mother should be interred in the Protestant burial ground. To this the bereaved man consented, but just as the body was lowered into the grave the Romanist daughter rushed violently upon her sister, and angrily assaulted her, and finally, picking up a club, tried to murder her, and only desisted when the police forcibly interfered. If the woman had been divinely enlightened she would not so have misconducted herself. She would have remembered what many beside her appear to forget that the place of burial will be of little account in the day when the graves give up their dead (2 Tim. 2: 19).

A Meeting at Sea of three Brothers after years of separation is described in the Whig of Bangor, Me. It appears that three brothers who were born at Searsport, Captain J. G. Park, Samuel Park, and Captain Charles C. Park, happened to be sailing for New York recently, when the ships on which they were sailing were becalmed off the island of Madagascar. It had so happened that all the brothers, owing to their long voyages, had not been in America at the same time for many years. Charles and Jerry had not seen each other before for six years, and Charles and Samuel had not seen each other for twelve years. They were together for one day. It must have been an interesting day for the three men in that southern cline, united by a common bond among strange surroundings, and so far from home. In some of its features it was like the meetings of all Christians here. They may not have long or frequent communications with each other, but they are bound together by their love for the same Heavenly Father, and their hopes are directed to the same Heavenly home (Heb. 11: 16).

A Desperate Struggle with a Bear is Reported in the Troy Times. It is stated that Mr. E. R. Derby, of Prospect House, Saranac Lake, while driving from his residence to Bloomingdale on April 28th, heard cries of distress proceeding from a ravine near the road. He immediately stopped his horses and ran to the edge of the wood. There he saw a huge bear pursuing a man. Mr. Derby crept cautiously among the trees with his revolver in his hand to within short range, when he fired, hitting the brute in the shoulder. The bear, stung with pain, stopped and turned in fury on his new assailant. Mr. Derby dodged around the tree and fired again, the ball taking effect in the head. The only immediate result was to increase the bear's rage, and he made another attempt to seize his enemy, who now turned and ran toward the road for his life. The bear, however, gained upon him, and a tree happening to be in his path, he quickly climbed it, and, clinging to a high branch, prepared for the attack he knew the bear would make. Presently he saw him clinging to the trunk. Mr. Derby carried a long sheath knife, and as soon as the bear was within reach, he struck at his paws, cutting deep, but not so as to force the bear to lose his hold. As he leaned over for a more vigorous thrust, he overbalanced and fell to the ground. Then the bear, sure now of his prey, advanced erect with gleaming eyes. Instantly Mr. Derby saw his opportunity, and rushing toward the brute drove his knife through his heart. Shaken, bruised, and bleeding, his clothing torn to shreds, he made his way to the nearest house, where his wounds were dressed. It was a narrow escape from what at one period of the struggle seemed certain death. But men when threatened with such a death fight desperately; in their struggles with a fiercer and more deadly enemy who assails them with temptations they often make but a faint struggle, and are speedily overcome (Eph. 6: 12, 13).

An Escaped Prisoner was Struck by Lightning near Mobile, Ala., recently. The deputy sheriff had him in charge, but the prisoner, who possessed gigantic strength, overpowered his captor and succeeded in getting away. Nothing was heard of the prisoner for some days, but then Sheriff Burke received a note from him stating where he was and that he desired to give himself up. The sheriff immediately proceeded to the place indicated, where he found the runaway at the point of death. He stated that after making his escape he had wandered around and had managed to obtain a gun, when, seeing a storm coming on he took refuge in an old building to escape the fury of the elements. He placed his gun at his feet, and had just fallen asleep when the building was struck by lightning. The electric fluid, evidently attracted by the gun, passed close to his head, passed downward, peeling the skin from his body, and thence into the gun, bursting the barrels. The man was seriously, if not fatally, injured, and it was remarkable that the very weapon he procured as a means of defence led to his injuries. Like the storm that tossed the ship on which Jonah sailed toward Joppa, this storm proved to the wrongdoer that before God's vengeance human devices are of no service (Levit. 26: 28).

A Young Lady only Fourteen Years of Age rescued a man from drowning at Montgomery, Va., recently. Two commercial travellers driving in a buggy while passing New River Ferry drove into the water to wash the buggy. In the water the horse became unmanageable and plunged into the deep part of the river. One of the men while trying to cut the horse loose, fell out and sank, but the other got safe to land. On the other side of the river Miss Lillie Bryant sat in a canoe engaged with some juvenile fancy work. She saw the accident, and promptly seizing the paddles she soon had her canoe at the spot where the man went down. The man who had made his way to the shore, however, called to the girl to come to the bank for him, as he thought she was not strong enough to rescue his comrade unaided. The girl obeyed, and then the man took the paddles. But in his unskilful hands the canoe made no progress, and he was glad to give them up to the girl, who quickly shot to the spot where the drowning man was making his last frantic struggle for life. Happily he was not too much exhausted to seize the canoe as soon as it was within reach, and climb into it, and so was saved. His companion's confidence in himself, however, very nearly resulted in the loss of life. Something very like this often occurs in the crisis of the soul. Meddlesome people want to try various expedients for relieving anxious souls, when all that is needed is to bring the lifeboat of Christ's sacrifice within their reach, and that has often been done by a child (1 Cor. 1: 27, 28).

THE RESURRECTION OF OUR LORD JESUS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my gospel."—2 Timothy 2: 8.

The Blessing on the Doctrine—A Grand Truth Proclaimed by Men not Angels—The Resurrection a Great Fact—I. Its Bearings on other Truths—A Tangible Proof of Another Life—Of the Resurrection of the Body—The Seal of Christ's Claims—A Guarantee of His People's Resurrection—A Picture of New Spiritual Life—II. Its Bearings on Ourselves—Results of Remembering it—Trials Vanish—Hope of Victory—End of Hoplessness—Futility of Opposition to Christ—His Cause not to be Crushed.

FROM long sickness my mind is scarcely equal to the work before me. Certainly, if I had ever sought after brilliance of thought or language, I should have failed to-day, for I am almost at the lowest stage of incapacity. I have only been comforted in the thought of preaching to you this morning by the reflection that it is the doctrine itself which God blesses, and not the way in which it may be spoken; for if God had made the power to depend upon the speaker and his style, He would have chosen that the resurrection, grandest of all truths, should have been proclaimed by angels rather than by men. Yet He set aside the seraph for the humbler creature. After angels had spoken a word or two to the women their testimony ceased.

The most prominent testimony to the resurrection of the Lord was at the first that of holy women, and afterward that of each one of the guileless men and women who made up the five hundred or more whose privilege it was to have actually seen the risen Saviour, and who therefore could bear witness to what they had seen, though they may have been quite unable to describe with eloquence what they had beheld.

Upon our Lord's rising I have nothing to say, and God's ministers have nothing to say, beyond bearing witness to the fact that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead. Put it in poetry, tell it out in sublime Miltonic verse, it will come to no more; tell it out in monosyllables, and write it so that little children may read it in their first spelling-books, and it will come to nothing less. "The Lord is risen indeed" is the sum and substance of our witness when we speak of our risen Redeemer. If we do but know the truth of this resurrection, and feel the power of it, our mode of utterance is of secondary consequence; for the Holy Spirit will bear witness to the truth, and cause it to produce fruit in the minds of our hearers.

Our present text is found in Paul's second letter to Timothy. The venerable minister is anxious about the young man who has preached with remarkable success, and whom he regards in some respects as his successor. The old man is about to put off his tabernacle, and he is concerned that his son in the Gospel, should preach the same truth as his father has preached, and should by no means adulterate the Gospel. A tendency showed itself in Timothy's day, and the same tendency exists at this very hour, to try to get away from the simple matters of fact upon which our religion is built, to something more philosophical and hard to be understood. The word which the common people heard gladly is not fine enough for cultured sages, and so they must needs surround it with a mist of human thought and speculation. Three or four plain facts constitute the Gospel, even as Paul puts it in the fifteenth chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians: "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day according to the Scriptures."

Upon the incarnation, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus our salvation hinges. He who believes these truths aright hath believed the Gospel, and believing the Gospel he shall without doubt find eternal salvation therein. But men want novelties; they cannot endure that the trumpet should give forth the same certain sound, they crave some fresh fantasia every day.

"THE GOSPEL WITH VARIATIONS" is the music for them. Intellect is progressive, they say; they must, therefore, march ahead of their forefathers. Incarnate Deity, a holy life, an atoning death, and a literal resurrection—having heard these things now for nearly nineteen centuries they are just a little stale, and the cultivated mind hungers for a change from the o'd-fashioned manna. Even in Paul's day this tendency was manifest, and so they sought to regard facts as mysteries or parables, and they labored to find a spiritual meaning in them till they went so far as to deny them as actual facts. Hence there had arisen a certain Hymenæus and Philetus, "Who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some." Turn to verse seventeen and read for yourselves. They spirited away the resurrection; they made it to mean something very deep and mystical, and in the process they took away the actual resurrection altogether. The Apostle Paul was very anxious that Timothy at least should stand firm to the old witness, and should understand in their plain meaning his testimonies to the fact that Jesus Christ of the seed of David rose again from the dead.

This morning I wish to do three things. First, let us consider the bearings of the resurrection of Christ upon other great truths; secondly, let us consider the bearings of this fact upon the Gospel, for it has such bearings, according to the text—"Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my Gospel;" thirdly, let us consider its bearings on ourselves, which are all indicated in the word "Remember."

I. First, then, beloved, as God shall help us, let us consider that Jesus rose from the dead.

It is clear at the outset that the resurrection of our Lord was a tangible proof that there is another life. Have you not quoted a great many times certain lines about "That undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns." It is not so. Our divine Lord went to the undiscovered country, and He returned. He said that at the third day He would be back again, and He was true to His word. There is no doubt that there is another state for human life, for Jesus has been in it, and has come back from it. We have no doubt as to a future existence, for Jesus existed after death. We have no doubt as to a paradise of future bliss, for Jesus went to it and returned. Though He has left us again, yet that coming back to tarry with us forty days has given us a sure pledge that He will return a second time when the hour is due, and then will be with us for a thousand years, and reign on earth. His return from among the dead is a pledge to us of existence after death, and we rejoice in it.

His resurrection is also a pledge that the body will surely live again and rise to a superior condition; for the body of our blessed Master was no phantom after death any more than before. "Handle me, and see." Oh wondrous proof! He said, "Handle me and see;" and then to Thomas, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side." What deception is possible here? The risen Jesus was no mere spirit. He promptly cried, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." "Bring me," said He, "something to eat;" and as if to show how real His body was, though He did not need to eat, yet He did eat, and a piece of a broiled fish and of an honeycomb were proofs of the reality of the act.

Now, the body of our Lord in its risen state did not exhibit the whole of His glorification; for otherwise we should have seen John falling at His feet as dead, and we should have seen all His disciples overcome with the glory of the vision; but, still, in a great measure, we may call the forty days' sojourn—"The life of Jesus in His glory upon earth." He was no longer despised and rejected of men; but a glory surrounded Him. It is evident that the raised body passed from place to place in a single moment, that it appeared and vanished at will, and was superior to the laws of matter. The risen body was incapable of pain, of hunger, thirst, and weariness during the time in which it remained here below—fit representative of the bulk of which it was the firstfruits. Of our body also it shall be said ere long, "It was sown in weakness, it is raised in power: it was sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory." Let us, then, as we think of the risen Christ, rest quite sure of a future life, and quite sure that our body will exist in it in a glorified condition.

I do not know whether you are ever troubled with doubts in connection with the world to come as to whether it can be true that we shall live eternally. Here is the respect which makes death so terrible to doubters; for while they have realized the grave, they have not realized the life beyond it. Now, the best help to that realization is a firm grip of the fact that Jesus died and Jesus rose again. This fact is proved better than any other event in history; the witness to it is far stronger than to anything else that is written either in profane or sacred records. The rising of our Lord Jesus Christ being certain, you may rest assured of the existence of another world. That is the first bearing of this great truth.

Secondly, Christ's rising from the dead was the seal to all His claims. It was true, then, that He was sent of God, for God raised Him from the dead in confirmation of His mission. He had said Himself, "Destroy this body, and in three days I will raise it up." Lo, there He is: the temple of His body is rebuilt! Before men's eye the seal is manifest!

SUPPOSE HE HAD NEVER RISEN.

You and I might have believed in the truth of a mission which God had given Him; but we could never have believed in the truth of such a commission as He claimed to have received—a commission to be our Redeemer from death and hell. How could He be our ransom from the grave if He had Himself remained under the dominion of death?

A third bearing of His resurrection is this, and it is a very grand one—The resurrection of our Lord, according to Scripture, was the acceptance of His sacrifice. By the Lord Jesus Christ rising from the dead evidence was given that He had fully endured the penalty which was due to human guilt. "The soul that sinneth it shall die"—that is the determination of the God of heaven. Jesus stands in the sinner's stead and dies: and when He has done that nothing more can be demanded of Him, for He that is dead is free from the law. You and I are clear from the claims of the law because Jesus stood in our stead, and God will not exact payment both from us and from our Substitute; it were contrary to justice to sue both the Surety and those for whom He stood.

And now, joy upon joy! the burden of liability which once did lie upon the Substitute is removed from Him also; seeing He has by the suffering of death vindicated justice and made satisfaction to the injured law. Now both the sinner and the Surety are free. This is a great joy, a joy for which to make the golden harps ring out a loftier style of music. He who took our debt has now delivered Himself from it by dying on the cross. His new life, now that He has risen from the dead, is a life free from legal claim, and it is the token to us that we whom He represented are free also. Listen! "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth, who is He that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again." It is when the apostle says that we cannot be condemned because Christ has died in our stead; but he puts a double force into it when he cries, "Yea rather, that is risen again." If Satan, therefore, shall come to any believer and say, "What about your sin?" tell him Jesus died for it, and your sin is put away. If he come a second time, and say to you, "What about your sin?" answer him, "Jesus lives, and His life is the assurance of our justification; for if our Surety had not paid the debt He would still be under the power of death."

Bear with me while I notice, next, another bearing of this resurrection of Christ. It was a guarantee of His people's resurrection. There is no logic more imperative than the argument drawn from union with Christ. God has made the saints one with Christ, and if Christ has risen all the saints must rise too. My soul takes firm hold on this, and as she strengthens her grasp she loses all fear of death. Now we bear our dear ones to the cemetery and leave them each one in his narrow cell, calmly bidding him farewell and saying—

"So Jesus slept: God's dying Son
Pass'd through the grave, and blest the bed;
Rest here, dear saint, till from His throne
The morning break, and pierce the shade."

It is not merely ours to know that our brethren are living in heaven, but also that their mortal parts are in divine custody, securely kept till the appointed hour when the body shall be reanimated, and the perfect man shall enjoy the adoption of God. We are sure that our dead men shall live; together with Christ's dead body they shall rise. No power can hold in durance the redeemed of the Lord. "Let my people go" shall be a command as much obeyed by death as once by the humbled Pharaoh who could not hold a single Israelite in bonds. The day of deliverance cometh on apace.

Once more, our Lord's rising from the dead is a fair picture of the new life which all believers already enjoy. The regeneration which has taken place in those who believe has changed our spirit, and given to it eternal life, but it has not affected our body further than this, that it has made it to be the temple of the Holy Ghost, and thus it is a holy thing, and cannot be obnoxious to the Lord, or swept away among unholy things; but still the body is subject to pain and weariness, and to the supreme sentence of death. Not so the spirit. There is within us already a part of the resurrection accomplished, since it is written, "And you hath He quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins." You once were like the ungodly, under the law of sin and death, but you have been brought out of the bondage of corruption into the liberty of life and grace; the Lord having wrought in you gloriously, "according to the working of His mighty power, which He wrought in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and set Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places."

Now, just as Jesus Christ led, after His resurrection, a life very different from that before His death, so you and I are called upon to live a high and noble spiritual and heavenly life, seeing that we have been raised from the dead to die no more. Let us joy and rejoice in this. Let us behave as those who are alive from the dead, the happy children of the resurrection. Do not let us be money-grubbers, or hunters after worldly fame. Let us not set our affections on the foul things of this dead and rotten world, but let our hearts fly upward, like young birds that have broken loose of their shells—upward toward our Lord and the heavenly things upon which He would have us set our minds. Living truth, living work, living faith, these are the things for living men; let us cast off the grave-clothes of our former lusts, and wear the garments of light and life.

II. Now, secondly, let us consider for Paul says, "Jesus Christ was raised from the dead according to my Gospel." I always like to see what way any kind of statement bears on the Gospel. I may not have many more opportunities of preaching, and I make up my mind to this one thing, that I will waste no time upon secondary themes, but when I do preach it shall be the Gospel, or something very closely bearing upon it. Those who have a taste for the superfluities may take their fill of them, it is for me to keep to the great necessary truths by which men's souls are saved. My work is to preach Christ crucified and the Gospel, which gives men salvation through faith.
THE BEARINGS OF THIS FACT OF THE RESURRECTION UPON THE GOSPEL;

I hear every now and then of very taking sermons about some bright new nothing or another. Some preachers remind me of the emperor who had a wonderful skill in carving men's heads upon cherry stones. What a multitude of preachers we have who can make wonderfully fine discourses out of a mere passing thought, of no consequence to any one. But we want the Gospel. We have to live and die, and we must have the Gospel. Certain of us may be cold in our graves before many weeks are over, and we cannot afford to toy and trifle; we want to see the bearings of all teachings upon our eternal destinies, and upon the Gospel which sheds its light over our future.

The resurrection of Christ is vital, because first it tells us that the Gospel is the Gospel of a living Saviour. We have not to send poor penitents to the crucifix, the dead image of a dead man. We say not, "These be thy gods, O Israel!" We have not to send you to a little baby Christ nursed by a woman. Nothing of the sort. Behold the Lord that liveth and was dead and is alive for evermore, and hath the keys of hell and of death! Behold in Him a living and accessible Saviour who out of the glory still cries with loving accents, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them." I say we have a living Saviour, and is not this a glorious feature of the Gospel?

Notice next that we have

in connection with the Gospel that we preach; for He who had power to raise Himself from the dead, has all power now that He is raised. He who in death vanquishes death, can much more conquer by His life. He who being in the grave did, nevertheless, burst all its bonds, can assuredly deliver all His people. He who, coming under the power of the law, did, nevertheless, fulfil the law, and thus set His people free from bondage, must be mighty to save. You need a Saviour strong and mighty, yet you do not want one stronger than He of whom it is written that He rose again from the dead. What a blessed Gospel we have to preach—the Gospel of a living Christ who hath Himself returned from the dead leading captivity captive.

And now notice, that we have the Gospel of complete justification to preach to you. We do not come and say, "Brethren, Jesus Christ by His death did something by which men may be saved if they have a mind to be, and diligently carry out their good resolves." No, no; we say Jesus Christ took the sin of His people upon Himself and bore the consequences of it in His own body on the tree, so that He died; and having died, and so paid the penalty, He lives again; and now all for whom He died, all His people whose sins He bore, are free from the guilt of sin. You ask me, "Who are they?" and I reply, as many as believe on Him.

A PROOF OF SAFETY.

Once again, the connection of the resurrection and the Gospel is this, it proves the safety of the saints, for if when Christ rose His people rose also, they rose to a life like that of their Lord, and therefore they can never die. It is written, "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him," and it is so with the believer; if you have been dead with Christ and are risen with Christ, death has no more dominion over you; you shall never go back to the beggarly elements of sin, you shall never become what you were before your regeneration. You shall never perish, neither shall any pluck you out of Jesus' hand.

Brethren, I cannot stop to show you how this resurrection touches the Gospel at every point, but Paul is always full of it. More than thirty times Paul talks about the resurrection, and occasionally at great length, giving whole chapters to the glorious theme. The more I think of it the more I delight to preach Jesus and the resurrection. The glad tidings that Christ has risen is as truly the Gospel as the doctrine that He came among men and for men presented His blood as a ransom. If angels sang glory to God in the highest when the Lord was born, I feel impelled to repeat the note now that He is risen from the dead.

III. And so I come to my last head, and to the practical conclusion:

THE BEARING UPON OURSELVES.

Paul expressly bids us "Remember" it. "Why," says one, "we don't forget it." Are you sure you do not? I find myself far too forgetful of divine truths. We ought not to forget, for this first day of the week is consecrated for Sabbath purposes to constrain us to think of the resurrection. On the seventh day men celebrated a finished creation, on the first day we celebrate a finished redemption. Bear it, then, in mind. Now, if you will remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David rose from the dead, what will follow?

First, you will find that most of your trials will vanish. Are you tried by your sin? Jesus Christ rose again from the dead for your justification. Does Satan accuse? Jesus rose to be your advocate and intercessor. Do infirmities hinder? The living Christ will show Himself strong on your behalf. You have a living Christ, and in Him you have all things. Do you dread death? Jesus, in rising again, has vanquished the last enemy. He will come and meet you when it is your turn to pass through the chill stream, and you shall ford it in sweet company. What is your trouble? I care not what it is, for if you will only think of Jesus as living, full of power, full of love, and full of sympathy, having experienced all your trials, even unto death, you will have such a confidence in His tender care and in His boundless ability that you will follow in His footsteps without a question. Remember Jesus, and that He rose again from the dead, and your confidence will rise as on eagles' wings.

Next remember Jesus, for then you will see how your present sufferings are as nothing compared with His sufferings, and you will learn to expect victory over your sufferings even as He obtained victory. Now, then, when you are called to suffer, think—"Jesus suffered, yet Jesus rose again from the dead; He came up out of His baptism of griefs the better and more glorious for it, and so shall I!" Wherefore go you into the furnace at the Lord's bidding, and do not fear that the smell of fire shall pass upon you. Behold in the risen One the type and model of what you are and are to be! Wherefore fear not, for He conquered! Stand not trembling, but march boldly on, for Jesus Christ of the seed of David rose from the dead, and you who are of the seed of the promise shall rise again from all your trials and afflictions, and live a glorious life.

We see here, dear brethren, in being told to remember Jesus that there is hope even in our hopelessness. When are things most hopeless in a man? Why, when he is dead. Do you know what it is to come down to that, so far as your inward weakness is concerned? I do. At times it seems to me that all my joy is buried like a dead thing, and all my present usefulness and all my hope of being useful in the future are coffined and laid underground like a corpse. In the anguish of my spirit, and the desolation of my heart, I could count it better to die than to live. You say it should not be so. I grant you it should not be so, but so it is. Many things happen within the minds of poor mortals which should not happen; if we had more courage and more faith they would not happen. Ay, but when we go down, down, down, is it not a blessed thing that Jesus Christ of the seed of David died, and was raised from the dead? If I sink right down among the dead men yet will I hold to this blessed hope, that as Jesus rose again from the dead, so also shall my joy, my usefulness, my hope, my spirit rise.

This downcasting and

SLAYING IS GOOD FOR US.

We take a deal of killing, and it is by being killed that we live. Many a man will never live till his proud self is slain. O proud Pharisee, if you are to live among those whom God accepts, you will have to come to the slaughter-house and be cut in pieces as well as killed. "This is dreadful work," saith one, "this dividing of joints and marrow, this spiritual dismemberment and destruction." Assuredly it is painful, and yet it were a grievous loss to be denied it. Alas, how many are so good and excellent, and strong and wise, and clever, and all that, that they cannot agree to be saved by grace through faith. If they could be reduced to less than nothing it would be the finest thing that ever happened to them.

Lastly, this proves the futility of all opposition to Christ. The learned are going to destroy the Christian religion. Already, according to their boastings, it has pretty nearly come to an end. The pulpit is effete, it cannot command public attention. We stand up and preach to empty benches! As you see—or do not see. Nothing remains for us but to die decently, so they insinuate. And what then? When our Lord was dead, when the clay-cold corpse lay, watched by the Roman soldiery, and with a seal upon the enclosing stone, was not the cause in mortal jeopardy? But how fared it? Did it die out? Every disciple that Jesus had made forsook Him, and fled, was not Christianity then destroyed? Nay, that very day our Lord won a victory which shook the gates of hell, and caused the universe to stand astonished.

Matters are not worse with Him at this hour! His affairs are not in a sadder condition to-day than then. Nay, see Him to-day and judge. On His head are many crowns, and at His feet the hosts of angels bow! Jesus is the master of legions to-day, while the Cæsars have passed away! Here are His people—needy, obscure, despised, I grant you, still, but more numerous than they were when they laid Him in the tomb.

HIS CAUSE IS NOT TO BE CRUSHED, it is for ever rising. Year after year, century after century, bands of true and honest hearts are marching up to the assault of the citadel of Satan.

The prince of this world has a stronghold here on earth, and we are to capture it; but as yet we see small progress, for rank after rank the warriors of the Lord have marched to the breach and disappeared beneath the terrible fire of death. All who have gone before seem to have been utterly cut off and destroyed, and still the enemy holds his ramparts against us. Has nothing been done, think you? Has death taken away those martyrs, and confessors, and preachers, and laborious saints, and has nothing been achieved? Truly if Christ were dead I would admit our defeat, for they that are fallen asleep in Him would have perished; but as the Christ liveth so the cause liveth, and they that have fallen are not dead; they have vanished from our sight for a little, but if the curtain could be withdrawn every one of them would be seen to stand in his lot unharmed, crowned, victorious.

"Who are these arrayed in white robes, and whence came they?" These are they that were defeated! Whence, then, their crowns? These are they that were dishonored! Whence then their white robes? These are they who clung to a cause which is overthrown. Whence then their long line of victors, for there is not a vanquished man among them all? Let the truth be spoken. Defeat is not the word for the cause of Jesus, the Prince of the house of David. We have always been victorious, brethren; we are victorious now. Follow your Master on your white horses, and be not afraid! I see Him in the front with His blood-stained vesture around Him, fresh from the wine-press where He has trodden down His foes. You have not to present atoning blood, but only to conquer after your Lord. Put on your white raiment and follow Him on your white horses, conquering and to conquer. He is nearer than we think, and the end of all things may be before the next jibe shall have come forth from the mouth of the last new septic. Have confidence in the risen One, and live in the power of His resurrection.

The Clergyman's Death.

A CLERGYMAN'S SUDDEN DEATH.

THERE were many sorrowful faces in Brookville, and many tears were shed in the usually cheerful and prosperous community when the news was spread through the village that Dr. Turner, the revered and beloved pastor, had died suddenly in his library. More than thirty years he had preached the Gospel in the village church, and gone in and out among his people carrying the good tidings of salvation into their homes. The village contained no other man so much respected. If there was sickness in a house, his visits were expected as regularly as those of the physician, and people used to say that they did the patients as much good. His cheery manner, his gentle sympathetic voice, and above all, the sweet consolatory words he spoke, induced a calm equanimity very favorable to recovery. If a quarrel occurred, Dr. Turner's decision was accepted as final, and no one thought of going to law after the good old clergyman had heard both sides and expressed his opinion of the merits of the dispute. So it came about that the worthy clergyman was a power for good outside his legitimate sphere; men who did not profess religion liked him, and would say that if all religious people were like him they should think better of the church. It was therefore no feigned or formal sorrow that agitated the village when it was known that he was dead.

"How did he die?" "Who was with him?" were the two questions most frequently on the people's lips. Not much was known for a few days, but then some of the details were told. Dr. Turner's son had returned from a European trip a few days before, bringing with him the lady he had married in Germany. The old gentleman had given his son and daughter-in-law a warm welcome, and the latter was in the library with him when he died. No one else was there, and the young lady had come from the room to call the servants and to tell them the clergyman was ill and needed assistance. The physician was summoned; he examined his patient and pronounced him dead of an apoplectic seizure. That was all that was known.

There was more, however, that might have been told, but it was more than a year before Brookville knew it. Dr. Turner's only son, his dearly loved boy, whom he always thought and spoke of as a boy, even after he became a man, was intended for a clergyman. His education was planned with that object, and when he went to Europe it was with the expectation that on his return he would aid his father in his work, and eventually succeed him. The servants, however, noticed that he had never once attended family prayers since his return. Sometimes he had a headache and kept his room, at others he had gone out for an early walk and had not returned. Neither he nor his young wife ever presented themselves at the household service.

On the morning of the clergyman's death, the servants heard Dr. Turner greet his daughter-in-law affectionately as she entered the room just after they rose from their knees, and they heard him ask her to meet him in the library that morning. She went there, and Dr. Turner with all kindness, delicacy, and courtesy spoke to her about the concerns of the soul. She answered him with brutal frankness; told him that she had repeatedly urged her husband to tell a secret he was reluctant to tell. As he had not had the courage to do so, she said, she would do it herself. The clergyman's son was an avowed Atheist, and she had been an actress in a German theatre. The good old man heard no more. Falling back in his chair he felt as Eli felt when he heard of his sons' deaths and the loss of the ark of God. He cried out, "Oh, Absalom, my son! my son!" and then his eyes closed, never more to open in this world. His daughter-in-law started from her chair, gazed at him with a look half surprised half contemptuous, and then called for assistance. It was too late, her revelation of her husband's fall had snapped the strings of life, and the good old clergyman was with his God.

When at the last great day the secrets of all hearts are revealed, it will be found that many a death has been caused, many a useful life shortened, by sorrow over the apostasy or misconduct of dearly loved children, for whom many prayers have been offered and on whom many hopes were fixed.

THE BROKER'S PURCHASE.

"WILL you let me see a chest of drawers you have?" said a man whom Mary Watkins saw at the door of her humble apartments when she opened it in answer to a sharp imperative knock. The question made her sick at heart, for she knew what it meant. Her husband must have sold the drawers to get the money for rum. She admitted the man, who immediately walked up to the article of furniture he wanted to see, and commenced his examination. There was no need to ask if that was the one he wanted, for the room was too bare of furniture to admit of any mistake. One by one the pretty chairs and tables and pictures and ornaments Mary had been so proud of in the first days of her married life, had been sold. Everything of any value was gone beside the chest of drawers, which her mother gave her when she was married, and this she had clung to in memory of her mother, and when she moved into the wretched lodging from the little cottage they used to live in, she brought her mother's gift with her.

Mary was once a pretty girl, though now her red eyes and haggard face would make any one doubt the assertion. But only four years before, Mary was so pretty and winsome that several young men asked her to leave her service as parlor maid and be married. But Mary was in no hurry to marry. She refused her suitors, but two of them were so persistent that they would not take no for an answer. One of them was a bricklayer whom she knew first in her village home when both went to the same school and who sought her out in the city when she went there and had been kind to her. He was very good and Mary liked him, but he was a little dull and countryfied in his manners and very careful of his money—"niggardly," Mary called him. The other suitor was a city man. Mary did not know how he earned a living, but he was always well dressed and always ready to spend money in presents or little treats of one kind or another. A generous open-handed man; and though Mary instinctively felt that her country suitor Robert had more sense and prudence, she was dazzled by James's city manners and generous ways.

Eventually James was accepted and they were married. Robert came to see them the first week afterward and frankly told the young husband that he had been a suitor for Mary's hand and had been rejected. He bore them no ill will, however, he said, for he knew he was but a rough sort of fellow that a girl was not likely to take a fancy to, and he hoped, they would be happy.

James, with his customary heartiness, grasped Robert's hand, called him a real good fellow and told him he would be pleased to have him as a friend. So it came about that Robert was a frequent visitor to the cottage, and both husband and wife liked to have him there. The good honest fellow was too honorable to cause James to be jealous of him and he was useful in many ways.

James, however, began to neglect his home. He made some acquaintances whom he had better have avoided, and soon, every evening billiards and pool occupied his time and he came home a little unsteadily after midnight. Then he was discharged from the factory where he worked, and he could not obtain another engagement. Then the furniture was disposed of for bread, and the young couple moved into the dingy lodging where the broker called to see the chest of drawers. Before this, James and Robert had quarrelled. When Robert saw him coming away from the pool-room on his first visit there he had spoken to him of his danger. He used plain language for Robert was not accustomed to refinement of speech, and James called him a canting Methodist and advised him to mind his own business. High words had followed, and there would have been blows only Robert remembered in time that Mary would think badly of him if he struck her husband.

Robert, however, contrived to keep an eye on James and his wife and learned how things were going. He heard of the furniture being sold and made a friend of the broker who bought it. Somehow, the furniture never appeared in the broker's store. He might buy a clock or a picture of James on Monday, but it was always sold before Tuesday morning and no one saw where it went. Robert knew too that Mary's favorite chest of drawers was now the only thing left her of her treasures, and when he heard that the broker had gone to her lodgings he knew well enough what his business was. He waited a few minutes and then followed, and for the first time since the quarrel Mary saw him face to face just as the broker was looking at his purchase, and she with her hands clasped was looking at his movements.

James did not come home that night, he was too much ashamed of selling the chest of drawers to think of returning; but Robert knew where to find him, and very soon Robert, for the first time in his life, was sitting down in the back parlor of a saloon reeking with the fumes of lager and stale tobacco smoke. James was seated opposite him, looking the very image of misery. James said he had resolved never to go home again. He was a poor lost wretch, and he was hesitating whether he would tramp to another city out west and begin life anew, or fling himself in the dock, and he looked just then as if the latter alternative was the one he would choose. Robert took him out of the saloon at last, made him have a cold bath and then gave him a good meal. By this time James was sober but with his head almost splitting with pain. Then Robert led him into a large hall where some Christian temperance people held meetings every night and gave him into the hands of a kindly old gentleman who knew how to get at the hearts of just such men. There Robert left him, and two hours later when he called for him James was in a more hopeful condition. He had signed the pledge, he had made up his mind never to touch his enemy again, and, what was of more importance than all, knowing well his weakness, he had been taught where to look for help.

This was Robert's opportunity; taking him by the arm he led him out of the city by the well-remembered route to his former home. When they arrived at the cottage Robert opened the door with a key from his pocket, and entering he showed James the old rooms with all the furniture in, which he had sold, and Robert had bought from the broker. James saw as in a dream that everything was placed as Mary had been used to have it, and that out of the scattered fragments the home had been carefully reconstructed. He sat down and burying his face in his hands cried like a child. Then Robert, putting his hand on his shoulder, told him his plans. He would give James his old home and the furniture, if he adhered to his resolution to abstain from liquor, and he might have it at once.

Mary was quickly found and brought to the old place, and there in the restored home she and her husband commenced their new life. James worked steadily and lived frugally, and Robert has been repaid every cent he expended, and has the happiness of seeing on his regular visits to the cottage, where he now receives a hearty welcome, that his kindness has been the means, under God, of rescuing one soul from perdition and another from a life of misery.

MARTYRDOM OF TWO MISSIONARIES.

THE Rev. James Chalmers, the indefatigable missionary in New Guinea (a large island north of Australia, and belonging to the Dutch), has just been making a tour among the towns and villages in which the Gospel seed has been sown, and, though tardily and sparsely, is nevertheless producing fruit. Speaking of the Motu tribe, which exercises the chief influence in the entire region, Mr. Chalmers says, 'They must have been a terrible lot in the past. I have heard much from themselves of piracy, murder, and robbery, and along here they tell terrible tales. A Motu chief in one of our meetings, speaking of the past and present, concluded by saying, 'Since the arrival of the foreigners (teachers) we have changed, and will continue to change.'''

The following particulars with reference to events which unhappily led to the murder of the two missionaries, Dr.

James and Mr. Thorngren, by the natives of Yule Island, in August, 1876, possess a melancholy interest.

'The missionaries had gone in a vessel to Yule Island, to purchase necessities, when one young man came to try to sell them feathers, which the missionaries did not want. Dr. James and Waunaea told him to leave. This they say was the beginning of the trouble. He went home, quietly arranged a party, slept in the bush, and before daylight went off to the vessel. On nearing the vessel they said, 'We want to sell yams.' The yams were taken on board, and while Dr. James was counting the beads to pay for them he was struck with a club and afterward speared. Mr. Thorngren was struck at from aft, fell overboard and was never seen again. When the people in the village heard of it, they were very sorry, and ever since the assassins have been looked upon with anger, as they have been the cause of keeping the white man away.

'I asked them, 'What now?' 'Let us make friends, and never again have the like.' I explained to them the object of our coming here, and that they must not think we are to buy everything they bring, and must not be angry when we refuse to give what they demand. We do not come to steal their food or curios, and, if we do not want them, they can carry all back; we are not traders. They said, 'Tamate, now let it be friendship; give up your intention of going to Mekeo (inland district) and come to-morrow, and we shall make friends and peace.'''

Next morning Mr. Chalmers carried into effect his intended visit, and says of it: 'The chief of Paitana and two followers, with my friend Lauma, of Lolo, waited to accompany me. When near the village we heard loud wailing, and Lavao, who was leading, thought it better we should wait for the old chief, who was some distance behind.

'Then began speechifying, presenting of cooked food, betel-nuts, pig, and feathers. When all was finished, I gave my present, and said a few words in the Motu dialect. The real murderer of Mr. Thorngren sat near me, dressed for the occasion, and four others who were in the canoe stood near the platform. I spoke to them of the meanness and treachery of attacking, as they attacked Dr. James and Mr. Thorngren. They said, 'What now, then?' 'Oh, maino (peace) it must be; we are friends,' I said. 'I am not a trader, but have come to teach of the only one true God and His love to us all in the gift of His Son Jesus Christ.'''

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A London Garret.

How familiar, yet how different, Marlowe's cottage seemed! Roland knew all these carvings, curious and beautiful, which lined the walls and decorated every article of the old oak furniture. But the hearth was cold, and there was no pleasant disorder about the small house telling its story of daily work. In the deep recess of the window-frame, where the western sun was already shining, stood old Marlowe's copy of a carved crucifix, which he had himself once brought from the Tyrol, and lent to him before finding a place for it in his own home. The sacred head was bowed down so low as almost to hide the face under the shadow of the crown of thorns. At the foot of the cross, in delicately small old English letters, the old man had carved the words, "Come unto me all ye that be weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." He remembered pointing out the mistake that he had made to old Marlowe.

"I like it best," said the dumb man; "I have often been weary, but not with labor; weary of myself, weary of the world, weary of life, weary of everything but my Phebe. That is what Christ says to me."

Jean Merle could see the old man's speaking face again, and the fingers moving less swiftly when spelling out the words to him, than when he was talking to Phebe. Weary! weary! was it not so with him? Could any man on earth be more weary than he was?

He loitered back to Riversborough through the cool of the evening, with the pale stars shining dimly in the twilight of the summer sky; pondering, brooding over what he had seen and heard that day. He had already done much of what he had come to England to do; but what next? What was the path he ought to take now? He was in a labyrinth, where there were many false openings leading nowither; and he had no clue to guide him. All these years he had lain as one dead in the coil he had wound about himself, but now he was living again. There was agony in the life that he had entered into, but it was better than the apathy of his death in life.

He returned to London, and hired a garret for a small weekly rent, where he would lodge until he could resolve what to do. But week after week passed without bringing to his mind the solution of the problem. Remorse had given place to repentance; but despair had not been succeeded by hope. There was nothing to hope for. The irrevocable past stood between him and any reparation for his sin which his soul earnestly desired to make. An easy thing, and light, it would have been to put himself into the power of his enemy, Mr. Clifford, and bear the penalty of the law. He had suffered a hundredfold more than man's justice would have exacted. The broken law demanded satisfaction, and it would have been a blessed relief to him to give it. But that could never be. He could never bear the penalty of his crime without dragging Felicity into depths of shame and suffering deeper than they would have been if he had borne it at first. The fame she had won for herself would lift up his infamy and hers to the intolerable gaze of a keen and bitter publicity. He must blacken her fair reputation if he sought to appease his own conscience.

He made no effort to find out where she and his children were living. But one after another, in the solitude of his garret, he read every book Felicity had written. They gave him no pleasure, and awoke in him no admiration, for he read them through different eyes from her other readers. There was great bitterness of soul for him in many of the sentences she had penned; now and then he came upon some to which he alone held the true key. He felt that he, her husband, was dwelling in her mind as a type of subtle selfishness and weak ambition. When she depicted a good or noble character it was almost invariably a woman, not a man; it was never a man past his early manhood. However varied their circumstances and temperaments, they were in the main worldly and mean; sometimes they were successful hypocrites, deceiving those nearest and dearest to them.

It was a wholesome penance to him, perhaps; but it shook and troubled his soul to its very depths. His sin had ruined the poor weak-minded drunkard, John Nixey, and hastened the end of dumb old Marlowe; these consequences of it must, at any time, have clouded his own after-life. But it had also wrought a baneful change in the spirit of the woman whom he loved. It was he who had slain within her the hope, and the love, and the faith in her fellow men, which were needed for the full perfecting of her genius.

When Felix returned from his brief and clouded holiday to his work in that corner of the great vineyard, so overcrowded with busy husbandmen that they were always plucking up each others' plants, and pruning and re-pruning each others' vines, till they made a wilderness where there should have been a harvest, he found that his special plot there had suffered much damage. John Nixey, following up the impression he had so successfully made, had spread his story abroad, and found ears willing to listen to it, and hearts willing to believe it.

The small provident club, instituted by Felix to check the waste and thriftlessness of the people, had already, in his short absence, elected another treasurer of its scanty funds; and the members who had formed it, working men and women who had been gathered together by his personal influence, treated him with but scant civility. His evening lectures in the church mission-house were sometimes scarcely attended, while on other days there was an influx of hearers, among whom John Nixey was prominent, with half a dozen rough and turbulent fellows like himself, hangers-on at the nearest spirit vaults, who were ready for any turn that might lead to a row. The women and children who had been accustomed to come stayed away, or went to some other of the numerous preaching-places, as though afraid of this boisterous element in his little congregation.

Now and then, too, he heard his name called out aloud in the streets by some of Nixey's friends, as he passed the prospering gin-palaces with their groups of loungers about the doors; but though he could catch the sound of the laugh and the sneer that followed him, he could take no notice. He could not turn round in righteous indignation and tell the fellows, and the listening bystanders, that what they said of his father was a lie. The poor young curate, with his high hopes and his enthusiastic love of the work he had chosen for the sake of his fellow-men, was compelled to pass on with bowed head, and silent lips, and a heart burdened with the conviction that his influence was altogether blighted and uprooted.

"It isn't, true, sir, is it, what folks are tellin' about your father?" was a question put to him more than once, when he entered some squalid home, in the hope of giving counsel, or help, or comfort. There was something highly welcome and agreeable to these people, themselves thieves or bordering on thievery, in the idea that this fine, handsome, gentlemanly young clergyman, who had set to work among them with so much energy and zeal, was the son of a dishonest rogue, who ought to have been sent to jail, as many of them had been.

Felix had not failed to make enemies in the Brickfields by his youthful intolerance of idleness, beggary, and drunkenness. The owners of the gin-palaces hated him, and not a few of the rival religious sects were, to say the least, uncharitably disposed towards one who had drawn so many of their followers to himself. There was very little common social interest in the population of the district, for the tramping classes of the lowest London poor, such as were drawn to the Brickfields by its overflowing charities, have as little cohesion as a rope of sand; but Felix was so conspicuous a figure in its narrow and dirty streets, that even strangers would nudge one another's elbows, and almost before he was gone by narrate Nixey's story, with curious additions and alterations.

It was gall and wormwood to Felix that he was unable to contradict the story in full. He could say that his father had never been a convict; but no inducement on earth could have wrung from him the declaration that his father had never been guilty of fraud. Sometimes he wondered whether it would not be well to own the simple truth, and endure the shame; if he had been the sole survivor of his father's sin this he would have done, and gone on toilsomely regaining the influence he had lost. But the secret touched his mother even more closely than himself, and Hilda was equally concerned in it. It had been sacredly kept by those older than he was, and it was not for him to betray it. "My poor mother!" he called her. Never, before he learned the secret burden she had borne, had he called her by that tender and pitiful epithet; but as often as he thought of her now his heart said, "My poor mother!"

As soon as Canon Pascal returned to England Felix took a day's holiday, and ran down by train to the quiet rectory in Essex, where he had spent the greater portion of his boyhood. Only a few years separated him from that careless and happiest period of his life; yet the last three months had driven it into the far background. He almost smiled at the recollection of how young he was half a year ago, when he had declared his love for Alice. How far dearer to him she was now than then! The one letter he had received from her, written in Switzerland, and telling him in loving detail of her visit to his father's grave, would be forever one of his most precious treasures. But he was not going to share his blemished name with her. He had had nothing worthy of her, or of her father, to lay at her feet, while he was yet in utter ignorance of the shame he had inherited; and now? He must never more think of her as his wife.

She was at home, he knew; but he sternly forbade himself to seek for her. It was Canon Pascal he had come down to see, and he went straight on to his well-known study. He was busy in the preparation of next Sunday's sermons, but at the sight of Felix's dejected, unsmiling face, he swept away his books and papers with one hand, while he stretched out the other to give him such a warm, strong, hearty grip as he might have given to a drowning man.

"What is it, my son?" he asked.

There was such a full sympathetic tone in the friendly voice speaking to him, that Felix felt his burden already shared, and pressing less heavily on his bruised spirit. He stood a little behind Canon Pascal, with his hand upon his shoulder, as he had often placed himself before when he was pleading for some boyish indulgence, or begging pardon for some boyish fault.

"You have been like a true father to me, and I come to tell you a great trouble," he began in a tremulous voice.

"I know it, my boy," replied Canon Pascal; "you have found out how true it is, 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes,' and the children's teeth are set on edge." Ah! Felix, life teaches us so, as well as this wise old Book."

"You do not know all," stammered Felix; "how can you know?"

"Phebe told me," he answered, "six months since. And now you and I can understand Felicity. There was no prejudice against our Alice in her mind; no unkindness to either of you. But she could not bring herself to tell the truth against the husband whom she had wept and mourned over so long. And your mother is the soul of truth and honor; she could not let you marry while we were ignorant of this matter. It has been a terrible cross to bear, and she has borne it in silence. I love and revere your mother more than ever."

"Yes!" said Felix with a sob. He had not yet seen her since coming to this fateful knowledge; for Phebe and Hilda had joined her at the sea side where they were still staying. But if his father had gone down into depths of darkness, his mother had risen so much the higher in his reverence and love. She had become a saint and a martyr in his eyes; and to save her from a moment's grief would be a cause worth dying for.

"I came to tell you all," he went on, "and to say I cannot any more hope that you will give Alice to me. God alone knows what it costs me to give her up; and she will suffer too for a while, a long while, I fear; for we have grown together so. But it must be. Alice cannot marry a man who has not even an unblemished name to offer to her."

"You should ask Alice herself about that," said Canon Pascal quietly.

A thrill of rapture ran through Felix, and he grasped the shoulder, on which his hand still rested, more firmly. What! was it possible that this second father of his knew all his disgrace and dishonor, how his teeth were set on edge by the sour grapes which he had not eaten, and yet was willing that Alice should share his name and his lot? There was no fear as to what Alice would say. He recollected how Phebe spoke, as if her thoughts dwelt more on his father's sorrow and sad death, than on his sin; and Alice would be the same. She would cover it with a woman's sweet charity. He could not command his voice to speak, and after a minute's pause Canon Pascal continued—

"Yes! Alice knows all about it. I told her beside your father's grave. And do you suppose she said, 'Here is cause enough for me to break with Felix?' Nay, I believe if the sin had been your own, Alice would have said it was her duty to share it, and your repentance. Shall our Lord come to save sinners, and we turn away from their blameless children? Yet I thought it must be so at first, I own it, Felix; at first, while my eyes were blinded and my heart hardened; and I looked at it in the light of the world. But then I thought of your mother. Shall not she make good to you the evil your father has wrought? If he dishonored your name in the eyes of a few, she has brought honor to it, and made it known far beyond the limits it could have been known through him. The world will regard you as her son, not as his."

"But I came also to tell you that I wish to leave the country," said Felix. "There is a difficulty in getting young men for our colonial work; and I am young and strong, stronger than most young men in the Church. I could endure hardships, and go in for work that feeblers men must leave untried; you have taken care of that for me. Such a life would be more like old Felix Merle's than a London curacy. You let your own sons emigrate, believing that the old country is getting overpopulated; and I thought I would go too."

S.S. Lesson for May 21, Mark 8 : 22-33. Golden Text, Matt. 16 : 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE now find our Lord at Bethsaida; we have no intimation whether the disciples accompanied Him. But the people of the place did not leave Him without occupation; "they bring a blind man unto Him, and besought Him to touch him." They knew that He had healed many by a touch, and they seem to have made up their minds that this was the right way of healing. How many there are who come to Jesus for healing of the soul or of the body, and represent to themselves that His power must be exercised in a certain way, that they must pass through just such an experience as they have heard some one describe, and which has made much impression upon them, and after appealing to the Lord, and giving themselves, as they think, into His hands, they continue watching their symptoms, feeling their spiritual pulse, and considering whether each phase of feeling as it arises, answers to their idea of what they ought to feel; they do anything else than abandon their case into His hands.

It is even so with many who come to the Lord or bodily healing, they imagine that some miraculous and very startling change is to come upon them, at the very instant when believing Christians are praying for them; and instead of trusting themselves out of their own hands, and leaving God to work the cure in His own way, they get into despair about it, because it has not been worked in their way, forgetting that their own making of plans is the hindrance to the healing, because they are not entirely given up into His hands.

Perhaps somebody had said to the blind man, 'He will only come and touch you once for one moment and immediately you will be able to see.' What, then, must have been his astonishment, when Jesus took him "by the hand, and led him out of the town!" Jesus had power to heal him without this delay, why did He not do it? why does He not heal all who apply to Him perfectly and at once? Our beloved Lord must first prove whether they are willing to be led by Him, and to trust Him implicitly, to let Him take them which He will and do with them what He will. It was the mighty Healer, yea the mighty God, leading the poor blind man, and he, knowing nothing, only that the hand which held him was the hand of the great Healer. The noises of the town died away as they went on; where was he going to? what was going to happen? It mattered not, Jesus was responsible. This is the true position for those who seek bodily healing.

When Jesus had led the blind man in his blindness out of the town, away from all his associations, and to a place where he could not know his own way back and had nothing to fall back upon but Jesus, He spit on his eyes, and put His hands upon him, and asked him if he saw aught. "And he looked up, and said, I see men as trees, walking." In many cases, both of spiritual and of physical healing, there is a partial restoration; but that is very imperfect sight which sees men as trees, the man needed another application of the hands of Jesus. He did not attempt to perfect the cure by some method of his own, he had given himself over to the Lord, and although this was different from every other cure of our blessed Lord's, the blind man did not withdraw himself in discouragement or despair. And Jesus "put His hands again upon his eyes, and made him look up: and he was restored, and saw every man clearly." The cure was as complete as though it had been accomplished all at once, and the blind man had learned to trust the leading of Jesus; this he would have missed had the cure been absolutely sudden. Jesus "sent him away to his own house, saying, Neither go into the town, nor tell it to any in the town."

Why was this? Jesus had other work to do than simply the healing of the body; all through the time of His ministry He was occupied in preparing His disciples for their future work. He went out with them "into the towns of Cæsarea Philippi; and by the way He asked His disciples, saying unto them, Whom do men say that I am?" It was to hear the Master speak of Himself. He spoke often of the Father, but of Himself scarcely ever. The time, however, was drawing nearer when the disciples must be left alone, and He sought to manifest Himself more clearly and really to them. "They answered, John the Baptist; but some say Elias; and others, One of the prophets." Herod, John the Baptist's murderer, was he who first broached the idea that Jesus was the Baptist risen from the dead. Some students of the prophetic Scriptures may have given currency to the idea that Jesus was Elias, of whom it was prophesied, "Behold I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord" (Mal. 4 : 5). "And He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am?" This was the vital question; second-hand faith, faith in the opinions or doctrines of others could never save a man. The Lord did not only say, "Whom think ye that I am," or as He afterwards asked the Pharisees, "What think ye of Christ?" but "Whom say ye?" what is the testimony which ye are ready to bear before the world? "Whom say ye that I am?"

There was one disciple on whose heart the reproaches of Jesus, because of their unbelief, had left a deep impression. He who had once walked upon the water, as well as witnessed the repeated miracles of the loaves and the stilling of the tempest, was beginning at last to understand. Peter answered, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16 : 16). "And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."

Reader, what is your testimony of Jesus?

WHAT DO YOU SAY

about Him? Nothing? Then surely you do not think He is worthy to be spoken of. Do you say, I believe in His redemption, in His power, in His love, and yet you never tell others what He has done for you? What do you say about Jesus? And what does your life say about Jesus? Do you find that people come to you and ask you the secret of your happiness, seek to know why the worries and vexations which wear them so much never touch you, and do you tell them the great things which Jesus the Son of God has done for you? Or perhaps there is no such tale to tell, perhaps, on the contrary, your life is saying that a man or a woman can be a member of a church and yet be unkind and uncharitable; can have a sense of forgiveness and yet remain in debt; can teach in a Sunday-School while making no stand against liquor, against smoking, or vanity in dress; is saying of Christ that He was guilty of exaggeration when He said of His disciples, "They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world?"

Are you professing to be a disciple of Jesus without denying yourself? without taking up your cross? without forsaking all that you have? although Jesus said none could be His disciple who did not these things? Are you saying that you belong to Him, but that you have struck out an easier path than that which the Lord pointed out? Are you saying, I believe, and therefore I have eternal life, without loving my enemies, without ceasing to resist evil, without shining as a light in this dark world, without being its salt, without in fact doing anything which is inconvenient or troublesome?

Whom then do you say that Jesus is? Surely you make Him to be a false prophet, or your life makes you to be a false professor. There is but one real path of life, and that is "the narrow way," just as there is but one entrance, "the straight gate," and they who think that they are ingenious enough to make belief in Christ for the forgiveness of their sins a substitute for holiness of life, will find themselves terribly mistaken, for "without holiness no man can see the Lord" (Heb. 12 : 14). Reader, is Jesus the Christ of God to your soul? What, then, is He worth to you? Soul, body, family, reputation, business, time, money? Then let all be given over to Him and His undivided possession. Everything which a man holds back from Jesus is a thing more prized than He.

Jesus "charged them that they should tell no man of Him," i.e., "that He was Jesus the Christ" (Matt. 16 : 20). "And He began to teach them" many things, which they could not have learned until they knew that He was Christ: "that the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected of the elders, and of the chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again." This was altogether unpalatable, they were looking for Him to become the reigning Messiah, who should deliver them from the Roman yoke, who should deliver them from all their political enemies, and fulfil all the glorious promises made to the Jews in the Old Testament (Jer. 33 : 5-8; Ezek. 34 : 37; Zeph. 3 : 8-20).

They expected the kingdom to be restored to Israel, and had no idea of death or resurrection. And Peter, the very man who had so boldly and fully confessed Him, took upon himself to rebuke Him. He said, "Be it far from Thee, Lord; this shall not be unto Thee" (Matt. 16 : 22). "But when He had turned about and looked on His disciples, He rebuked Peter, saying, Get thee behind me, Satan: for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men." Death and resurrection are not pleasant topics to the natural man, and yet the life of God comes to us only through death and resurrection. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it; but he that loseth his life in this world shall keep it unto life eternal" (John 12 : 24, 25). All confessing Christ is death to the natural man, because it is at a cost to our honor, our reputation, and all which we naturally hold dear, but this is the very spring of that life eternal which is by the faith of the Son of God.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Lieut. De Long and his Party have been found; all dead. Such was the melancholy intelligence cabled by Engineer Melville on May 5th. The news was not unexpected, for when it was known that with provisions almost exhausted, and with the party suffering from frostbite and unable to travel, he had entered a wilderness devoid of game, only the most sanguine could hope for his safety. Nevertheless the certainty of the death of the eleven brave men is very distressing. De Long passed so near food and shelter without knowing of them; there were so many means by which he might have been relieved had his whereabouts been known, that vexation mingles with regret that so brave a man should have died from starvation. Only the brief telegram announcing the discovery of the eleven bodies with the books and papers has as yet arrived, and more detailed intelligence is anxiously expected.

Engineer Melville is now Engaged in a search for the boat's crew commanded by Lieutenant Chipp. It will be remembered that when the Jeannette went down, the gallant explorers were distributed in three boats. The boats kept together during the long voyage to the Lena, but when near land were separated in the night by a gale. The party under the guidance of Danenhower and Melville arrived safely and providentially met with assistance. De Long's party wandered about without success for several days, when the captain sent two sailors forward to obtain assistance. These two are now well and with Melville's party; the other members of De Long's party perished. Of Lieutenant Chipp and his party nothing has been heard, and it is now feared that the boat must have capsized in the gale which separated the boats, and all have been drowned. Engineer Melville is, however, endeavoring to gain tidings of them.

The Resignation of Mr. Forster, the Secretary for Ireland, was announced on May 2d by Lord Granville, in the British House of Lords, and by Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons. The resignation, following so closely on that of Lord Cowper, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, prepared the Parliament for the other intelligence Mr. Gladstone proceeded to impart. He stated that Parnell, Dillon, and O'Kelly, the three imprisoned members of Parliament, would be released at once, and the cases of the other suspects would be reconsidered, with a view to their ultimate release. Mr. Gladstone also stated that a large number of other suspects would be released, and that the government, instead of renewing the Coercion act, would introduce a measure remedying the administration of justice in Ireland. The releases would be on the government's sole responsibility. Mr. Gladstone stated that Mr. Forster had resigned because he was not willing to share this responsibility. He warmly praised the manner in which Mr. Forster had performed his duties, and expressed regret at his retirement. On Thursday, May 4th, Mr. Forster made a personal explanation of the reasons of his withdrawal from the office of Secretary for Ireland. He confirmed the report that there was a difference between himself and the rest of the cabinet in regard to the release of the suspects, which release he condemned. He said he could not agree to release the suspects unless he got from them a public undertaking to cease opposing the execution of the law. As he could not obtain that he could not remain in office. He would have released the suspects if Ireland had been quiet, or if the government had had full powers; but he could not agree to an unconditional surrender.

The Selection of Mr. Forster's Successor was anxiously anticipated during the early part of last week by the English public. It was expected that Mr. Chamberlain, the representative in the cabinet of the Radical wing of the Liberal party, would be appointed. It was known that in the cabinet he had opposed coercion, and that he had no confidence in the policy of Mr. Forster. He, however, declined the office, and urged Mr. Gladstone to give the office to an Irishman. It was eventually announced that the new Secretary was Lord Frederick Cavendish, second son of the Duke of Devonshire and brother of the Marquis of Hartington. It was then believed that the appointment was a compromise. Mr. Gladstone, it was said, was afraid that he would lose the support of Lord Hartington, who represents the aristocratic Whig element in the cabinet, and therefore selected his brother as a pacificatory expedient. Other politicians regarded the selection as an intimation that Mr. Gladstone intended to take charge himself of the Irish administration, and therefore appointed a comparatively unknown man who would faithfully and implicitly obey his instructions. The Irish members and the Radical press, however, considered the appointment an indication of a weak and vacillating policy.

The Startling Intelligence of the Assassination of Lord Frederick Cavendish, the newly appointed Secretary of Ireland, was cabled here on Saturday evening last. Lord Frederick Cavendish went to Dublin with Earl Spencer, the new Governor of Ireland, on Saturday afternoon. They had remained at Dublin Castle engaged in the transaction of official business until six o'clock that evening, when each drove to his respective residence. After dinner Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Thomas Henry Burke, permanent Under Secretary for Ireland, went for a walk in Phoenix Park. They were both strolling along, when a car drove up containing four men, two of whom jumped down from the car and attacked Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, stabbing them both several times in the throat and breast. The victims struggled hard for life, and in the struggle became separated, their bodies being found some ten paces apart. The tragedy occurred about ten minutes after seven o'clock in the evening, and in broad daylight. The upper part of the bodies were perforated in a shocking manner and presented a ghastly sight. That of the chief secretary displayed dreadful wounds, in addition to which his left arm was also broken and torn, as if he had put it up to protect his breast. Both were quite dead. The assassins made their escape unobserved, and though many people were walking in the park near the spot where the cowardly crime was committed, no one noticed the struggle. Both the victims had large sums of money on their persons, but neither this nor their gold watches were taken by the murderers. It is evident, therefore, that the motive for the crime was not robbery. The remarkable feature of the case is that Lord Frederick Cavendish went to Ireland to pursue a policy of peace and conciliation.

A Manifesto was on Monday last Issued by the Land League leaders denouncing the crime. It was indorsed by Parnell, Davitt, and others. It was doubtless issued to disarm the indignation evoked against an organization which is largely responsible for the anarchy now existing in Ireland. If the leaders are sincere the murderers will be captured; for though the Land League leaders are doubtless ignorant of the perpetrators of the deed, there must be many of their followers who know who they are, and who would give information if Parnell desired it. Two theories are advanced to account for the murder. One is that it was intended to kill Mr. Burke, who advised and directed the coercion proceedings; and that when Lord Frederick Cavendish went to his assistance, the assassins killed him not knowing who he was. The other theory is that certain agitators seeing that an amicable settlement of the land question was probable, and fearing that such a settlement would ruin the agitation by which they are thriving, struck a blow which they supposed would prevent the settlement being made.

The Emigration of the Jews to Palestine is now a prominent topic among statesmen as well as in religious circles. The London correspondent of the New York World says: "The whole of the Jews of Southern Russia are possessed with an enthusiasm for emigration to the Holy Land. Deputations arrive every day from all parts of Russia to confer with Mr. Oliphant, but as the Russian Government prohibits the collection of money, although hundreds of thousands of roubles are ready, it is not safe to place them anywhere.

The government also takes care that no rich Hebrew shall leave the country. Consequently great practical difficulties attend this remarkable exodus. The last news is a discouraging report. The Sultan of Turkey is opposed to any further emigration to the Holy Land. Mr. Oliphant has left Lemberg and gone to confer with the Palestine committees at Yassy, Galatz, and Bucharest. He then will go to Constantinople to see the Sultan."

Mr. Moody's Reply to the Invitation Sent to him and Mr. Sankey by London clergymen and laymen to spend a year in their city, has been published in the English journals. Mr. Moody wrote: "We wish to return thanks to the friends who so kindly invite us back again to their city. We feel it a privilege that we would enjoy to work again where so many of God's people would be praying for a blessing on the preaching and singing of the Gospel. Owing to so much uncertainty in our plans, a delay has been caused in answering the letter, which we regret could not be avoided. In thinking over the work, we have felt that London could not possibly be visited before next autumn, and as a number of the towns in England, as well as Wales and Ireland, have urged strongly that visits should be made there, the question arose whether it would not be better to postpone the visit to London till the autumn of 1883, using next winter in the smaller cities. As this is so far in the future, it seems impossible that definite plans should be made now."

The Persecution of the Jews of Russia is still in progress in several cities of the empire. At a meeting of the Russian cabinet on May 3d, General Ignatieff recommended the adoption of measures to facilitate the emigration of the Jews. A vote was taken on the proposal, and it was unanimously rejected. General Ignatieff became greatly excited and quitted the assembly. A despatch to the London Times from Berlin says: "Secretary Frelinghuysen's despatch to Mr. Hoffman in regard to the treatment of Russian Jews has produced a most favorable impression in liberal circles. The United States is hailed as having taken the place of England as the champion of the down-trodden and oppressed."

"The Women of India for Christ" is the motto and aim of missionary enterprise in that many-millioned land. At a recent meeting in Glasgow, Scotland, the Rev. J. Ross, formerly of Calcutta, took as typical the case of a young man, who really seemed to love the Saviour and was almost persuaded to avow his attachment, but who stood back. "Why?" "Because," said the young man, "I have a mother. I am an only child; my mother does not object to my becoming a Christian; she believes that the religion of Jesus is the religion of the coming time. 'But wait,' she says, 'till I die; for if you become a Christian, my relatives will never let me speak to you again; and if I were to be baptized, it would break my mother's heart.'"

"The Treasury of David:" by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. A homiletical exposition of the Book of Psalms. An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

H.R.H. PRINCE LEOPOLD.

CLAREMONT HOUSE.

H.R.H. PRINCESS HELEN.

The Marriage of Prince Leopold of England to the Princess Helen of Waldeck-Pyrmont on April 27.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE.

THURSDAY, April 27th, 1882, was a festive day in the ancient town of Windsor, England. The town was crowded with distinguished visitors and the streets were gay with flags and floral decorations. The occasion was the marriage of Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, the youngest son of Queen Victoria, to the Princess Helen of Waldeck-Pyrmont, in Germany. Here and there were neat monograms, with the letters "L. H." and often, especially in the High Street, were to be noticed the words, "God bless them both."

Booming of cannon and ringing of bells announced at half past eleven o'clock the setting forth of the royal procession from Windsor Castle, the Queen's residence, to the chapel where the ceremony was to take place. Her Majesty and the bride received an ovation along the short distance traversed from the brilliant crowds gathered on the lawns. Guards of honor were massed at the entrance of the chapel. On the arrival of the procession at the chapel the clash of arms by the saluting troops and the acclamations of the spectators were incessant until the great curtains parted for the last time to admit the last of the pageant, to be resumed again after the ceremony. Inside the chapel, which was opened shortly after eleven o'clock, the scene was very brilliant. Fitful gleams of sunshine falling through the painted windows lit up and brought into full relief the curiously carved oaken panels of the choir, the banners, the helmets, the mantles and the swords of the Knights of the Garter.

At twelve o'clock the clergy marched up to the altar, followed quickly, after a blast of trumpets, by the first procession, which was formed as follows: The Duke and Duchess of Teck, the Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Duke of Cambridge and Princess Louise, the Prince and Princess Christian, and Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh. The Princess of Wales and her three daughters, all dressed in light blue flowered silk, then took their seats on the right and left of the altar rails. Another blast of trumpets proclaimed the advent of the Queen's procession, Sir George Elvey's march being played while they walked up to the altar. The Queen was dressed in black with deep lace all over the skirt. On her head was a small Imperial Crown, and as a brooch she wore the Kohinoor, wearing over her shoulders the Order of Leopold. After the Queen had bowed to the altar, she took a seat near the altar rails, every one remaining standing, and Princess Beatrice, and Princess Victoria of Wales, who had come in after, remained standing behind her. Another call from the heralds, and Prince Leopold entered to the "Wedding March," wearing the uniform of a colonel, and resting on a stick. He had as his supporters the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Hesse on the right and left.

A grand flourish of trumpets at 12.30 announced the coming of the bride. The Princess seemed nervous, and held her father, Prince Waldeck, and her brother-in-law, King of the Netherlands, and her supporters, by the hands. The bridesmaids bore her train, which was over six yards in length, and made, like her dress, of pale cream silk, with Gloire de Dijon roses for trimming; and the bride wore on her head primroses, violets, and white heather, with a huge bridal veil. When she reached the altar she bowed to the Queen and Prince Leopold, and knelt for a few moments. When she rose the Archbishop of Canterbury advanced to the altar rails and commenced the service, reading the impressive words in a low tone, the responses being answered in a low tone by the Princess and Prince. At this moment the sun, which was overclouded before, burst out and lit up the whole congregation with every imaginable color from the ancient stained-glass window.

The sight was indeed beautiful as the choir finished, and every one knelt down to receive the benediction. When this had concluded, the Queen advanced to meet Prince Leopold, and first kissing him on both cheeks, congratulated and kissed the Duchess of Albany, who turned afterwards to her mother and father, and received a like salute from them. Prince Leopold also kissed his mother-in-law, the Princess of Waldeck. Congratulations were accorded to the youthful pair by all present amid the thunder of Mendelssohn's Wedding March which was played by the organ, assisted by the Queen's private band under the old wall, the cloisters resounding with the melody.

H. R. H. PRINCE LEOPOLD,
Duke of Albany.

Birth in 1853—His Accident at Darmstadt in 1878—His Visits to the Empress Eugenie at Chiselhurst—Studious Habits and Public Speeches—Is made a "Freeman" of London—Opening of Firth College, Sheffield—Unveiling of the Temple Bar Memorial.

PRINCE LEOPOLD GEORGE DUNCAN ALBERT, the fourth and youngest son of the Queen, was born at Buckingham Palace, April 7th, 1853. Within a few days after his birth the Queen wrote to her uncle, King Leopold of Belgium: "I can report most favorably of myself, for I have never been better or stronger. Stockmar will have told you that Leopold is to be the name of our fourth young gentleman. It is a mark of love and affection to you which I hope you will not disapprove. It is a name which is dearest to me after Albert's, and one which recalls the almost only happy days of my sad childhood. To hear 'Prince Leopold' again will make me think of all those days. His other names will be George Duncan Albert, and the sponsors the King of Hanover, Ernest Hohenlohe, the Princess of Prussia, and Mary Cambridge. George is after the King of Hanover, and Duncan is a compliment to dear Scotland."

The young Prince was not baptized till the 28th of June, when the service was performed at the chapel in Buckingham Palace, and the sponsors named by the Queen were present in person.

Prince Leopold has never enjoyed robust health, and an accident he met with by slipping while stepping into a carriage has not tended to improve it. It prevented his attending the wedding of his brother, the Duke of Connaught, in March, 1879. He was to have been one of the Duke's "groomsmen" on that happy occasion, but while at Darmstadt, whither he had gone after the death of his sister, the Princess Alice, in December, 1878, this accident befell him, and his condition for some time occasioned no little anxiety. Occasionally paragraphs appear in the English papers giving reports of his health which indicate that the Prince is seldom free from illness in some form.

After the crushing blow which fell upon the Empress Eugenie by the loss of her only son, Louis Napoleon, in 1879, it was noticed that in the visits of the Queen to Chiselhurst she was generally accompanied by her son, Prince Leopold. He went with the Queen on her first visit of condolence, and both his Royal Highness and the Princess Beatrice were admitted to the chamber of mourning. The Queen was observed to be in the deepest grief, shedding tears as she entered the saloon, while Prince Leopold and his sister were also overcome by emotion.

It has been generally understood that Prince Leopold has, for several years, been a close and earnest student, and the speeches which he has delivered on public occasions have given no slight evidence of the breadth of his reading and of a certain enthusiasm in his pursuit of the pleasures of literature.

One of Prince Leopold's speeches was delivered at the annual meeting of the Royal Association in Aid of the Deaf and Dumb. There was a large gathering of ladies and gentlemen present, and it was exceedingly interesting to note that the addresses of Prince Leopold and other speakers on the occasion were interpreted to the deaf and dumb by the sign language as they were delivered. In the course of his remarks the Prince said: "We should be naturally led by the contemplation of the luxuries and comforts around us to feel a keener sympathy for those whom God has so terribly afflicted. I know not whether the day will ever come when, in our country, as in America and in most of the European communities, the State will take the education of the deaf and dumb under its own fostering care; but of this, at least, I am confident, that the possibility of such an event can in no wise acquit us of the duty that their present uncared-for condition imposes upon us. We should rather strive earnestly so to fulfil this obligation that is laid upon us, that we may be able hereafter to pass it on to other hands with no arrears of uncompleted labor, no sorrowful list of sufferers, whose intelligence might have been developed, and whose whole lives might have been brightened, had our exertions been more timely and more sustained."

In October, 1875, Prince Leopold, to use a common expression, "took up" the freedom of the City of London. He was entitled to this privilege; his father having been a freeman of the City it became the son's by right of patrimony. It is required of those who are admitted formally to declare their obedience to the Lord Mayor, and to express their readiness to preserve all the rights and privileges of the City. In the case of personages of high rank the day on which the freedom of the City is conferred upon them is usually one of popular rejoicing in the City, and on the occasion of Prince Leopold's admission the court in Guildhall was filled with one of the largest assemblies of the year. Mr. Chamberlain Scott, in addressing him, said that his Royal Highness was the last of the sons of the revered father who had enrolled themselves as freemen in right of citizenship.

Prince Leopold, in reply, said that although it was true that, according to the constitution of the City, he was entitled by right of birth to the privileges of the City of London freemen, he did not on that account feel less inclined to set a high value on the kind and courteous manner in which these privileges had been conferred, nor could he omit to thank them most heartily for the handsome casket in which that freedom was bestowed, and, which he assured them, he should ever prize as a memorial of the honor that day done him. He said further: "Were I not immediately connected by family traditions with your ancient and honorable corporation, I must, nevertheless, have esteemed it a high honor to be associated with the long list of illustrious men who have, from time to time, been placed upon your rolls, and to be connected with a body which has ever been so remarkable for its loyalty in the truest sense of the word, and for its attachment to the laws and institutions of this country."

Prince Leopold has frequently officiated at the opening ceremonies and inauguration of public buildings. Apart from the unveiling of the Temple Bar Memorial, on November 8th, 1880, the most noteworthy affair of the kind was in September, 1879, on the occasion of opening Firth College, Sheffield. This magnificent building, which cost more than $100,000, was given to the town of Sheffield by Mr. Firth, one of the most successful and benevolent manufacturers.

The following remarks made by the Prince on that occasion show that he has not failed to take a high view of the responsibilities of wealth and station. He said: "The privileges of making a marked and visible difference in human well-being and of seeing some great institution rise and flourish at your bidding, is one that can, perhaps, be more readily enjoyed by the great magnates of commerce and manufacture than by any other class. They, with their unfettered fortunes, must seem enviable in this respect to men who, apparently in possession of large incomes, are hampered by the extensive claims made upon them by their landed estates or other hereditary duties, who are compelled to restrict the aid they give to cause such as this to small and fitful donations. Those men who, with great wealth at their disposal, elect to spend it in mere sumptuousness and luxury, are repaid, indeed, by admiration from certain persons and of a certain kind; but how far richer is the reward of those who, after spending what is needed to maintain with dignity their place in society, devote the remainder toward furthering the happiness of their fellow-men! Far-off generations shall rise up and call such men blessed, and the name they leave behind them shall be ranked with such names as those of Peabody in London, of Owen at Manchester, of Mason at Birmingham, of Firth at Sheffield."

In the London Gazette of May 24th last, an announcement was made, that the Queen had been day twelve months ago there were a number of people in the room, and my little boy asked them all to go out except me; and then he said to me, 'Father, will you take me on your knee?' I took him on my knee, and he put his arms round my neck and said, 'Father, will you not give yourself to Christ?' I could stand it no longer, and there and then I gave myself to the Saviour."

A Woman Shut Out.—Mr. Porter (Missionary) said: "A woman from the Dennistown district wished to attend one of the Circus meetings, but when she got there, she found that she was shut out. She felt disappointed, and all along Gallowgate the words of Scripture appeared to be ringing in her ears, 'And the door was shut!' and she was really alarmed. She passed our open-air meeting just as we were asking people to come into the mission-hall. She stopped to listen, and accepting the invitation, she came inside. She was noticed to be weeping during the address. She was afterward spoken to, and induced to enter the inquiry-room, where she found that though one door was shut, another was open, and the Holy Spirit led her into the kingdom of God. She gave herself to Christ and went away rejoicing in Him."

A Lump in the Throat.—A Young Man Related that "Three weeks ago I came to this house and found peace. Previous to that friends had spoken to me, but I had always put the matter off. I came down to this meeting, not with the intention of getting any good, but to please my friends. When, however, I got in, I was brought into a kind of circle, and Mr. Moody gave me in charge of Mr. Drummond, saying to him, 'Don't let him go.' I was brought up near the pulpit, and I never felt so much out of place in my life. If Mr. Moody had not said to Mr. Drummond, 'Don't let him go,' I should have gone out; but I knew that if I got up he would have been after me. I felt a lump in my throat as if I were going to choke. Mr. Drummond spoke to me and showed me the necessity of deciding then and there, and I accepted Christ. Then this lump just melted away. My brother is here to-night, having also given himself to Christ."

FOLLOWING CHRIST.

S.S. Lesson for May 28, Mark 8: 34-38; 9: 1. Golden Text, ver. 34. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER Peter, the bold confessor of Christ, had manifested his repugnance to the cross and his little understanding of the truth that his Master must pour out His soul unto death, Jesus, who never lost patience with His poor fallible disciples, went on teaching them. "When He had called the people unto Him with His disciples also, He said unto them, Whosoever will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me." The Lord Jesus denied Himself, i.e., put Himself out of the question, in the whole of His human life; no consideration for His own comfort, honor, convenience, or anything else which could affect Him, was allowed to weigh for an instant. It never occurred to Him to think how much He would prefer one kind of life to another. He did always those things which pleased God (John 8: 29), and therefore He put it out of His power to be inconvenienced; living, as He did, in the life of another, He put it out of His power to exercise choice; His Father chose for Him, He had no likes or dislikes, and thus He could not consider whether He liked Nazareth best or Capernaum, whether the carpenter trade or some other was most to His mind. His vocation was to deny Himself, to work out the will, and carry out the thoughts of His Father which was in heaven. And it is equally the vocation of every one of His followers to put self out of the question.

"I DON'T LIKE"

is the language of self, and every one who uses it is living for self. I am so sensitive, or "so nervous" is again the language of self, it means "I am to be considered, and allowance is to be made for me." The constant complaints we hear of the conduct of others is evidence that self still has a place, and a very large place, in the thoughts and life of the complainant. Our privilege as children of God, our position as being crucified with Christ, our only tenable place as His followers, is that of self-denial, i.e., self-ignoring, the non-recognition of the claims of self, the non-acknowledgment of its rights and being.

As identified with Christ we cease, if we are practical, to be identified with self, and our lesson of to-day is to put this in practice; for only so far as we really deny ourselves, are we really following Christ. When such questions arise as with regard to the indulgence in stimulants, in smoking, in extravagance in dress, in the wearing of ornaments, in the pursuit of a course of study or of art; this is the test for a Christian, "Do I in this thing indulge myself or deny myself? Am I thereby becoming more or less like Jesus? Am I therein hallowing His name, increasing His kingdom, doing His will; or am I honoring my name, seeking my honor or profit, doing my will?"

Again, in a question of the treatment we receive at the hands of others, if we deny self we do not think of how we are affected by what they do or say, do not think of what they owe to us, but what we owe to them. In denying our own self, we let Christ step into its place, and only that which affects Him affects us; the matter is not how a thing touches us, but how it touches Him. When in the days of Joash the King of Judah, was stoned in reward for his faithfulness in testifying against idolatry, his heart resented the injustice and wickedness of the king and people, and he said with his dying breath, "The Lord look upon it and require it" (2 Chron. 24: 20-22). The claims of self were consistent with the spirit of the Old Testament, which enjoined, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." But after the Lord Jesus had brought in "the royal law," and taught by His own life and by His doctrine the denial of self, how great a change was wrought. Stephen, the first Christian martyr, was stoned, just as Zechariah had been, for his faithful testimony; but instead of any bitter thought of vengeance, the Spirit of Christ in him led him to pray for his murderers, saying with his dying breath, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge" (Acts 7: 60).

When Jeremiah the prophet was smitten and put in the stocks by Pashur the son of Immer the priest, because of his fearless witness, he cried to God for vengeance against his enemies, and cursed the day in which he was born; the impatient and revengeful feelings clearly showing how much of self existed in his heart (Jer. 20: 2, 11, 12, 14). When, however, Paul the Apostle was in the same case at Philippi, beaten and put in the stocks because of his faithful testimony, he, like Stephen, put self quite out of the question; instead of words of impatience he prayed and sung psalms; instead of thoughts and words of vengeance he would not so much as escape from the prison, of which God himself had opened the doors, until he had saved the life of the jailer who had so much injured him, and led his soul to Christ.

Who can fail to see that self consideration, though it might behave a child of God under the Old Testament, is quite incompatible with following Christ under the New Testament! Reader, what is your standard? That of the Old Testament? Then claim no more to be a follower of Christ. Are you saying, "Well, I don't see why a man shouldn't stand up for his rights, I cannot be trodden on." Very well, maintain your ground, but don't do it under the name of Christ, don't assume to do it as a Christian. Do you say, "I see no harm in smoking, in personal adornment, in novels, in dancing," etc. Well, if you take that ground in common with worldlings, hold it, but do not do it under the name of Christ, for the "no harm" religion is not the following of Christ. On the Lord Jesus taught the words which follow: "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's, the same shall save it." First, at the time of the calling of His twelve apostles (Matt. 10: 39); secondly, on the occasion mentioned in our subject, given also in Matt. 16: 25, and Luke 9: 24; thirdly, in those solemn words which follow the parable of the Gospel feast, when He said that he who did not hate his own life, bear his cross, come after Him and forsake all that he had could not be His disciple (Luke 14: 26, 27, 33); fourthly, in connection with His coming again (Luke 17: 33); and lastly, in response to Philip and Andrew's message that there were some Greeks who would see Jesus (John 12: 25). "Thou canst not see my face and live," said Jehovah to Moses (Ex. 33: 20), we must die to self, and be crucified with Christ if we would see Jesus.

Now if we renounce our own rights in favor of Jesus and die to our own self interest what do we gain? We win Christ. If, on the contrary, we seek our own and sacrifice God's interest to ours, what do we gain? This is the question which the Lord went on to ask, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Perhaps Solomon was more in a position to answer this question than almost any other man; he says: "Whatsoever mine eyes desired, I kept not from them, I withheld not my heart from any joy; for my heart rejoiced in all my labor; and this was my portion of all my labor. Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labor that I had labored to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was

NO PROFIT UNDER THE SUN.

... For what hath man of all his labor, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath labored under the sun?" (Eccl. 2: 10, 11, 22.) If "Solomon in all his glory" found "no profit under the sun," when all kinds of things earthly were at his disposal; if after having put them to the test he found them to be vanity and vexation of spirit, "what can the man do that cometh after the king?" O how constantly has it been proved that they who have the most of this world are the most miserable and dissatisfied of people!

God has created us with capabilities for communion and fellowship with Him, the void of our nature can be filled with nothing less than God, and the miserable attempt to satisfy the immortal with that which is temporal, issues only in the loss of our ill-used souls. O what an unspeakable loss is the loss of the soul, the casting away and neglecting that being which is capable of union with God, and which can never die! A lost fortune leaves its former possessor still possessed with life and faculties, a lost reputation leaves nevertheless possibilities of hope, but a lost soul!

IRREPARABLE LOSS!

To lose his soul or life a man loses, sells, exchanges himself, and for what? Only corruption. What amount of so-called pleasure, what height of earthly honor, what measure of the world's riches will compensate for the loss of a soul? And yet how fearfully little we think about the state of those who are hurrying on to perdition! "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" When once lost how regain it, what give to bring it back? If a man dies in the attempt to grasp all that the world can give him, what shall or can he give to recover that life? If a man exchanges his immortal soul for the miserable things of time, who shall restore to him his forfeited soul?

"Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when He cometh in the glory of His Father with the holy angels." How many there are who are ashamed of Jesus and of His words when they are brought into company with unbelievers and worldlings! How many make an apology for any recognition of God which they make, as though to excuse themselves for intruding the name of God into His world which these worldlings have usurped! How many there are who are shocked at the mention of God, as though an impropriety had been committed! Believers fall under this God-dishonoring influence, and lest they should lose ground with such friends are content to keep silence. But this saving their own life, this fear of censure, this unholy consideration for others, this fear of being called uncharitable, is called in the Bible being ashamed of Christ and His words. It is letting self reign and dominate instead of losing our own life.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President Signed the Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill on Monday, May 8th. This long-disputed measure is now law, and its effects, good or ill as they may be, will soon be apparent. Under the new law no more Chinamen can come by sea to the United States for ten years, though the statesmen who framed the measure, with a curious lack of sagacity, omitted to provide explicitly against their coming across the Canadian frontier—an omission that may eventually lead to complications with the British Chinamen. Certificates of identity will be furnished to Chinamen already in the country, and penalties provided for the offence of forging or transferring such certificates; but it is probable that the difficulty of identifying the Celestials, whose faces to the ordinary observer all seem very much alike, and the manual skill they display in copying writing, will enable them to evade the law to some extent, and will lead to perplexing disputes.

The Senate Passed the Tariff Commission Bill on Tuesday, May 9th, by a vote of 35 to 19. Six Democrats voted with the Republicans in favor of the bill, and two Republicans and Senator Davis, of Illinois, Independent, voted with the Democrats against the bill. Petitions are now pouring in on the President in favor of gentlemen eligible for seats on the commission. The President's decision on the composition of the commission is expected with some anxiety, though it is generally expected that if the members are not strict party men the result will be that one or more minority reports will be presented, and Congress will have to deal with the subject on its merits and without regard to the report of the commission. In any case, however, a definite delay is secured; the people will continue to pay the heavy tariff rates and another large surplus will accumulate for those who want appropriations to prey upon.

The House of Representatives Received on Thursday, May 11th, from its Committee on Education and Labor, the bill to extend aid to the common schools. It provides that for the next five years there shall be annually appropriated the sum of $10,000,000 to aid in the support of free common schools, which amount shall be known as the common-school fund, and which shall be apportioned to the several States and Territories according to the number of their illiterate population over ten years of age. An amount not exceeding five per cent of the sum apportioned may be used for the education of teachers in public schools.

The Examination of Senator Blair in Reference to his connection with the Peruvian business has not rendered that perplexing matter any more comprehensible. The senator admitted having accepted a retainer from Mr. Shipherd, which he returned when the matter seemed likely to be investigated by Congress. The services rendered by the senator in return for the fee seem to have been chiefly of a character designed to influence the State Department, and to have derived their principal value from the friendship existing between the senator and the secretary. Senator Blair refused to produce his correspondence with Mr. Shipherd, contending that the correspondence was, as between counsel and client, privileged, and confidential. It is unfortunate that a frank and open explanation of this very remarkable affair is not given either by Mr. Blaine or Senator Blair. The public is unwilling to accept Mr. Shipherd's version, reflecting as it does so seriously on men of eminence. But when explanations were requested of the secretary, who might naturally have been expected to be anxious to vindicate himself, he lost his temper and abused his questioner and his accuser; and when the senator was examined he pleaded counsel's privilege. It is time we knew whether this country in dealing with two friendly nations in their unhappy quarrel, acted uprightly and fairly, or attempted to take a mean and dishonorable advantage of their weakness.

Secretary Robert Lincoln's Energy in Forwarding relief to the distressed sufferers by the Mississippi floods is making a name once hated through the Southern States a very popular one there. The Herald, of Vicksburg, Miss., says: "He has let no opportunity pass to show the Southern people kindness. He has worked side by side with the Southern Governors for the relief of the overflow sufferers, and we are sure Robert T. Lincoln has been praised oftener since he has been at the head of the War Department by Southerners than by Northerners. His thoughtful kindness and his attention to the details, are proof that his heart was in the work. The Southern people are impulsive, warm-hearted, and extremely grateful, and we are correctly expressing their sentiment for the Secretary of War."

The Sunday Closing Law in Cincinnati is effecting a marked change in the observance of the day in that city. In a letter written by one of the citizens, the statement is made that "the law and order people saw on Sunday, May 7th, their greatest triumph for a generation." The announcement of the mayor that every saloon-keeper whose place was found open would be arrested on sight and no bail allowed, was a great fright to the saloon-keepers, and actually prevented the entire three thousand, with two exceptions, from opening their doors. The two who defied the mayor were promptly arrested. The result was a remarkably quiet Sunday. The police stations have not been so free of prisoners on Sunday night within the memory of the present officers as they were on May 7th. A remarkable feature of the day was the very general approbation with which the reform was received. People from whom the law and order party had no reason to expect the slightest sympathy said that the improvement was remarkable, and they hoped it would continue.

Prohibition is Taking Root in Missouri, if the statement contained in the call for a convention, recently issued, is not the product of the over sanguine advocates of the movement. The framers of the call say: "The growth of the prohibition sentiment in this State since our last convention has been absolutely marvellous, and the Executive Committee has no doubt of ultimate success in the near future, if we but put forth the proper effort."

An Appeal Issued by the Young Women's Christian Association of New York, is likely to meet with a prompt response when the circumstances are published, as requested, by the press. Its object is to assist young women who are dependent upon their own exertions for support, and who are striving to become self-supporting. Thousands of such young women avail themselves of the varied kindnesses which the association offers to them. A few statistics drawn from the report for 1881 describe the methods of work. Out of 1700 applicants at the employment bureau nearly 1200 secured positions. The industrial department gave out sewing to the number of nearly 2200 garments, paying remunerative prices to over 100 seamstresses, and instructed 62 girls in na-chine and hand sewing. The board directory assisted 335 young women in finding safe, comfortable homes, and 225 women in securing boarders. In the free educational classes about 300 young women between the ages of 18 and 35 years have been instructed during the season, of whom about 150 have been fitted for lucrative positions. The association has a free circulating library of over 6000 volumes, and a reading room open day and evening to all who will avail themselves of its privileges. The annual cost of the work is seven thousand dollars, and the committee have a guaranteed income of only two thousand. They need $5000, and invite contributions from those who appreciate the importance of helping friendless girls to resist the temptations of a great city.

The American Bible Society Held its Sixty-sixth annual meeting on May 11th. The annual report states that during the past year the American Bible Society has issued, for use in this country alone, 353,454 Bibles and 649,984 copies of the New Testament, besides separate portions of the Bible. In the last forty years it has issued 12,856 Bibles for the blind. To the immigrants landing at this port during the year have been given 73,740 Bibles and Testaments—in German, 32,051; Swedish, 17,173; Danish, 13,121; English, 8717; Italian, 1025; French, 726; Welsh, 435; Bohemian, 160; Dutch, 101; Flemish, 75; Hungarian, 57; Polish, 33; Russian, 26; Spanish, 22; Slavic, 18. In addition to this, 27,355 Testaments in various languages were placed on outgoing vessels, to be given to steerage passengers while on their way to this country, making the total distribution to immigrants 101,095 copies of Scripture.

A Gigantic Undertaking is Contemplated by the American Bible Society for this year. The directors announce that the Society is about to prosecute the fourth general supply of the United States with the Scriptures. The greatness of this undertaking can hardly be overestimated, as it involves visiting fifty-two millions of people, scattered over an immense country, where the wisest plans which may be devised can be made successful only by the united efforts of all who love the Bible and desire that it should have its appropriate place in every home in the land. The managers enter upon a work of such magnitude because "they have implicit confidence that the friends of the society will not only give them their hearty co-operation, but also supply the necessary funds. It is their purpose to make this general supply more thorough and complete than any which has preceded it."

A Blessed Revival is Reported from Burlington, Iowa. A Christian journal reports that there have been more than two hundred converts, and inquirers are multiplying. Rev. Dr. Spinney, pastor of the First Baptist Church, is holding meetings nightly, assisted by Rev. O. L. Leonani. The interest is spreading all over the city. Prayer-meetings have been started in the public schools, and recently in one school-room there were seventy-nine scholars assembled at the noon-day hour, presided over by one of their number.

Prayer answered after Nine Years.—At the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting last week, a gentleman returned thanks for prayer answered in the case of his son, in whose behalf he first asked prayer nine years ago. Three years ago this son seemed to be leaning toward scepticism; but he has seen his folly and has turned to the Lord. He expresses himself as convinced that he was led astray by Satan, and now he says he has come back to the cross.

Temperance Testimony from a Penitentiary.—The opinions of convicts may not as a rule be regarded as entitled to peculiar attention, but when the subject of the origin and promotion of crime is in question they can certainly claim to speak with authority. The new liquor law of Ohio was explained on Sunday, May 7th, to the congregation assembled in the chapel attached to the penitentiary at Columbus, which consisted of 1500 persons, mostly prisoners. The prisoners were then asked to give an expression of their views with regard to the necessity for such laws. At once over a thousand right hands were held up, showing their approval of the new laws.

A Romantic Wedding was Solemnized at cranton, Pa., on May 6th. A young man three days previously received a letter from New York announcing the arrival there of a young lady from England whom he despaired of ever seeing again. He promptly journeyed to New York, and taking her with him to Scranton, they were married the same evening. The young man came to this country about a year ago, leaving his betrothed behind him in England. There she was urged to abandon him for a richer suitor. To escape the importunities of worldly friends, she collected all she had, which was only just sufficient to pay her passage across the Atlantic, and landed at Castle Garden almost penniless. But she wrote to Scranton and her necessities were soon relieved. The risk of finding the lover unfaithful or averse to marriage, would have deterred many girls from undertaking such an enterprise, but in this case the girl knew her lover's character and felt she could safely trust in him. If anxious souls could be brought to exercise a like faith in Jesus, safety for the voyage of their life and their happiness through eternity would be assured (2 Timothy 1 : 12).

A Tramp's Offer of Fifty Cents at his Own auction caused some amusement at Richmond, Ky., two weeks ago. The circumstances are narrated by a local journal. "A crowd gathered in front of the court house where the services for one ear of a stout active young man who had been convicted of vagrancy were offered to the highest bidder. Whether there was a doubt prevalent as to his ability or industry is not stated, but for some cause or other the auctioneer was unable to obtain a higher bid than forty-five cents. When the tramp saw that he was about to be knocked down for that sum, he offered fifty cents himself. But his bid stimulated others, and he was finally sold for one dollar to Mr. William J. Collins, who intends to set him to railroad work. The tramp's estimate of his own value, as indicated by his bid, was probably based on his capability to pay, not on his opinion of his own worth. Few men compute their value so low a figure, though many are willing to sacrifice body and soul in the service of Satan, whose variable wages are death and destruction (2 Cor. 1 : 14, 15).

A Wife's Signature on a Letter she Sent to her husband caused an amusing difficulty in Cincinnati, O., recently. The husband usually called her by a fond name implying his deep love for her, and the wife, cherishing this indication of his affection, so signed a certain letter she sent from her home in Boston to her husband, who was staying in Cincinnati. The pet name bore no resemblance to her real name, but the husband's knowledge of his wife was too intimate for him to doubt who had sent the letter. Some business, however, connected with the transmission of money, rendered it necessary for the husband to produce his wife's signature, for the satisfaction of the post-office clerks. He found then that although he was certain that his wife had written the letter, the clerks were unable to identify the signature as being that of the lady whose formal name they had on their books. A similar difficulty occurs sometimes when answers to prayer are discussed with unbelievers, who call them coincidences, though the Christian is well assured to whom he is indebted for the coincidence (Psa. 34 : 4-6).

A Hundred Dollar Bill Concealed Twenty years ago was recovered recently by the man who hid it. The Gazette, of Little Rock, Ark., says that a few days ago a poor old man was observed wandering about the corridors of the old State House, examining the walls very minutely. He conducted his search with considerable patience, and though no one could understand what the old fellow could find to interest him in the masonry, nothing was said to him. At last he was observed to insert his knife in one of the cracks in the wall, and presently, after much effort, he brought out a piece of paper, which, being unrolled, proved to be a hundred dollar bill. It seems that during the war, when General Steele was commander of the post at Little Rock, a Missourian named Robert H. Crowley, of Price's command, was made prisoner of war, and confined temporarily in the State House. From there Crowley was taken to Camp Chase, where he remained until the close of the war. When taken prisoner he had on his person the one hundred dollar note, and fearing it would be taken from him, he took the opportunity while waiting in the State House, to roll it up and push it into this crack in the wall, where it lay undiscovered for twenty years. The events of his imprisonment and the absorbing occupations that followed his release caused the incident to pass from the old man's mind, but a short time ago it was recalled to his mind when he was pressed for money. He then resolved to visit the State House at Little Rock, and look for the bill. It is probable that he would have remembered it earlier had he been in dire poverty. It was with him as it is with many people in the concerns of the soul, the hidden treasure of promise is unsought until a time of trouble comes (Hos. 13 : 6).

A Scripture Text Quilt of an Original Design has recently been completed by a lady residing in Pittsburg, Pa. The quilt, which is considered quite a curiosity, has a foundation of white linen, each block or square has worked upon it a complete Scripture text in cross-stitch with scarlet thread, headed with a capital letter and surrounded with an ornamental border. No two of the squares are alike. The whole of the fifty-first Psalm is in the centre, followed by many familiar and precious passages. The quilt has been the work of years, and the lady who has had the patience to complete it is encouraged by the hope that the eighty-one texts which are embroidered there may some day give consolation and, in a silent way, do good to some weary soul.

Locomotives Running Wild Caused a Singular series of collisions at Hartford, Conn., on May 11th. The Hartford correspondent of the New York Times, in the course of a communication to that journal, describes the occurrence. A switch engine coming from East Hartford came across the Connecticut River bridge just as a freight train was passing over the main track from a siding. The engineer and fireman of the switch engine, fearing a collision, jumped off their engine, which struck the freight engine, throwing it partially from the rails, and then ran wild about two miles, entering the yard, where it came in collision with another engine, just detached from a passenger train, tearing off the tender of the passenger engine and throwing out the engineer, leaving it also to run wild to the engine house, where it ran into another engine. The switch engine, which ran in without a driver, was badly smashed, and keeled over on its side. The other engines were somewhat injured. Happily no lives were lost, though several of the railroad employees were injured. These machines, useful as they are under intelligent guidance, become instruments of destruction without it. But even they are not more destructive to themselves and others than are human beings without Divine guidance (Jer. 10 : 23).

A Bondsman's Fidelity to his Trust is Described in a Boston Journal. A gentleman in Norfolk County, Mass., who managed a considerable amount of trust property, became insane, and his affairs were found in a very bad condition. As guardian for some minor children whose entire property was in his hands, he failed to account for the money intrusted to him, and the sureties on his bond, one of whom was Rev. George A. Thayer, were called upon to make up the deficit. The co-surety with Mr. Thayer went into bankruptcy, and thus his amount of the claim was voided, but Mr. Thayer, on receiving his notice from the lawyer, immediately surrendered every dollar he had, and pledged himself to make good the full amount of the bond, although in so doing he well knew that it would require all his salary except what the necessities of life actually demanded. This promise he fulfilled, and the children have not suffered the loss of a cent of the money misappropriated. The fulfilment of the obligations incurred through the misconduct of another thus involved the bondsman in the loss of the fruits of his labor, and was a case of cruel hardship. Every one must sympathize with him, but how few appreciate the sacrifice made by the Great Surety of the human race in voluntarily laying down His life for them (Isa. 53 : 5).

"AT THY WORD."

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Simon answering said unto Him, Master, we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing : nevertheless at Thy word I will let down the net."—Luke 5 : 5.

Peter's Appeal to a Grand Principle—A Motto and a Rule—I. For the Affairs of Ordinary Life—A Long Financial Darkness—The Misery of the Unemployed—Disappointments of Life—In Business—In Training Children—Christ has no Need of Cowards—II. In Spiritual Profiting—Those Hoping to Find Salvation—In Importunate Prayer—In Striving After Holiness—III. In Our Life Business—The Warrant for Preaching—Those who Never Let Down the Net—Peter's Disappointment—No Real Revival Since Pentecost—Peter Overcame his Love of Ease—His Reason—A Personal Letting Down—Immediate Action—A Directory of Service.

How very much may simple obedience partake of the sublime ! Peter went to catch up the net, and let it down into the sea, and he said as naturally as possible, "At Thy word I will let down the net ;" but he was there and then appealing to one of the grandest principles which rules among intelligent beings, and to the strongest force which sways the universe : "At Thy word." Acting in conformity with the word of our Lord we feel ourselves to be in order with all the forces of the universe, travelling on the main track of all real existence. Is not this a sublime condition, even though it be seen in the common deeds of everyday life ?

It is wonderful to think of the fisherman of Galilee letting down his net in perfect consonance with all the arrangements of the ages. His net obeys the law which regulates the spheres. His hand consciously does what Arcturus and Orion are doing without thought. This little bell on the Galilean lake rings out in harmony with the everlasting chimes. "At Thy word," saith Peter, as he promptly obeys, therein repeating the watchword of seas and stars, of winds and worlds. It is glorious thus to be keeping step with the marchings of the armies of the King of kings.

God, who sees a world in a drop, sees wonders in the smallest act of faith. Do not, I pray you, think that sublimity lies in masses, to be measured by a scale, so that a mile shall be sublime and an inch shall be absurd. We measure not morals and spirituals by rods and chains. The common act of fishing at Christ's word links Peter with all the principalities, and powers, and forces which in all ages have known this as their only law—"He spake, and it was done He commanded, and it stood fast." We too shall have if we know how to be perfectly obedient to the word of the Lord.

This ought to be the rule of all Christians for the whole of their lives—"At Thy word." This should direct us in the church and in the world ; it should guide us in our spiritual beliefs and in our secular acts, "At Thy word." I wish it were so. We hear boastings that the Bible, and the Bible alone, is the religion of Protestants. It is a mere boast. Few Protestants can honestly repeat the assertion. They have other books to which they pay deference, and other rules, and other guides, beyond, and above, and even in opposition to, the one Word of God. It ought not to be so. The power of the church and the power of the individual to please God shall never be fully known till we get back to the simple yet sublime rule of our text, "At Thy word."

I am just going to hammer upon that phrase this morning as God shall help me : "At Thy word." This rule has many applications. First, I shall somewhat repeat myself by saying that it ought to apply to the affairs of ordinary life ; secondly, it should apply to matters of spiritual profiting ; and thirdly, and here I shall enlarge, it ought to find its chief application in our great life business, which is being fishers of men.

I. "At Thy word" should apply to all

THE AFFAIRS OF ORDINARY LIFE.

I mean, first, as to continuance in honest industry. "Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called." Many a man in the present trying crisis is half ready to throw up his work, and run away from his business, because he has toiled all night and taken nothing. Truly, the financial darkness has lasted long, and does not yet yield to the dawning, but yet Christians must not murmur or leave their posts. Oh tried ones, continue to be diligent in your business, still provide things honest in the sight of all men. Labor on in hope. Say just as Peter did, "Nevertheless at Thy word I will let down the net." "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it:" you know that truth full well; know this also, that the Lord will not forsake His people.

Your best endeavors will not of themselves bring you prosperity; still, do not relax those endeavors. As God's word to you is to quit yourselves like men, and be strong, gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and stand fast. Throw not away your shield, cast not away your confidence, but stand steadily in your rank till the tide of battle turns. God has placed you where you are, move not till His providence calls you. Do not run before the cloud. Take down the shutters to-morrow morning, and display your goods, and let not despondency drive you to anything that is rash or unseemly. Say, "Nevertheless at Thy word I will let down the net."

If I am speaking to

just now, searching for some place where they can provide bread for themselves and for their families, as is their duty, let them hear, and ponder. If any man does not do his best to provide for his own household he comes not under a Gospel blessing, but he is said to be worse than a heathen man and a publican—it is the duty of us all to labor with our hands that which is good, that we may have to give to the needy as well as to those dependent on us. If after having gone about this city till your feet are blistered you can find nothing to do, do not sit at home next Monday sulkily saying, "I will not try again." Apply my text to this painful trial, and yet again sally forth in hope, saying with Peter, "We have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing; nevertheless at Thy word I will let down the net."

Let men see that a Christian is not readily driven to despair: nay, let them see that when the yoke is made more heavy the Lord has a secret way of strengthening the backs of His children to bear their burdens. If the Holy Spirit shall make you calmly resolute you will honor God much more by your happy perseverance than the talkative by his fine speeches, or the formalist by his outward show. Common life is the true place in which to prove the truth of godliness and bring glory to God. Not by doing extraordinary works, but by the piety of ordinary life is the Christian known and his religion honored. At God's word hold on even to the end. "Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed."

It may be, too, that you have been endeavoring in your daily life to acquire skill in your business, and you have not succeeded, or you have tried to acquire more knowledge, so that you could better fulfil your vocation, but hitherto you have not prospered as you could wish. Do not, therefore, cease from your efforts. Christians must never be idlers. Our Lord Jesus would never have it said that His disciples are a sort of cowards who, if they do not succeed the first time, will never try again. We are to be patterns of all the moral virtues as well as of the spiritual graces; therefore, at the bidding of the Lord, work on with mind and hand, and look to Him for the blessing. "At His word" let down the net once more; He may intend largely to bless you when by trial you have been prepared to bear the benediction.

This will apply very closely to those who are laboring hard in the training of children. It may be that with your own children you may not have succeeded yet; the boy's spirit may still be wild and proud, and the girl may not yet have yielded to obedience and submission. Or you may be working in the Sunday-school, or in the day-school, trying to impart knowledge, and to fashion the youthful mind aright, and you may have been baffled; but if it is your business to teach, do not be overcome. Stand to your work as though you heard Jesus say, "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as unto the Lord, and not unto men." Earnestly, then, at His word again let down the net.

I counsel you, dear friends, in everything to which you set your hands, if it be a good thing, do it with all your might; and if it be not a good thing, have nothing to do with it. It may be possible that you are called to teach the age some moral truth. In most generations individuals have been called to carry out reforms, and to promote progress. You are bound to love your neighbor as yourself, therefore as you have opportunity do good unto all men. If you have tried, and hitherto have not won a hearing, do not give up your point if it is a good thing, and you are a Christian man; never let it be said that you were afraid or ashamed.

I admire in Palissy the potter, not only his Christianity, which could not be overcome by persecution, but his perseverance in his own business of making pottery. His last farthing and his last breath would have gone in discovering a glaze, or bringing out a color. I love to see such men believers. I should not like to see our Lord followed by a set of cowards who could not fight the common battles of life; how should such as these become worthy of the lordlier chivalry which wrestles with spiritual wickedness in high places? It is for us to be bravest among the brave in the plains of common life, that when we are summoned to higher fields, where still greater deeds are needed, we may go there trained for the higher service.

It is evident to me that the Lord intends that our faith should not be penned up in a pew, but should walk the shop, and be seen in every walk of life. The great principle of my text fell from the lips of a working-man, and to the working-man I return it; it was connected with a net and a boat, the implements of his labor, and with these common things I would link it; and I would say to all who serve the Lord, in this present evil world—in the name of God, if you have anything to do, be not so desponding and despairing as to cease from it, but, according to His word, once more go forward in your honest endeavors, and, like Peter, say, "I will let down the net." This may prove a word in season to some who are weary of the hardness of the times. I shall rejoice if it nerves an arm or cheers a heart. Have faith in God, my tried brethren. "Be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

II. In matters of spiritual profiting we must at the word of Christ let down the net again. I put this, first, to those who have been up to this Tabernacle a great many times, heartily, if I am to believe them.

HOPING TO FIND SALVATION.

You have prayed before the sermon began that the Lord would really bless the sermon to you. Now, mark, I do not understand you at all; I cannot make you out; because the way of salvation is open to you at this very moment, and it is "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." You have nothing to wait for, and all your waiting is sinful. If you say you are waiting for the stirring of the pool, I tell you there is no pool to be stirred, and no angel to stir it. That pool was dried up long ago, and angels never go that way now. Our Lord Jesus Christ shut up Bethesda when He came, and said to the man lying there, "Rise, take up thy bed, and walk." That is what He says to you. You have no business waiting; but as you are, and are here this morning, I would earnestly invite you at the word of Christ, who has hidden us preach the Gospel to every creature—"believe and live." Let down the net once more, and let it down this way; say, "My Lord, I believe; help Thou mine unbelief."

But I will now speak to others present, who have been letting down their nets, in vain, perhaps, in the form of importunate prayer. Have you been praying for the conversion of a relative, or pleading for some other good thing which you believe to be according to the will of God, and after long pleading—pleading in the night, for your spirit has been sad—are you tempted never to offer that petition any more? Now then, at Christ's word, who said that men ought always to pray and not to faint—at Christ's word, who says, "Pray without ceasing," let down the net, and pray again. Not because the circumstances which surround you are more favorable, but simply because Jesus bids you, continue in prayer; and who knows but that this very time you will meet with success!

Or have you been searching the Scriptures to find a promise which will suit your case. Do you want to get hold of some good word from God that will cheer you? Shoals of such fish are around your boat; the sea of Scripture is full of them; fish of promise, I mean, but, alas! you cannot catch one of them. Nevertheless, try again. Go home this afternoon, and search the Scriptures again with prayer, and beseech the Holy Spirit to apply a precious portion to your heart, that you may by faith enjoy the sweetness of it; and who knows but you shall this very day obtain your desire, and receive a larger blessing than your mind can fully contain, so that in your case also the net shall break through the fulness of the favor.

Or it may be you have been laboring a long while after some holy attainment; you want to conquer a besetting sin, to exercise firmer faith, to exhibit more zeal, and to be more useful, but you have not yet gained your desire. Now, then since it is the Lord's mind that you should be "perfect in every good work to do His will" do not cease from your purpose, but at His word let down your net again. Never despair. That temper of yours will be conquered yet; that unbelief of yours will give way to holy faith. Let down the net, and all the graces may yet be taken in it, to be yours for the rest of your life. Only at Christ's word still labor for the best things, and He will give them to you.

Or are you seeking just now the closer presence of Christ, and a nearer fellowship with Him? Are you yearning after a sight of His face—that face which doth outshine the morning? Do you wish to be brought into His banqueting-house to be satiated with His love? And have you cried in vain? Then cry once more, "at His word," for He bids you come to Him; His loving voice invites you to draw near. At His word press forward once again, let down the net once more, and joys await you unspeakable, surpassing all you have hitherto experienced.

III. The great principle of our text should be applied to

OUR LIFE-BUSINESS.

And what is the life-business of every Christian here? Is it not soul-winning? That we may glorify God by the bringing of others to the faith of Christ is the great object of our remaining here on earth; otherwise we should have been caught up to swell the harmony of the heavenly song. It is expedient for many wandering sheep here below that we should tarry here till we have brought them home to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls.

Our way of winning men for Christ, or, to use His own metaphor, our method of catching men, is by letting down the net of the Gospel. We have learned no other way of holy fishery. Men with great zeal and little knowledge are inventing ingenious methods for catching men, but for my part I believe in nothing but letting down the Gospel net, by telling out the story of the love of God to men in Christ Jesus. No new Gospel has been committed to us by Jesus, and He has authorized no new way of making it known.

Our Lord has called all of us to the work of proclaiming free pardon through His blood to all who believe in Him. Each believer has a warrant to seek the conversion of his fellows. May not every man seek to save his brother from the burning? Must not Jesus smile on any man's endeavor to deliver his neighbor from going down to eternal death? Has he not said, "Let him that heareth say, Come?" Whosoever hears the Gospel is to invite others to come to Christ.

"Oh, but," they say, "you ought to advance to something higher than the mere elementary doctrine of grace, and give the people something more in keeping with the progress of the period." We shall not do so while Jesus bids us go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. If we do what He bids us the responsibility of the matter rests no longer with us. Whatever comes of it we are clear if we have obeyed orders. A servant is not to justify his master's message, but to deliver it. This makes it a joy to preach, this doing it "at Thy word." Our business is to do what Christ tells us, as Christ tells us, and to do this again and again, so long as we have breath in our bodies. The commanding word cries ever to us, "Preach the Gospel, preach the Gospel to every creature!" Our justification for setting forth Christ crucified, and incessantly bidding men believe and live, lies in that same word which bade Peter walk the sea, and bade Moses fetch water out of a rock.

The result of this preaching will justify Him who commanded it. No man at the last will be able to say to the Saviour, "You set your servants an impossible task, and you gave them an instrument to wield which was not at all adapted to produce its end." No, but at the closing up of all things it shall be seen that for the salvation of the elect there was nothing better than a crucified Saviour, and to make that crucified Saviour known there was no better means than of His word by honest lips in the power of the Spirit of the Lord.

Brethren, you that teach in the school, or you that preach from the pulpit, or distribute tracts, or speak personally to individuals, you need not be afraid but what wisdom will exonerate herself from all charges, and vindicate her own methods. You may be called a fool to-day for preaching the Gospel, but that accusation, like rust on a sword, will wear off as you use the weapon in the wars of the Lord. The preaching of the word soon puts down all clamors against itself; those clamors mainly arise because it is not preached. No one calls the Gospel effete where it is smiting right and left like a great two-handed sword. Our reply to the outcry about the failure of the pulpit is to get into it and preach with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven.

What shall I say to any of my fellow-Christians who profess to be called of God, and to be Christ's disciples, and yet never do let down the net? Is it so that you are doing nothing for the truth? that you never disseminate the Gospel? Is it so that you call yourselves lights of the world, and yet never shine? that you are sowers of the seed, and yet forget that you have a seed-basket? Am I addressing any members of this church who are in this respect wasting their lives? Are you mocking God by a fruitless profession which you never try to make fruitful? I have not the strength with which to condemn you, but I would to God your own conscience might fulfil that office.

This great London of ours is growing heathenish to the very core, and yet our Lord has given the Gospel into the hands of His churches; what can be the reason of the indifference of the godly? If we keep this Gospel to ourselves, verily coming ages will condemn us as cruel to our posterity. Succeeding generations will point to our era, and say, "What sort of men were these, that had the light, and shut it up in a dark lantern?" In a century to come, when others shall stand in this city, and walk these streets, they will say, "A curse upon the memory of the ministers and people who failed in their duty, who came to the kingdom in a solemn time, but never realized their calling, and so missed the end and object of their being!"

Now, brethren, this warrant from Christ is one which, if we be in the state of heart of Simon Peter, will be omnipotent with us this morning. It was very powerful with Simon Peter. For, observe, he was under the influence of a great disappointment, yet he let down the net. "We have toiled all the night." Some say, "We have had all this Gospel preaching, and nothing has come of it." When was that? I hear a good deal of this talk, but

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

"Oh," you say, "you know we have had a great deal of revival a little while ago." I do not know anything of the sort. We have had flashes of light here and there, but comparatively so little that it is a pity to make so much of it. Moreover, considering the little that has ever been done for it, the spread of the Gospel has been marvellous,

Look at Gospel-work at the present moment in India! People say that the Christian faith is not spreading. I say that it is spreading wonderfully as compared with the labor expended and the sacrifice made. If in that land you spend a penny and get a thousand pounds, you have no right to say, "What is that? We want a million." If your desires are thus exacting, prove their sincerity by corresponding action. Increase your outlay. The harvest is wonderful considering the little seed, but if you wish for more sheaves sow more. The Church has had an enormous return for what little she has done.

In England there have been partial revivals, but to what have they amounted? A flash of light has been seen in a certain district, but darkness has still remained supreme over the length and breadth of the country. The papers have reported a great work in a certain spot, but if the papers had reported the places wherein there has been no revival we should have had a different view of things! A little corner at the top of a column would have sufficed for the good, and column after column would not have sufficed to make known the black side of the situation.

The fact is the Church has scarcely ever been in a state of universal revival since the day of Pentecost. There has been a partial moving among Christians every now and then, but the whole mass throughout has never burned and flamed with the earnestness which the grand cause demands. Oh that the Lord would set the whole Church on fire! We have no cause whatever for disappointment. In proportion to the little effort put out great things have come to us; therefore and say no more about the night in which we have toiled.

But next, this command in Peter overcame his love of ease. Evidently he was tired when he said, "We have toiled all the night." Fishing is hard work, especially when no fish are caught. It is natural to wish to be excused from further toil when you are already weary with unrewarded labor. I have heard some Christians say, "You know I had my time in the Sunday-school years ago, and then I used to work too much for my strength." No doubt their efforts were stupendous in the remote ages of their youthful zeal; we can hardly imagine what they must have been like, for no relic remains to assist our conceptions. At this time they feel authorized to take things easy, for they owe no more to their Lord, or at least they do not intend to pay any more.

Is it so that any one of us can cease from service when it is plain that we do not cease from receiving mercy at the Lord's hands? Are we not ashamed of the case when it is plainly put? "Take it easy." Yes, soon, very soon, we shall take it easy, for there will be rest enough in the grave. Just now, while souls of men are perishing, to relax our efforts is wickedness.

Moreover, the command of Christ was so supreme over Peter that he was not held back by carnal reason, for reason would say, "If you could not catch fish in the night you will certainly not do so in the day." Night was the special time for taking fish on the Gennesaret lake, and by day, when the garish sun was lighting up the waves, and letting the fish see every single mesh of the net, they were not likely to come into it; but when Christ commands, the most unlikely time is likely, and the most unpromising sphere becomes hopeful. No act is out of season when Christ commands it. If He says, "go," go at once, without deliberation. Say not "There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest." "The fields are white already to the harvest." Peter lets down the net at once, and wisely does he act at Christ's word.

The lesson to you and to me is this: Let us do as Peter did, and let down the net personally, for the apostle said, "I will let down the net." Brother, cannot you do something yourself with your own heart, lips, and hands? Sister, cannot you do something yourself with your own gentle spirit? "I was thinking about getting half a dozen friends to form a committee to relieve the poor around us." Nothing will ever come of it:

the poor will not get a basin of soup or a hunch of bread. Set about it yourself. "But I think I might get a dozen to come together, and organize a society." Yes, and then move resolutions and amendments all day long, and finish up with passing votes of mutual approbation. You had better as Peter did.

GET TO WORK YOURSELF

And you had better do it at once, for Peter immediately let down the net, as soon as ever he had launched out into the deep. You may never have another opportunity; your zeal may have evaporated, or your life may be over. If a church can be so awakened that each individual gets to work in the power of the Holy Spirit, and all the individuals combine, then how many souls will be captured for Jesus! Multitudes of souls are lost to the blessed Gospel because of our broken nets, and the net gets broken because we are not well united in the holy service, and by our unwisdom cause loss to our Master's cause. Ministers need not become worn out with labor if all would take their share; one boat would not begin to sink if the other boats took a part of the blessed load.

Now, brothers and sisters, I close by saying that if I have accomplished anything this morning by the help of God's Spirit, I hope I have made you ready to accept the following drawn from the text. The way in which to serve God is to do it at His word. I pray that none of us may sink into serving the Lord as a matter of routine. May we never fall to serving Him in our own strength. We must preach, teach, and labor in His name, because we hear Him bidding us do it. We must act at His word. If this were the case we should work with much more faith, with much more earnestness, and with much more likelihood of success.

It is a blessed thing to see Christ sitting in the boat while you cast out the net. If you catch a glimpse of His approving smile as He watches you, you will work heartily. We must labor in entire dependence upon Him, not preaching or teaching because in our judgment it is the right thing to do—Peter did not think so—but because Jesus gives the word, and His word is law. You may not work because you have any expectation of success from the excellence of your work, or from the nature of the people among whom you labor, but because Jesus has given you the word. You stand there doing a thing which critics sneer at as absurd, but you do it in all confidence, believing that it must be wise, because Jesus bids you do it.

I remember well how some of our brethren used to talk to us. They said, "You preach the Gospel to dead sinners; you bid them repent and believe. You might just as well shake a pocket-handkerchief over a grave and bid the corpse come out of it." Exactly so. They spoke the truth; but then I would delight to go and shake a pocket-handkerchief over graves and bid the dead live if Jesus bade me do so. I should expect to see the cemetery crack and heave from end to end if I were sent on such an errand by the Lord. I would accept the duty joyfully.

The more absurd the wise men of our age make the Gospel out to be, and the more they show that it is powerless to produce the end designed, the more will we persevere in our old method of preaching Jesus crucified. Our resolves are not to be shaken by that mode of reasoning. We never did draw our argument for preaching the Gospel from the work itself, but from the orders given us to do it, and we should rather be acting upon the responsibility of Christ than upon our own. I would rather be a fool and do what Christ tells me, than be the wisest man of the modern school, and despise the word of the Lord. I would rather lay the responsibility of my life at the feet of Him who bids me live according to His word than seek out an object in life for myself, and feel that the responsibility rested on my own shoulders. Let us be willing to be under orders to Christ, willing to persevere under difficulties, willing to begin anew in His service from this very hour. Amen.

The Scene of Rizzio's Murder.

HOLYROOD PALACE.

"THE Abbey of Holyrood, in Scotland," says the London Graphic, "preceded the Palace. It was erected by David I., King of Scotland, that 'sair sanct for the Croon,' as James VI. called him, when he found how much of the royal revenues of Scotland had been alienated to abbeys, and convents, and cathedrals. The tradition is that when David was hunting near the spot he was about to be transfixed on the antlers of a stag at bay when the apparition of the Holy Rood came in between and drove off the animal; and so the pious king endowed an abbey there to manifest his gratitude. The 'Canongate Arms'—a cross above a stag's head—commemorate the legend.

The old part of the palace was erected by James V., and contains Queen Mary's Rooms and the Picture Gallery, or Throne Room. In these apartments Mary was married to Darnley, and afterward to Bothwell. Here her favorite Rizzio was murdered as he clung for protection to her dress. Here she gave entertainments in the French fashion to her nobles, and captivated all hearts by her beauty and address. Here she encountered the one man, John Knox, whom she could never bend to her will by the fascinations of her person or speech, of whom Earl Morton said over his grave that he 'never feared the face of man,' and who said of himself, when asked if he was not afraid to speak so boldly to his Queen: "Why should the fair face of a gentlewoman fley me? I hae looked in the face o' mony angry men, and have not been fleyed abuv measour." Here the Young Pretender held his Court while the Castle was in possession of the Government, and here he returned in triumph after the Battle of Prestonpans. The Picture Gallery is now abandoned to the tourist, except when the Scottish nobles meet to elect representatives to the British House of Lords, and the Queen's High Commissioner to the General Assembly holds his quasi-state receptions.

The chapel is early Gothic, and the east window a fine example of the later and more ornate style. Charles I. was crowned King of Scotland in the chapel, and it was the scene of many other interesting scenes in Scottish history. But it fell into bad odor with the populace as a place which so late as the time of James VII. was identified with Roman Catholic worship, and it was wrecked by an Edinburgh mob at the Revolution. One of the most curious adjuncts of the Palace is the peculiar-looking old building known as Queen Mary's Bath-Room, where she is said to have enhanced her personal charms by alutions in milk and white wine. Queen Mary figures so largely in Scottish traditions that one requires to be a little sceptical of stories in which her name occurs. There is hardly a decent mansion in Scotland which does not boast a Queen 'Mary's Room.'

The following is a brief account of the circum-

THE TRAGEDY with which the "supper room" in Holyrood
Palace is associated:

Mary Queen of Scots.

Mary, not having been treated with candor and openness by the English Queen (Elizabeth), whose advice she had sought in regard to her marriage, now resolved that she would follow the dictates of her own heart, and marry as she thought fit. While agitated by such feelings, Mary saw the Lord Darnley, the eldest son of the Earl of Lennox, who, with his father, had lately returned to Scotland. This young nobleman could boast of a royal descent, his grandmother being a sister of Henry the Eighth, and he himself, next to Mary, the nearest heir to the English throne. He was now in his twenty-first year, and had not yet displayed that weak intellect and the low vices which betrayed themselves after his marriage. It was the misfortune of the Scottish Queen that she acted under impulses. She had been deceived by Elizabeth, and she determined to show that she could choose for herself. This ill-advised union had terrible consequences. Although the marriage to Darnley was sanctioned by a convention of her nobility held at Stirling, the event was none the less a blunder and a calamity. It gave great offence to the Scottish reformers, because the family of Lennox was believed to adhere to the Catholic faith; and though Darnley, who now bore the name of King Henry, went often to the Established Church he could not by this exterior compliance, gain the confidence and regard of the ecclesiastics.

At first Mary loaded her husband with benefits and honors, but when she had a closer view of his weakness and vices, she began to see the danger of her profuse liberality, and was resolved henceforth to proceed with more reserve and caution in the favors which she might extend to him. Noticing this marked change in her bearing toward him, his resentment expressed itself in forms which only increased her disgust. Enraged at her imagined neglect he vowed vengeance against every one whom he deemed to be concerned in the bringing about of the change.

There was in the Court at this time one David Rizzio, who had of late obtained an extraordinary degree of confidence and favor with the Queen of Scots. He was a Piedmontese, of humble birth, son of a teacher of music. Mary's secretary for French despatches having incurred her displeasure she promoted Rizzio to that office, which gave him frequent opportunities of approaching her person and insinuating himself into her favor. The favorite was of a disagreeable figure, but not past his youth; and though the opinion of his criminal correspondence with Mary might seem of itself unreasonable, if not absurd, a suspicious husband could find no other means of accounting for that lavish and imprudent kindness with which she honored him.

Rizzio, who had connected his interests with the Roman Catholics, was the declared enemy of the banished lords, and by promoting the violent prosecutions against them, he had exposed himself to the animosity of their numerous friends and retainers. Morton, the Chancellor, insinuating himself into Darnley's confidence, employed all his art to inflame the discontent and jealousy of that prince; and he persuaded him that the only means of freeing himself from the indignities under which he labored was to bring the stranger to the fate which he was supposed to merit. On March 9th, 1566, Mary was supping in private with Rizzio and others of her servants in the room depicted in our illustration. The King entered the room by a private passage, and stood at the back of Mary's chair. Lord Ruthven, George Douglas, and other conspirators, being all armed, rushed in after him; and the Queen of Scots, terrified at their appearance, demanded of them the reason of this rude intrusion. They told her that they intended no violence against her person but meant only to bring that villain, pointing to Rizzio, to his deserved punishment. Rizzio, aware of the danger, ran behind his mistress, and, seizing her by the waist, called aloud for her protection, while she interposed on his behalf with cries, menaces, and entreaties. The impatient assassins, regardless of her efforts, rushed upon their prey. Douglas, seizing Henry's dagger, thrust it in the body of Rizzio, who, screaming with fear and agony, was torn from Mary by the other conspirators, and pushed into the ante-chamber, where he was despatched with fifty-six wounds. The unhappy princess, informed of his fate, immediately said she would weep no more, but think now of revenge, as subsequent events proved she did, to some purpose.

MR. GRAHAM'S MATRIMONIAL SCHEME.

"It is for you to consider, Harry, but I think that is an offer many a young man would be glad to accept." So said Mr. Robert Graham, and Mr. Graham's opinion of a bargain was considered unerring in business circles. When Mr. Graham gave advice on a matter of business, which was seldom, it was almost always followed, and was always justified by results. As a rule, however, he kept his own counsel, and his register of real estate, his bank account, and the stocks he had in the safe deposit vaults proved that, as he was wont to say, he "knew a good thing when he saw it." He was a man of about sixty years of age, well preserved, carefully but plainly dressed, and with a general air about him of being comfortably endowed with the good things of life. When he thus commended an offer to Harry Fielding, Mr. Graham leaned back in his chair, rested his hands on the top of his stick and awaited a reply.

At Mr. Graham's last words Harry Fielding rose from his seat and with a face pale as death, and a gesture of entreaty, said, "You do not know what you ask, sir." It was a critical moment, and Harry was quite aware of the fact. All he had, his position in society, even his education he owed to Mr. Graham, who had been his friend and benefactor since that day, now twenty years ago, when he returned a poor friendless orphan from the cemetery where the people had buried both his parents. Then there seemed nothing before him but a life of hardship and bitter poverty. His father was a poor clergyman, who dying left little more than sufficient means to pay funeral expenses. But Harry was a bright intelligent boy, and Mr. Graham took a fancy to him. He sent the boy to school for a year and resolved that if Harry turned out well and "showed grit," he would do more for him. Harry's reports were uniformly good and his teacher's opinion coincided with that of Mr. Graham that if the boy were well trained there was "stuff in him to make a man." Mr. Graham had speculated in many things in his time, but having had no sons of his own, this experiment was novel to him. He persisted in regarding it as a speculation, though he did not define in his own mind the shape in which he expected the profit would accrue. But Harry was educated, and sent to a university, where he acquitted himself creditably. Then he was sent to Heidelberg, in Germany, to study, and after that to make a tour of Europe. Mr. Graham recommended to him two professions, either of which he was prepared to assist Harry to pursue. He might be either a lawyer or a physician. Harry had chosen the latter and returned to America to commence this special preparatory study.

It was during this period that Mr. Graham one morning paid him a visit in his comfortable quarters, and made the offer previously referred to. That offer was a brilliant one from a financial standpoint. Mr. Graham proposed to give him a large income and to make him his heir, on one condition. Among Mr. Graham's business acquaintances was a millionaire, the owner of a mine in Colorado, who had only recently made his appearance on the Atlantic coast. He had no education, was low and vulgar in his manner, but enormously rich. He had an only daughter, who inherited her father's tastes and disposition, and would inherit his wealth. Harry had already seen her and noticed, although he had not spoken to her, how coarse and vulgar, and ill-bred she was, and how trite and commonplace was her conversation. New to city life, she "adored the theatre," had been to all the horse races, and had never read a line since she left school except in novels. She never went to church, as her father did not go, and when she was once persuaded to go, much against her will, she said she had "heard enough of all that at boarding-school and did not want to go again."

In brief, Mr. Graham's proposal was that Harry should make Leonora's acquaintance, should become her suitor, and share her fortune. Then it was that Harry said to him, "You know not what you ask." There was something more than repugnance to the scheme in his mind. Harry was already in love, and the mere thought of unfaithfulness seemed to him like treason. His father had taken into his house the child of a distant relative, left an orphan while an infant, and the two children had been playmates until the clergyman's death. After that Harry had kept up an acquaintance with Addie, and had seen with delight that she grew up as good as she was beautiful. She had, while young, given her heart to Jesus, and it was through the instrumentality of her prayers and pleadings that Harry himself was converted. When he returned to America, the friendship, confined to letter-writing during his absence in Germany, was renewed with ardor on both sides. They had "taken sweet counsel together and walked to the house of God in company." Thus when Mr. Graham urged him to marry, for the sake of wealth, one with whose tastes he had nothing in common and desert one whom he tenderly loved, Harry Fielding refused, respectfully, but firmly. But Mr. Graham was not accustomed to being thwarted, and it was plain he was irritated by his protégé's manner and words. However, he had confidence in Harry's sense and shrewdness, so he refused to accept his rejection of the offer, and said Harry would think better of it in a day or two.

It was a terrible ordeal for Harry Fielding. Not that he wavered in his love for Addie. Had he done so, the vision of her gentle face as he saw it across the church the next day, where she sat with a poor little invalid child from her class in the Sunday-school nestling in her arms, would have recalled him to his allegiance. But he could not forget how much he owed to his benefactor, nor how deeply the old gentleman would be wounded by his apparent ingratitude. Harry was not ungrateful and almost any sacrifice but this one he would have made had Mr. Graham demanded it. But not this. He must be firm, and he had the mortification of being upbraided with ingratitude and of listening in pain to the old man's indignant remonstrances, which closed with the intimation that not another dollar would Harry receive from him.

It was over at last and Harry had time to recover from his pain. Then he set diligently to work to prepare for the approaching examination, which if he passed successfully would open the way for him to an honorable career. At last the momentous day came, and Harry saw with delight his name placed in the position of honor on the list of successful competitors. Several years passed in a hard struggle, but slowly though surely the name of Dr. Fielding was becoming famous in the city. Kind and attentive to the poor, his skill was talked of in fashionable circles and wealthy patients sought his services. Then he and Addie were married, and few men had a happier home, for it was a home in which love of God was the ruling motive, the guiding principle of life.

Never once during those years of conflict did he meet Mr. Graham, but when he was married, Harry went to call on the old gentleman to whom he owed so much. But he was repulsed, "Mr. Graham was busy and declined seeing him," said the servant, who answered Harry's ring. So they had never met. But one evening when after an arduous day among his patients, Dr. Fielding was resting at home he was summoned in haste, and to his surprise found that it was Mr. Graham who needed his services. The old man was very ill, and Harry saw at once that, though he might recover from the attack then on him, his days could not be many.

The meeting between the two was an affecting one. The old man was softened by illness, and in his loneliness craved the presence of some one beside the hired men and women around him. His thoughts turned to the boy he had befriended, and he was glad when he saw him at his bedside. After prescribing for Mr. Graham's present need Harry left, but next day, returning with his wife, he brought Addie to the sick-room and introduced her to the patient. She was a tender and devoted nurse, and when Mr. Graham slowly regained strength he said she had nursed him back to life, and begged piteously that she would not leave him again alone. It was finally settled that the doctor and his wife should remove to Mr. Graham's residence, and there they remained brightening and cheering the last years of the lonely old man. He was thankful then that his matrimonial scheme for Harry's benefit had collapsed; and when after many prayers and much pleading he began with trembling to trust in Christ for salvation, he humbly blessed God who had led him, by a path he knew not, into a haven of peace.

The Work at the Carmel Chapel in the Bowery, New York, has now been in progress ten years. At its anniversary last week Rev. John Dooley thus summarized its results: Since the work began in May, 1872, 7380 religious services have been held, with an average attendance of 61,000 each year. Over a thousand persons gave evidence of conversion. The place has been a resort for men in need and distress, 54,000 of whom have been aided, 9538 were provided with situations, 75,037 with lodgings, and to 775,560 meals have been furnished. In closing, Mr. Dooley stated that for ten years the Young Men's Christian Association and the Christian Work had been working harmoniously together. New premises have now been secured at 243 Bowery, where the Y. M. C. A. will conduct the services. The Carmel Chapel will also continue its work.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Haunting Memories.

FOR a few minutes Canon Pascal was lost in thought. If Felix was right in his apprehension, and the whole story came out in the police court, there were journals pandering to public curiosity that would gladly lay hold of any gossip or scandal connected with Mrs. Roland Sefton. Her name would ensure its publicity. And how could Felicity endure that, especially now that her health was affected? If the dread of disclosing her secret to him had wrought so powerfully upon her physical and mental constitution, what would she suffer if it became a nine days' talk for the world?

"I will get your rector to exchange curates with me till we can see our way clear," he said. "He is Alice's godfather, you know, and will do it willingly. I am going up to Westminster in November, and you will be here in my place, where everybody knows your face, and you know theirs. There will be no question here about your father, for you are looked upon as my son. Now go away, and find Alice."

When Felix turned out of Liverpool Street station that evening, a tall, gaunt-looking workman offered to carry his bag for him. It was filled with choice fruit from the rectory garden, grown on trees grafted and pruned by Canon Pascal's own hands; and Felix had helped Alice to gather it for some of his sick parishioners in the unwholesome dwelling-places he visited.

"I am going no farther than the Mansion House," he answered, "and I can carry it myself."

"You'd do me a kindness if you'd let me carry it," said the man.

It was not the tone of a common loafer, hanging about the station for any chance job, and Felix turned to look at him in the light of the gas. It was the old story, he thought to himself, a decent workman from the country, out of work, and lost in this great labyrinth of a city. He handed his bag to him, and walked on along the crowded thoroughfare, soon forgetting that he was treading the flagged streets of a city; he was back again, strolling through dewy fields in the cool twilight, with Alice beside him, accompanying him to the quiet little station. He thought no more of the stranger behind him, or of the bag he carried, until he hailed an omnibus travelling westward.

"Here is your bag, sir," said the man.

"Ah! I'd forgotten it," exclaimed Felix.

"Good night, and thank you."

He had just time to drop a shilling into his hand before the omnibus was off. But the man stood there in front of the Mansion House, motionless, with all the busy sea of life roaring around him, hearing nothing and seeing nothing. This coin that lay in his hand had been given to him by his son; his son's voice was still sounding in his ears. He had walked behind him taking note of his firm strong step, his upright carriage and manly bearing. It had been too swift a march for him, full of exquisite pain and pleasure, which chance might never offer to him again.

"Move on, will you," said a policeman authoritatively; and Jean Merle, rousing himself from his reverie, went back to his lonely attic.

Felicity was slowly recovering her strength at the seaside. She had never before felt so seriously shaken in health, as since she had known of the attachment of Felix to Alice Pascal; an attachment which would have been quite to her mind, if there was no loss of honor in allowing it while she held a secret which, in all probability, would seem an insuperable barrier in the eyes of Canon Pascal.

This secret she had kept resolutely in the background of her own memory, conscious of its existence, but never turning her eyes toward it. The fact that it was absolutely a secret, suspected by no one, made this more possible; for there was no gleam of cognizance in any eye meeting hers which could awaken even a momentary recollection of it. It seemed so certain that her husband was dead to every one but herself, that she came at last almost to believe that it was true.

And was it not most likely to be true? Through all these long years there had come no hint to her in any way that he was living. She had never seen or heard of any man lingering about the home where she and her children lived, all whom Roland loved, and loved so passionately. Certainly she had made no effort to discover whether he was yet alive; but though it would be well for her if he was dead—a cause of rest almost amounting to satisfaction—it was not likely that he would remain content with unbroken and complete ignorance of how she and her children were faring. If he had been living, surely he would have given her some sign.

There was a terrible duty now lying in her path. Before she could give her consent to Felix marrying Alice she must ascertain positively if her husband was dead. Should it be so her secret was safe, and would die with her. Nobody need ever know of this fraud, so successfully carried out. But if not? Then she knew in herself that her lips could never confess the sin in which she had shared; and nothing would remain for her to do but to oppose with all the energy and persistence possible the marriage either of her son or daughter. And she fully believed that neither of them would marry against her will.

Her health had not permitted her hitherto to make the exertion necessary for ascertaining this fact, on which her whole future depended—hers and her children's. The physician whom she had consulted in London had urged upon her the imperative necessity of avoiding all excitement and fatigue, and had ordered her down to this dull little village of Freshwater, where not even a brass band on the unfinished pier or the arrival of an excursion steamer could disturb or agitate her. She had nothing to do but to sit on the quiet downs, where no sound could startle her, and no spectacle flutter her, until the sea-breezes had brought back her usual tone of health.

How long this promised restoration was in coming! Phebe, who watched for it anxiously, saw but little sign of it. Felicity was more silent than ever, more withdrawn into herself, gazing for hours upon the changeful surface of the sea with absent eyes, through which the brain was not looking out. Neither sound nor sight reached the absorbed soul, that was wandering through some intricate mazes to which Phebe had no clue. But no color came to Felicity's pale face, and no light into her dim eyes. There was a painful and weird feeling often in Phebe's heart that Felicity herself was not there; only the fair, frail form, which was as insensible as a corpse, until the spirit came back to it. At such times Phebe was impelled to touch her, and speak to her, and call her back again, though it might be to irritability and displeasure.

"Phebe," said Felicity, one day when they sat on the cliff, so near the edge that nothing but the sea lay within the range of their sight, "how should you feel if, instead of helping a fellow-creature to save himself from drowning, you had thrust him back into the water, and left him, sure that he would perish?"

"But I cannot tell you how I should feel," answered Phebe, "because I could never do it. It makes me shudder to think of such a thing. No human being could do it."

"But if you had thrust the one fellow-creature nearest to you, the one who loved you the most," pursued Felicity, "into sin, down into a deeper gulf than he could have fallen into but for you—"

"My dear, my dear!" cried Phebe, interrupting her in a tone of the tenderest pity. "Oh! I know now what it is preying upon you. Because Felix loves Alice it has brought back all the sorrowful past to you, and you are letting it kill you. Listen! Let me speak this once, and then I will never speak again, if you wish it. Canon Pascal knows it all; I told him. And Felix knows it, and he loves you more than ever; you are dearer to him a hundred times than you were before. And he forgives his father—fully. God has cast his sin as a stone into the depths of the sea, to be remembered against him no more for ever!"

A slight flush crept over Felicity's pale face. It was a relief to her to learn that Canon Pascal and Felix knew so much of the truth. The darker secret must be hidden still in the depths of her heart until she found out whether she was altogether free from the chance of discovery.

"It was right they should know," she said in a low and dreamy tone; "and Canon Pascal makes no difficulty of it?"

"Canon Pascal said to me," answered Phebe, "that your noble life and the fame you had won atoned for the error of which Felix and Hilda's father had been guilty. He said they were your children, brought up under your training and example, not their father's. Why do you dwell so bitterly upon the past? It is all forgotten now."

"Not by me," murmured Felicity, "nor by you, Phebe."

"No; I have never forgotten him," cried Phebe, with a passionate sorrow in her voice. "How good he was to me, and to all about him! Yes, he was guilty of a sin before God and against man; I know it. But oh! if he had only suffered the penalty, and come back to us again, for us to comfort him, and to help him to live down the shame! Possibly we could not have done it in Riversborough; I do not know; but I would have gone with you, as your servant, to the ends of the earth, and you would have lived happy days again—happier than the former days. And he would have proved himself a good man, in spite of his sin; a Christian man, whom Christ would not have been ashamed to own."

"No, no," said Felicity; "that is impossible. I never loved Roland; can you believe that, Phebe?"

"Yes," she answered in a whisper, and with downcast eyes.

"Not as I think of love," continued Felicity in a dreary voice. "I have tried to love you all; but you seem so far away from me, as if I could never touch you. Even Felix and Hilda, they are like phantom children, who do not warm my heart, or gladden it, as other mothers are made happy by their children. Sometimes I have dreamed of what life would have been if I had given myself to some man for whom I could have forfeited the world, and counted the loss as nothing. But that is past now, and I feel old. There is nothing more before me; all is gray and flat and cold, a desolate monotony of years, till death comes."

"You make me unhappy," said Phebe. "Ought we not to love God first, and man for God's sake? There is no passion in that; but there is inexhaustible faithfulness and tenderness."

"How far away from me you are!" answered Felicity with a faint smile.

She turned her sad face again toward the sea, and sat silent, watching the flitting sails pass by, but holding Phebe's hand fast in her own, as if she craved her companionship. Phebe, too, was silent, the tears dimming her blue eyes, and blotting out the sea-view before her. Her heart was very heavy and troubled for Felicity.

"Will you go to Engelberg with me by-and-by?" asked Felicity suddenly, but in a calm and tranquil tone.

"To Engelberg!" echoed Phebe.

"I must go there before Felix thinks of marrying," she answered in short and broken sentences; "but it cannot be till spring. Yet I cannot write again until I have been there; the thought of it haunts me intolerably. Sometimes, nay, often, the word Engelberg has slipped from my pen unawares when I have tried to write; so I shall do no more work till I have fulfilled this duty; but I will rest another few months. When I have been to Engelberg again, for the last time, I shall be not happy, but less miserable."

"I will go with you wherever you wish," said Phebe.

It was so great a relief to have said this much to Phebe, to have broken through so far the icy reserve which froze her heart, that Felicity's spirits at once grew more cheerful. The dreaded words had been uttered, and the plan was settled; though its fulfilment was postponed till spring; a reprieve to Felicity. She regained health and strength rapidly, and returned to London so far recovered that her physician gave her permission to return to work.

But she did not wish to take up her work again.

had long ago lost the charm of novelty to her, and though circumstances had compelled her to write, or to live upon her marriage settlement, which in her eyes was to live upon the proceeds of a successfully carried out, her writing itself had become tedious to her. "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity!" and there is much vexation of spirit, as well as weariness of the flesh, in the making of many books. She had made enemies who were spiteful, and friends who were exacting; she, who felt equally the irksomeness of petty enmities and of small friendships, which, like gnats buzzing monotonously about her, were now and then ready to sting. The sting itself might be trivial, but it was irritating.

Felicita had soon found out how limited is the circle of fame for even a successful writer. For one person who would read a book, there were fifty who would go to hear a famous singer or actor, and a hundred who would crowd to see a clever acrobat. As she read more she discovered that what she had fondly imagined were ideas originated by her own intellect, was, in reality, the echo only of thought long since given to mankind by other minds, in other words, often better than her own. Her own silent claim to genius was greatly modified; she was humbler than she had been. But she knew painfully that her name was now a hundred-fold better known than it had been while she was yet only the wife of a Riversborough banker. All her work for the last fourteen years had placed it more and more prominently before the public. Any scandal attaching to it now would be blazoned farther and wider, in deeper and more enduring characters, than if her life as an author had been a failure.

The subtle hope, very real, vague as it was, that her husband was in truth dead, gathered strength. The silence that had engulfed him had been so profound that it seemed impossible he should still be treading the same earth as herself, and wearing through its slow and commonplace days, sleeping and waking, eating and drinking like other men. Felicita was not superstitious, but there was in her that deep-rooted, instinctive sense of mystery in this double life of ours, dividing our time into sleeping and waking hours, which is often apt to make our dreams themselves omens of importance.

She had never dreamed of Roland as she did of those belonging to her who had already passed into the invisible world about us. His spirit was not free, perhaps, from its earthly fetters so as to be able to visit her, and haunt her sleeping fancies. But now she began to dream of him frequently, and often in the daytime flashes of memory darted vividly across her brain, lighting up the dark forgotten past, and recalling to her some word of his, or a glance merely. It was an inward persecution from which she could not escape, but it seemed to her to indicate that her persecutor was no more a denizen of this world.

To get rid of these haunting memories as much as possible, she made such a change in her mode of life as astonished all about her. She no longer shut herself up in her library; as she had told Phebe, she resolved to write no more, or attempt to write, until she had been to Engelberg. She seemed wishful to attract friends to her, and she renewed old acquaintanceships with members of her own family which she had allowed to drop during these many years.

No sooner was it evident that Felicita Sefton was willing to come out of the extremely quiet and solitary life she had led hitherto, and take her place in society both as Lord Riversford's daughter and as the author of many popular books, than the current of fashion set toward her. She was still a remarkably lovely woman, possessing irresistible attractions in her refined face and soft yet distant manners, as of one walking in a trance, and seeing and hearing things invisible and inaudible to less favored mortals. Quite unconsciously to herself she became the lion of the season, when the next season opened. She had been so difficult to know, that as soon as she was willing to be known invitations poured in upon her, and her house was invaded by a throng of visitors, many of them more or less distantly related to her.

To Hilda this new life was one of unexpected and exquisite delight. Phebe, also, with her genuine interest in her fellow creatures, and her warm sympathy in all human joys and sorrows, enjoyed the change, though it perplexed her, and caused her to watch Felicita with anxiety. Felix saw less of it than any one, for he was down in Essex, leading the tranquil and not very laborious life of a country curate, chafing a little now and then at his inactivity, yet blissful beyond words in the close daily intercourse with Alice. There was no talk of their marriage, but they were young and together. Their happiness was untroubled.

JEWISH EMIGRATION TO PALESTINE.

By Mr. Laurence Oliphant.

THE London Times inserted on February 15th a letter from Mr. Laurence Oliphant, dated from the Athenæum Club, London, suggesting that in consequence of the persecution of the Jews in Russia their emigration to Palestine should be actively promoted. The following are some extracts from the letter:

As the condition of the Jews in South-Eastern Europe has occupied my attention for three years past, and as I spent all the year 1879 and the following spring in Syria and Constantinople, endeavoring to carry out a colonization scheme for their relief, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words on the subject. The dominant idea of the Eastern Jew, whatever may be that of his co-religionist in Western countries, is to return to Palestine. The more wealthy members of the community desire to become landed proprietors on the soil which is endeared to them by the most cherished traditions. They are deterred from doing so partly by the fear that they may be subject to extortions from the local officials, and partly by their ignorance of agricultural pursuits. Nevertheless more than one wealthy Jew is carrying on farming operations successfully in Palestine, and a colony was formed about five years ago near Lydda, from the elders of which I have received a report of which the following is an extract:

"We have divided our territory, which is about five miles by one and a quarter, into 100 lots, possessed now by about 80 families. The well-to-do among us, who have settled on the hills, and built there stone houses, are in a fair way of getting on, but the poorer part, who had little more than their 30 Napoleons to buy a lot, could but afford to erect earthen huts, near the river, where they suffered greatly from malaria this summer. It is, therefore, of the utmost necessity that they also retire to the hills and build them stone houses. To aid our brethren in this undertaking we would gladly pledge all our land—nay, all we possess. If through your means, honored sir, the necessary capital of $12,500 might be raised on the security of the land, you would most undoubtedly confer an immense benefit, not only on us, but on the whole of Israel. For the eyes of all our brethren are directed on us in doubt and fear. If, unhappily, we should not succeed, the good cause would receive a heavy blow, not to recover for a long time."

I have also received a letter from the Emigration Society of Botuschany, in Moldavia, in which the president says, "We have formed here a society of 1000 citizens, who are decided to realize the idea of colonizing Palestine," and begging for advice and assistance. A similar society exists in Galatz, and a large number of families have subscribed the funds necessary to emigrate to the Holy Land. The president writes to know "how we should proceed to carry out our idea; how many acres of land we ought to count for each family; whether in husbandry implements, cattle, etc., help would be granted to us at the outset?"

Another letter I have received from Cucu, in Roumania, describes the formation of a Palestine colonization society in that place, its aims and objects. The president writes: "It is our fixed resolve to emigrate to the land of our fathers, but we entreat you to afford us, when we arrive there, the opportunity of obtaining pecuniary advances for the purposes of cultivating the ground and purchasing the implements. We are perfectly confident that by laboring in the sweat of our brow we shall repay our debt according to the demand of the loan society. We therefore beseech you to complete the great and meritorious work you have undertaken, and to lay the foundation of the re-establishment of our people in their ancient land."

There is also an important society at Bucharest of the same character, from which I have received similar urgent appeals. So much as regards Roumania, where the Jews have passed through many periods of persecution. In regard to Russia, the correspondent of the Jewish Chronicle, in a letter dated Jerusalem, January 26th, writes:

"The movement for emigration to Jerusalem appears to extend more and more in Russia. From divers places envoys have arrived here charged to secure eligible sites for their brethren, who are to follow in the spring of 1882. A Russian gentleman has assured me that many Jewish capitalists in Russia are firmly at Jaffa, in order to erect factories there. I have seen letters from old rabbis of the strictest orthodoxy, declaring that whoever puts his hand to the working of the soil of the Holy Land acts more meritoriously than he who passed his time day and night with study of the Beth Hamedrash."

The consequence of this movement, prematurely extruding without advice and protection from an influential quarter cannot but be disastrous to the unhappy emigrants who will pour into the country slenderly provided with funds, and for the most part ignorant of the rudiments of agriculture.

The Mansion House Committee for the Jews should advance moneys out of the funds as loans to emigrants under certain conditions, to be hereafter specified. In the case of those emigrating to America, which would be the poorer class, these advances would probably be merely to assist in their passage thither; in the case of those desiring to become agriculturists in Syria or Palestine, they would be lent to cover the preliminary expenses of agricultural operations when necessary; but the emigrants to these countries should be selected in the first instance from among the wealthiest class.

The mere fact that it was known that such a committee existed would generally be sufficient to restrain the local officials from indulging in those excesses which they practice with impunity upon the unprotected peasant. By an old law, which has never been repealed, favoring colonization in Turkey, great privileges are accorded and facilities for settlement are offered by the Ottoman Government to immigrants. In fact, there are no better nor juster laws than those affecting the tenure of land in Turkey, when they are properly applied.

In a word, while assistance might be rendered by the committee to Hebrews emigrating to all parts of the world, the Jewish emigration to Palestine should be as much as possible controlled, and specially supervised by it. The immigration should be gradual and almost tentative in the first instance. The wealthier Jews would do well to employ only native labor at first, introducing their poorer co-religionists by degrees. That farming is a most profitable pursuit in the Holy Land is evidenced by the success of Mr. Sursuk, and others who have tried it. There are large tracts of rich waste land in certain parts of the country, to which three years' occupation confers a prescriptive title, and the peasants are generally ready to sell, a rich proprietor being always able to make more money out of his land than a poor peasant, while the condition of the latter is improved when he is protected by the proprietor and cultivates on shares.

Mr. Oliphant adds: "In my book, 'The Land of Gilead,' I have given all the information in my power, together with a sketch of the scheme which I proposed to the Porte, and which the special political complications of two years ago alone prevented my carrying out. But I have no reason to think that the Turkish Government would be unwilling to encourage Jewish immigration into Palestine, provided the immigrants became Turkish subjects, which, under the conditions suggested in this letter, they would, for their own advantage, certainly be glad to do."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke have not been captured, although a reward of fifty thousand dollars has been offered for such information as will lead to their detection. Several men have been arrested on suspicion of being concerned in the plot, but the indiscriminate proceedings of the police show that as yet they have no trustworthy clue to the criminals. Information was given to the police by two draymen that may serve, in the improbable event of the assassins being arrested, in identifying them. The draymen state that, while driving toward Dublin soon after the murder was committed, they met a car containing four men, being driven very rapidly from the scene of the tragedy. Their description of the car tallies with that given by other persons who saw it in the park, and the draymen give a very minute description of the dress and appearance of the four men, with whom they had an altercation. It is now clear that the murder of the Secretary was intended, and was not, as was at first thought, possibly an accident resulting from his interference on behalf of Mr. Burke. It has been remembered that during the procession in Dublin when Lord Spencer, the new Governor of Ireland, Lord Cavendish, and the other officials went in state to take the oath of office, a man inquired three times whether Lord Frederick Cavendish was in the procession. The Chief Secretary at last lifted his hat and told his name. The man replied, "Thank you; that will do." The opinion prevails that the assassins were men detailed for the purpose from America and were not connected with the Land League. This is confirmed by the manner of the murder, which, treacherous as it was, involved some danger to the assassins from the resistance of the victims. The Land League method is to shoot from behind a hedge or a wall.

A Bill for the Repression of Crime in Ireland was introduced by the British Government on May 11th in the House of Commons. It provides that in districts where the law is defied prisoners may be tried by three judges without a jury. It gives power to search for secret apparatus of murder, such as arms and threatening letters; power to enter houses by day or night under a warrant of the Lord Lieutenant; power to arrest persons prowling about at night, and unable to give an account of themselves, who are to be dealt with summarily; power to arrest strangers and to remove foreigners who are considered dangerous to peace. Secret societies are to be dealt with summarily, and membership thereof will constitute an offence under this act. Cases of aggravated assault are to be treated in a summary manner. Power is given to repress intimidation and unlawful meetings. Newspapers containing seditious and inflammatory matter are to be suppressed, and the proprietors required to enter into recognizances not to repeat the offence. Compensation for murder and outrage will be required of the districts where they occur. Outrages are to be dealt with summarily by courts which are to consist of two stipendiary magistrates. The Lord Lieutenant is to have power to proclaim districts to which this act may be applied. Mr. Parnell denounced the measure as the most stringent ever proposed, and Mr. Dillon warned the government that it would provoke more assassinations. He said the only way to deal with Ireland was to accept the aid of himself and his friends. He was, however, promptly informed that the government did not propose "to look to men steeped in treason for aid in protecting life and property."

The New Chief Secretary for Ireland appointed to succeed Lord Frederick Cavendish is Mr. George Otto Trevelyan. The selection has been favorably received by the Irish party and by the country generally. Mr. Trevelyan is an advanced liberal, and is known to sympathize with the popular party in Ireland. He is known in literary circles as the nephew and biographer of Lord Macaulay, and in politics as the persistent advocate of the admission to the franchise of agricultural laborers. It is believed that the new Coercion Bill will be executed with moderation by Mr. Trevelyan and Lord Spencer, who are jointly responsible for its operations. Both men are known to entertain kindly feelings toward the Irish tenants, and to sincerely desire an improvement in their condition.

A Pathetic Letter from the Widow of Lord Frederick Cavendish was read by Lord Spencer to a deputation which waited upon him in Dublin, on May 12th. Lady Cavendish wrote: "I would never grudge the sacrifice of my darling's life if it only leads to putting down the frightful spirit of evil in Ireland. He himself would never have grudged it if thereby death could do more than life." Such an expression shows how much the distressed classes in Ireland lost by the death of this emissary of peace. Unhappily, the spirit of lawlessness called up by the agitators, they are now unable to control, and this crime will probably render of conciliation difficult if not impossible.

Another Crisis in Egypt is Reported. A cablegram from Cairo, dated May 10th, says, Egypt is in a state of revolution. The Ministry, in violation of the organic law, have summoned the Chamber of Notables over the head of the Khédive. Their nominal object is to settle the difference which has arisen between them and the Khédive, but it is considered that the latter's deposition may be regarded as virtually achieved in favor of a government under Arabi Bey, unless immediate intervention occurs. The Khédive, at a private audience, declared that he was resolved not to give way at any cost. He said he relied upon material support from England and France, by whose advice he had been governed. The intervention of Turkey is threatened, but it is expected that both England and France would resist any attempt at coercion emanating from Constantinople. Germany and Russia, on the other hand, are believed to be encouraging the Sultan to insist upon his rights as the suzerain of the Khédive. There is a general sense of insecurity prevailing throughout Egypt, and foreign merchants are sending away their valuables and their families to places of safety.

A Strange Proposal Emanates from the Anti-Vivisectionists of France. M. Pasteur, in view of the opposition now displayed toward the experiments on living animals, suggested at a recent meeting of the French Academy of Sciences that criminals condemned to death might be invited to allow themselves to be experimented upon, on the understanding that if they survive they should be let off with some modification of the original sentence. The London Record remarks on the proposal: "It is scarcely probable that M. Pasteur's suggestion will be acted upon; though it would be difficult to say why men who have taken one life should not have the opportunity given them of saving many. M. Pasteur considers that such reflection would help to console the penitent murderer; and with really amiable assassins such would doubtless be the case."

The Students and Friends of the Rev. C. I. Spurgeon's Pastors' College celebrated the eighteenth anniversary of the institution on April 17th. It was stated that since the commencement of the work six hundred and twenty students have been educated in the college and four hundred and sixty-four of that number are now laboring in the cause of Christ. Of the others some have died and others, owing to permanent ill-health, have been compelled to abandon the work of the ministry. Last year the expenses of the institution amounted to $34,415. It has been the practice since the foundation of the college for each student after becoming settled over a church to make an annual report of the results of the year's work. From the reports received at the anniversary it appears that during 1881 the total number of additions to the churches over which Mr. Spurgeon's students preside, was 7814. In the course of a brief speech, Mr. Spurgeon explained that the brethren came up once a year not to exchange sermons, because that would be as unprofitable as exchanging clothes; they came for interchange of ideas and to cheer one another in their work. The sight of a friend sometimes acted as a tonic and this he (Mr. Spurgeon) had often realized, and especially had he done so when a few days ago the Bishop of Rochester had called at Westwood to pray with him in sickness. The brethren educated in the college had common struggles, and banded together by common sympathies the clan still increased, and their object was to stir one another up in their work. Fallible themselves, the pastors had to do with fallible flocks, and so needed the wisdom of God in the discharge of the duties of their more than royal post. It was possible to make a play of preaching, but if done in reality it had to be done in the power of the Most High. The brethren constituted a salvation army, and he prayed that the Lord might be in the midst of them.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey, English Journals say, are continuing their mission at Glasgow, with very rich tokens of the Divine blessing. In the Cowcaddens district where special evangelistic meetings were held, there has been a great awakening, and the inquiry and after meetings were exceedingly well attended. The bible classes, testimony-meetings, and prayer-meetings also bear remarkable evidence to the depth and reality of the work which is progressing. The services in the Circus also have been the means in God's hands of leading many of the worst sinners to Christ, among them being some of the most degraded and notorious drunkards of the city. At the noon prayer-meeting ten minutes are now given each day for special intercession on behalf of nebrates.

The British Journal which is the Recognized organ of the medical profession in that country is called the Lancet. Some time ago it was accustomed, when alluding to religion, to speak of eternal truth with scepticism with a tendency to ridicule. It is gratifying to notice that a change has now taken place in its tone. In an article published in the Lancet of April 15th on "Scepticism in the Medical Profession," it says: "Such scepticism as is alleged to prevail in the medical profession would be especially untimely and unaccountable at this stage of our history and progress, seeing that recent discoveries in science have thrown new light on the facts of nature and on the subjects of Revelation, removing many stumbling-blocks out of the way of belief, and conspicuously confirming the faith of the Christian."

Missionary at Hankow, China.

IN presenting in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the portrait of a missionary whose labors for Christ in China have been signally blessed of God, the thought of the benighted condition of that strange land is involuntarily called up. During the present and preceding sessions of Congress we have heard much of "the heathen Chinese." Eloquent members have enlarged on his ignorance, his superstitions, and his vices, and have at length succeeded in prohibiting for ten years his coming to this country. Without expressing any opinion as to the wisdom or policy of this specimen of the legislative wisdom of Congress, and without entering on the question of the motives that have prompted Congress in its Anti-Chinese policy, there can be no doubt that the charge of heathenism is well founded. It is impossible to make a tour in the laundries of Mott Street, New York; of Chinatown, San Francisco; or of the various localities in any of our great cities where the Celestials abound, without being appalled by the gross darkness of their lives.

Their industry and honesty are admitted even by their enemies, but those persons who visit them in their homes, and the general public who see their funerals and other public ceremonies, know that their minds are degraded by idolatry and superstition, and that their souls seem closed to the light of the world as it shone in Jesus. Their opium-smoking and eating still further debase them, and only in comparatively few instances does Christian teaching reach their hearts. But if their heathenism appals us here, where it is surrounded by Christian influences and in contact with western civilization, we are oppressed by the conception of what it must be in their own land, where two hundred and fifty millions of people, five times the population of the United States, are crowded together, and social custom and family influence exercise a deepening influence and confirm them in their opposition to the truth.

The imagination fails adequately to grasp the immensity of the field on which the handful of Christian missionaries in China are laboring. Only recently opened to the admission of missionaries, China is for the most part in utter ignorance of the Gospel, and though many devoted men have consecrated their lives to the work of preaching and teaching in China they have yet done little more than prepare the way for future laborers. Among these self-sacrificing men who, leaving country and kindred, have voluntarily incurred privation and hardship, and risked health and life that those who sit in darkness and the shadow of death might learn of Him who came to seek and to save the lost, the Rev. Griffith John occupies a conspicuous place, as well by reason of his untiring energy and active labor, as by the success with which God has honored him.

Rev. Griffith John is a native of Swansea, in Wales. He is now fifty years of age and more than half his life has been spent in China. In early youth he was deprived by death of both his parents, but not before their Christian teaching and pious example had made an indelible impression on his soul. While still very young he became united with a Christian church and sought opportunities of usefulness. It is stated that when he was only fourteen years of age, he gave evidence of pulpit power, and on more than one occasion preached a sermon full of Welsh fire and vigor and of Gospel truth. He was, however, counselled by judicious Christian friends to abstain for a time from preaching, and to devote his energies to study and to the acquirement of theological knowledge.

For two years he abandoned preaching, but at the end of that time, when only sixteen years old, he began again to declare the Gospel from the pulpits of village churches. He was able at that period to exert a remarkable influence over his audience, moving them to tears, or calling up on their faces smiles of joy as he poured forth his wealth of words.

HIS ACADEMICAL CAREER.

Still it was evident to himself as to others that special training and discipline would be beneficial to him, that he might be "thoroughly furnished unto all good works." The consequence was that he began to prepare himself for an academical course by a diligent study of the English language, and in 1850, in the eighteenth year of his age, he entered Brecon College. After studying with unwearied application and unqualified success in this institution for rather more than three years, he removed to Bedford, where, under the supervision of an experienced minister, nominated by the London Missionary Society, he devoted his attention more fully to Biblical and theological themes, and concentrated all his efforts upon efficiently preparing himself for foreign missionary work.

For some time his heart had been greatly stirred by what he learned of the condition of the millions of heathendom. His soul responded to the appeals which he heard on missionary platforms on behalf of the South Sea Islands and Africa; at times, also, he was deeply stirred by contemplating the campaigns of the missionary pioneers of India—William Carey, Marshman, and Ward; but it was to China that his eyes turned day and night with an indescribable longing; it was the burden of his nightly prayer, and he yearned to go among its millions of Christless men and women, that he might awaken them from stolid apathy and snap the fetters of a cruel superstition which for centuries had held them captive.

SET APART FOR MISSION WORK.

At last in April, 1855, when he was twenty-three years old, Mr. John was solemnly dedicated to the work he loved, in the Congregational Church at Swansea, which he joined on a profession of his faith in Christ some years before. The scene was a very remarkable one for its solemnity and for the glowing words in which the missionary designate recounted the leading features of his life, and his reasons for wishing to occupy the particular field of service to which he had now been devoted.

HIS ARRIVAL AT SHANGHAI.

A month after his consecration to evangelistic and missionary work in China, Mr. John set sail, and after a voyage extending over several months, he arrived at Shanghai. Here it was deemed prudent for him to remain a while, in order that he might familiarize himself with local customs and habits, and gird up his strength for future work. He remained at Shanghai until 1861, studying the language and learning the Mandarin dialect—the tongue of educated men, courtly ceremony, and official life, and exceedingly difficult to acquire—as well as the patois or dialect of the province—and in this way laid a firm and solid foundation for future work among all classes of the natives. At the same time he was accustomed to preach frequently in the city itself, and in various parts of the province. The Rev. W. R. Thompson, foreign secretary of the London Missionary Society, asserts that so earnestly did Mr. John study, and with so rare an aptitude for the acquisition of the language had God endowed him, that "when he had only been fifteen or eighteen months in the country, he could preach in Chinese so well as to command the admiration of an English Consular officer who was well acquainted with the language."

REMOVES TO HANKOW IN 1861.

But all this was preparatory discipline, schooling and equipping him for the wider and more difficult sphere of Christian enterprise at Hankow, with which Mr. John's name is now associated. Hankow is one of the largest inland cities of China, and the largest trading steamers can navigate the six hundred miles of the river Wangpoo, or Wusung, by which the city is linked to the Yellow Sea. Mr. John was the first missionary employed in Central China, and so well had he utilized the period of his stay at Shanghai, that he was able to commence the work of preaching Christ immediately on arriving at his new station.

From this point as a centre, he has extended his work on all sides. He has travelled, chiefly on foot, over large portions of nine out of the eighteen provinces of the Empire, and was himself the first to preach the Gospel in four of them. The records of the London Missionary Society, under whose auspices he labors, show that in 1868 he spent four months in an extended missionary campaign, in the course of which he travelled over three thousand miles, and penetrated into regions where the glad tidings of salvation had never been heard before. In 1880 a similar expedition was undertaken by him through the provinces of Hupeh, Kiangsi, and Hunen.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE STATION.

Hankow has been the centre of his work. It is the central mission station in the empire, and one of the most important. Not only has the city an enormous resident population, but it is a centre of trade, and consequently multitudes are arriving and departing who come from all parts of the country. By means of these visitors not a little has been done in the diffusion of the Gospel, for many have attended the services at the mission and carried to their friends in distant cities intelligence of the work. A new church is now being erected for his meetings, in the High Street of the city. He has also enlisted the agency of the press in his Master's service, and has done much to promote missionary literature through the empire. In this department may be especially mentioned an able paper on the "Ethics of the Chinese," which has called forth high commendations from those most competent to pronounce on its merits.

His first visit to England after commencing his labors in China was in 1870, after an absence of fifteen years, and he completed a second visit last February, rendered necessary by the illness of his wife, whose earnest devotion is not second to his own.

MRS. GRIFFITH JOHN, has labored with great success among the foreign sailors who visit Hankow. Mrs. John has opened several homes for the men, at their principal places of resort, which have proved great blessings and prevented much evil. (The panel on the left hand side of the frontispiece portrait represents one of these homes.) are the universal vices of China, the former being practised in a variety of ways, and strangely mixed up with their most commonplace and most sacred observances. In their temples they toss the prognosticating sticks, in the hope of winning a good omen from some favorite idol. In the public streets the peddler has his gaming table, which regulates his transactions with his poorest customers. The missionaries tell us that so enslaving is this vice, that the Chinese gamble themselves out of good society into bad, out of debt and into it; and, when the habit has mastered the most tender feelings of their nature, they do not hesitate to stake their wives and children, and even play with their own slavery as a stake.

GAMBLING AND OPIUM SMOKING

MR. JOHN VISITS THE DENS

with great frequency, where the gambler and the opium-smoker spend their time, for the purpose of preaching "liberty to the captive" and salvation through Christ.

Only those who live in China can realize what a terrible curse the use of opium is in that broad land, how it deadens the intelligence and hardens the heart to the reception of the message of the Gospel, and therefore stands as a serious barrier in the pathway of missionary work. A few years ago the China Mail published appeals from some of the women sufferers themselves, from which, as an evidence of the prevalence of the vice, we make the following extract:

"We women make a public statement; afflicted and distressed, we make a mournful complaint. Bowing down, we beg that regulations may be established for prohibition in the villages. When, in youth, we went to the homes of our husbands, we did not suffer from cold and hunger; but, from the time our husbands and sons smoked opium, the children that were dressed—our daughters in green, our sons in red—in the twinkling of an eye came to rags; ornamented halls and grand houses vanished in smoke. They who before protected their families are themselves reduced to the appearance of beggars. The beds have no coverlets; the household utensils have no food left in them. Hungry, there is nothing for them to eat; cold, there are no clothes for them to wear. The fault surely with opium. In this distress it is difficult to give expression to the feelings that fill the breast. There is no tear we shed that is not red with blood."

It is to such people, the authors and the victims of the misery which is wrought, that Mr. John pays constant visits, announcing fearlessly that Christ can save even unto the uttermost, and the result is that large accessions of truly converted men are made to the Church. (The picture numbered 2, our frontispiece, illustrates one such visit.)

HIS FAREWELL ADDRESS.

As a specimen of Mr. John's mode and matter of address, we give the following from his speech at the farewell meeting in Westminster Chapel, London, in February last. The assembly stood up as a mark of respect when the eminent missionary rose to speak. He said, for work, for its population is enormous, and it is on the eve of a vast material development. Railways and telegraphs will soon be constructed, and should like to give a Christian direction to the revolution which is about to take place.

'CHINA IS A GREAT FIELD

"It is twenty-six years since I went out to China, but I shall go out with more faith now than then. The promises of God are a great source of inspiration. Christianity has been spoken of as one of the religions of the world, but it is essentially differentiated from them. Philosophical Buddhism, sheer atheism, and popular Buddhism is gross superstition. Confucianism is a system of morals, but it has nothing to say about God or the future life. Christianity gives a living, personal Saviour to men, which no other religion does. While I reach the Atonement I want more than a dead Christ. I want a living Christ, ever present with me.

"Some seven or eight years ago I felt dissatisfied as a Christian man, feeling that there were privileges promised in the Bible which I had never realized, and I felt dissatisfied with my power of service. But after much time had been given by myself and my people to prayer, a veritable baptism of the Holy Ghost seemed to come upon us. Those who had been babes in Christ—Jesus became men, and spoke with boldness of Christ to the unconverted Chinese. The whole atmosphere of the Church seemed to be changed."

THE COURAGE OF CHINESE CONVERTS.

In the same speech Mr. John spoke in an impressive manner of the Christian courage and contempt of life, when duty demands self-abnegation, which characterize the vast majority of the Chinese converts. On one occasion the missionary was in great peril from an infuriated band of half-drunken desperadoes of the most reckless description, to whom, at an earlier hour of the day, he had been pointing out the wickedness of their course, and the way of deliverance both from the power and consequences of sin. As by a preconcerted arrangement they rushed, yelling, toward him, and hurling at his head missiles and filth of a most disgusting character.

The few Chinese Christians who accompanied him, without saying a word, or giving a look of angry deprecation, quietly surrounded Mr. John and another missionary who was on a visit to Hanow, and formed a complete body-guard around them, and though there were several very "ugly" men from the mob, which was not only animated by bitter hostility, but also evidently determined to inflict serious injury on the missionary, neither Mr. John nor his friend received harm, though several of the brave defending company were somewhat seriously hurt. (The panel in the lower section of our frontispiece is an attempt to represent this act of courage on the part of the Christian natives.) It is to this land that the churches in America and Europe send a missionary now and again, at intervals few and far between, and which the China Inland Mission especially is trying to furnish with an increasing staff of devoted men and women, who, for Christ's sake are prepared to endure fatigue, privation, and hardships, and death itself, if only they can win a passage for the Gospel amid such a mass of perishing humanity. Since its beginning in 1866, under the auspices of the well-known and honored Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, the Inland Mission has encountered many difficulties, but year after year it has proved itself true to its high vocation, and to-day there are between seventy and eighty godly, earnest, and efficient missionaries in the field. But, what are these among so many? Let our readers pray that the Lord of the harvest may speedily send forth more laborers into His harvest.

DR. SIMS.

His Conversion—Desire for Mission Work—Graduates at Aberdeen University—Joins the Congo Mission.

"NONE of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself" says the great Apostle of the Gentiles, and his words are constantly being fulfilled in the sense in which he intended them and in other senses. Very remarkably have they been fulfilled in the dedication of Dr. Sims to missionary work. It is but a few short months since Mr. Adam McAll laid down his life in the cause of Christian missions in South Africa and already one Christian has been so deeply impressed by the account of his life and death that he has volunteered to go out to the same land to labor in the same cause.

Dr. Sims, who is now medical missionary of the Congo Inland Mission, and whose portrait accompanies that of his confrère, Mr. Appel, on page 332, was born in Leicestershire, England, and is now twenty-five years of age. From his earliest years he received a careful religious training from his godly mother, who was very prayerful, humble, and sincere, and led a consistent Christian life. It was from her excellent example of faith and trust in Christ that her son was led to read his Bible and pray; and it was through her teaching and prayers that he was led to realize the necessity of seeking pardon through the atoning death of the Lord Jesus Christ.

HIS CONVERSION

took place under the ministrations of the Rev. J. E. Matthews, Swanwick, Alfreton, who prepared him for confirmation by the Bishop of Worcester, in 1874.

HIS DESIRE TO BECOME A MISSIONARY

was owing instrumentally, to the same clergyman. This devoted minister continued to watch over him with godly care, and helped him in the early stages of his religious life. Having an intense love of missionary work, Mr. Matthews never ceased in private and in public to encourage interest in it in others, and induced men, when suitable, to offer themselves for the mission field. To his testimony and prayers, Dr. Sims and three others of his friends are indebted for the impetus which led them to devote themselves to this important work. Dr. Sims was first led to think of becoming a medical missionary by the reading of Dr. Henderson's life in Shanghai, and Dr. Elmslie's in Kashmir; and the idea was further developed by the powerful testimony borne to medical missions by his intimate friend Miss Annie Butler, late of the London Medical Mission, and also by seeing the valuable aid rendered by the Medical Mission in Birmingham.

ENTERS ABERDEEN UNIVERSITY.

His desires having become known to his friends, and his missionary spirit recognized, they generously helped him forward with his purpose. Dr. Thompson Crabbe, of the Birmingham Medical Mission, advised him to enter the University of Aberdeen, where he remained four years, working hard in his classes, and distinguishing himself in anatomy, botany, surgery, zoology, physiology, and chemistry. He had succeeded in taking a high place in some of these branches, gained a medal in zoology, and graduated last year with qualifications in medicine and surgery. In his student days he was not idle in his Master's service. When time and opportunity offered he spoke at Gospel and temperance meetings, and privately to the hospital patients, when undeterred by the authorities, and had the joy of knowing that souls were blessed through his instrumentality. In the work of the Birmingham Medical Mission he also took a considerable part.

BECOMES A MEDICAL MISSIONARY.

Dr. Crabbe being compelled at one time to remain on the Continent of Europe for several weeks, Dr. Sims was called upon to undertake his duties, and commenced his life work by earnest preaching, visiting, and healing, endeavoring to soften the hearts of many who were hardened by every form of sin and vice. The testimonies he at that time received from patients, relieved in body and soul, greatly delighted and encouraged him, and tended to confirm him in the wisdom of the choice he had made in devoting himself to missionary work. He afterwards became a surgeon in the country, where he was content to abide until such time as the Lord gave him a sphere of labor more in accordance with his heart's desire.

JOINS THE CONGO INLAND MISSION.

One quiet Sunday afternoon he read the account of the death of Mr. Adam McCall, and was so moved by it that he immediately offered himself to Mr. and Mrs. Grattan Guinness for work on the Congo. He visited the Institute, Harley House, Bow, of which a picture appeared with the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Grattan Guinness in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 19th last. There he was warmly welcomed, and after a careful consideration of the missionaries' letters and journals, and acting on the advice of those qualified to help him in coming to a decision, he felt it to be the guiding hand of God, and resolved to go and open the first medical mission on the Congo. He was gladly accepted for this branch of labor, as a fellow-helper in the Gospel of Christ, and at the end of this month he will (D.V.) set sail for the Congo.

HIS PLANS FOR THE FUTURE.

It is his intention to build a cottage hospital and dispensary at Stanley Pool, 350 miles up the Congo, on the main stream, where he hopes to preach to the patients as a whole, and deal with them individually, not merely as a physician, but as a missionary, in the widest sense of the term. Circumstances permitting, he will, with his colleagues, open schools, and establish an industrial station on the model of those already existing in Africa, using every effort to promote the temporal and spiritual welfare of the people. He trusts that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will not forget himself and his associates in their difficult and dangerous mission.

A Lady among Lepers.—There are Four Asylums in India which have been established by Christian generosity for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the victims of leprosy. They are located at Almorah, Subathu, Ambala, and Dehra. Mrs. Dr. Newton, of Dehra, gives the following account: "The poor creatures generally come sick, miserable, ragged, and dirty—in fact, utterly forlorn. One day last February, raising my eyes from the book in which I had been writing the list of applicants for medicines, I saw before me a neat, well-dressed young man, belonging evidently to a very respectable class of house servants. No second glance was needed to tell me why he had come—his face was covered with the peculiar swellings of tubercular leprosy, the worst form of the disease. He had come for medicine, he said. I told him he should have some which I hoped would do him good, but could not promise that it would cure. He lingered. I asked, 'Is there anything else I can do for you?' 'Yes,' said Clarkson, the manager, 'he has come to stay.' 'Come to stay!' I repeated; 'this place is for those who are poor and helpless.' 'I have no father nor mother; no one to take care of me,' he said, 'and I have this disease; but,' he added, eagerly, 'I will go away as soon as I get well.' Poor fellow! I could not deceive him with vain hopes. I told him that he should stay, that we would do all we could for him, but there was no cure for his disease. I shall never forget the look of utter, hopeless wretchedness which came over his face as he realized the truth. Oh, that we may lead him to Christ, in whom he will find health and life abundant for evermore."

HAVE CHRISTIANS ANY RIGHT TO WORLDLY AMUSEMENTS?

FOR the last hundred years the Church has spent much of its time in denouncing hurtful and dangerous amusements—a cautionary work most important and necessary; but it seems to me that we have stopped short of the mark. Having been so long in telling the people what they must not do, it seems to me about time to tell them something they may do. This world will never be reformed by

A RELIGION OF "DON'T."

My text implies that there is a lawful use of the world as well as an unlawful use of it, and the difference between the man Christian and the man un-Christian is that the former masters the world, while in the latter case the world masters him.

For whom did God make this grand and beautiful world? For whom this expenditure of color, this gracefulness of lines, this mosaic of the earth, this fresco of the sky, this glowing fruitage of orchard and vineyard, this full orchestra of the tempest in which tree branches flute, and winds trumpet, and thunders drum, and all the splendor of earth and sky come clashing their cymbals? For whom did God spring the arch bridge of colors on the buttresses of broken storm cloud? For whom did God hang the upholstery of fire around the window of the setting sun? For all men, but more especially for His dear children.

Suppose a man build a large mansion and lay out around it beautiful grounds at vast expense, and there are deer and statuary and fountains, and every botanical and horticultural luxury, and then he spreads a banquet to celebrate the completion of the work, will he send his children down into the cellar, or turn them out on the barren fields, while strangers come in and sit at the banquet? O, no. He will be very glad to have his neighbors and friends and strangers come in to rejoice with him at the festival, but all his children must be home that day. And I have to tell you that while the beautiful banquet of this world, and this grand mansion of the world with all its surroundings, may partially be enjoyed by those who are strangers to God's grace, the chief place, the best place, is for the sons and the daughters of the Lord God Almighty.

When a man becomes a Christian he is not put on the limits, but turned out into a larger sphere. What does the Bible mean when it says "all are yours?" Why it means all—-all innocent hilarities, all innocent amusements, all innocent beverages. "All are yours." When a man becomes a Christian he becomes not less of a man but more of a man. Yonder is a factory with a thousand wheels, but it is low water. Now only fifty of the thousand wheels are in motion, but after a while the spring freshets come, and the floods roll down, and now all the thousand wheels have bands on them and are in motion. Before a man becomes a Christian only part of his nature is in activity and employment. The grace of God comes in with powerful floods of mercy and new impetus to action, and now instead of the fifty faculties, or the fifty wheels, there are a thousand all in play and in full motion. Vastly more of a man since he became a Christian than before he became a Christian.

If any of you had dolorous sympathy with the large multitudes of people who two weeks ago thronged these aisles, standing up to profess faith in Jesus Christ, you only wasted your sympathy. If you said within yourself: "Now, those people are going down into hardship and trial and trouble; why didn't they stay a while and enjoy the world, and enjoy the felicities of this life, and then after they had enjoyed this world, in time to get ready for the next, give their hearts to God?"—they need none of your sympathy.

Before I get through I think you will get the intimation that those who stay out of the kingdom of God have the hardships, and those who come into the kingdom of God have the joys and the satisfactions. I mean this morning to serve a writ of ejectment upon all those, all the sinful and the polluted, who have squatted on the domain of worldly pleasure, and I am going to claim the inheritance of the sons and the daughters of the Lord Almighty. It seems to me wrong to stand Sabbath by Sabbath and year by year before people in whom there is a divine principle demanding recreation and amusement, and say this is wrong and that is wrong, and the other thing is wrong, without showing them something that is right.

So this morning, I shall go into a field not usual for sermonizing, but I shall preach what I think all common-sense men and women will conclude is a practical sermon while I show you styles of amusement and recreation which are not only necessary but healthful—good for the body, good for the mind, and good for the soul, and answer hundreds of questions which are asked me, although in some cases only answering the questions incidentally and indirectly.

I. First, I commend to you in the way of INDOOR RECREATIONS and amusements, music, vocal and instrumental. Among the first things created was the bird. Why? Because God wanted the world to have music at the start. And this infant world, wrapped in swaddling clothes of light, so beautifully serenaded at the start is to die amid the ringing blast of the archangel's trumpet; so that as the world had music at the start, it is going to have music at the last. I am glad there are so many homes in which music has been brought as a charm and as an education and as an elevation. What a delightful thing it is to have children brought up amid the sound of cultured voices and amid musical instruments.

If you can afford the time and the money—I say, if you can afford the time and the money—have in your house harp, or flute, or piano, or organ. Just as soon as the child's hand is large enough to compass the keys, teach that hand to pick out the harmony. And I say to all these young men, try the power of music upon your moral character, and in your entertainments and in the proper occupation of your hours of silence and solitude. Many a young man has been kept away from the temptations of this life because, although he has had only one room perhaps in a boarding house, in that room he has had some instrument of music that was his charm in time of solitude and temptation. There is something in it to soothe pain, to quell passion, to reclaim dissipation, to strengthen the immortal soul.

II. I go further and I commend to all the people who are asking for innocent amusement and recreations

THE GYMNASIUM.

I am glad to know that one has been established in connection with our Young Men's Christian Association in Brooklyn, and that nearly all our colleges and seminaries that are worth anything have gymnasiums. It is an outrage to turn a young man out after four years' curriculum with destroyed bodily health however much an institution may have cultured his intellect. There is something about a gymnasium that is very charming and very elevating, and it is free from dissipation and from the temptations that come around many other forms of amusement. Some of you understand the virtue of such entertainments and recreations. Others of you perhaps do not.

There are Christians who have been mightily benefited in their spiritual condition by such an institution. There are Christians who go all their life writing doleful things about their immortal souls when there is nothing the matter with them except an incompetent liver. There are people who have an idea that in order to be pious they must be poorly. Because Robert Hall and Richard Baxter were invalids all their life, and yet achieved great usefulness, these people have an idea they must go through the same sickness to the same grandeur of character. Now, I will tell you, people of my congregation, that God will hold you responsible for your invalidism if it is your own fault, and if with proper physical exercise, you could get rid of it. Take advantage of all that there is of health in such an institution.

There are multitudes of Christians who have a their prospects of Heaven blotted out by clouds of tobacco smoke. They shatter the vase in which God has placed the jewel of eternity. They have a splendid intellect in a ruined body. Grand machinery capable of driving a steamer across the Atlantic fastened in a rickety North River propeller. Now, my friends, take all the advantage there is in the gymnasium for the elevation of body and elevation of mind, and elevation of soul. It is of servable always that if you start out two men with equal consecration of soul, but the one is healthy in body and the other is unhealthy, the man who healthy will always accomplish the most good.

The world has scoffed a great deal at what calls

but in the great test of triumph for the future in the millennial glory it will all be muscular. With such a puny set of Christians as we have got in this day we will never capture this world for God, I tell you. It is outrageous that a man with good physique given by the Lord should allow to go into sickness and into ruin, and instead of spending his life in behalf of some great enterprise, in behalf of God and the truth, spending his days in studying what it is good to take food dyspepsia! A ship that ought to have all sail set with every man at his post, having all the hands employed in stopping up the leakages. What you could through the gymnasium or similar institutions work off your querulousness and one-half your mental and physical disorder, how can you turn your back upon such a grand medicament?

III. I commend also to you among indoor sports and recreations, and amusements. We might make our homes hundredfold more attractive than they are. You will never keep your boy away from outside dissipation until you make your domestic circle brighter than any other place he can find. Do not scold and with half-condemnatory look amid the sportfulness of your children. You were your once yourself. Let your children be young.

Do not put on a sort of supernatural gravity, although you never liked sportfulness. You liked just as much as your children do. Some of you were full of mischief you have never indicated to your children or your grandchildren, and you never got up in the morning until you were pulled out of bed! Do not stand before your children pretending to be specimens of immaculate goodness. Do not, because your eyesight is dim or your ankles are stiff, frown upon the sportfulness which shows itself in the first lustre of the eye and in the bounding foot of robust health. Do not shrink with the rheumatism wondering how the children can go on so. Thank God that they are so light of spirit, that their laughter is so free, that the spirits are so radiant. Trouble comes soon enough to them. Dark days will come soon enough to them, and heart breaks and desolation and bereavement will come soon enough. Do not try to forestall it. Do not try to anticipate it. While the clouds come on the sky it is time enough to get out the reef tackle.

Introduce into your parlors those innocent games which are the invention of our own day, and those that have come down from other days: chess and charades and battledore and tableaux and calisthenics and scores of others that young people suggest and those that are suggested to you, many of them having on them not one taint of iniquity

And then you will want to take your family out with you sometimes. Beware, O man, if you never take your family with you to those places where you go for amusement. It is always a good sign when I see families going together to places of amusement.

IV. I go further—and this bright sunshiny day makes the suggestion—and commend to you

FIELD SPORTS.

I hail the croquet ground, and the sportsman's gun and the fisherman's rod, and archery and lawn tennis, and scores of other amusements belonging to the fields. The fact is, there is something so unhealthy in city life that when the taker of the census says there are in the city four hundred thousand people there are only two hundred thousand, since it generally takes about two men to amount to one man, there is something so unnerving, so exhausting, in our metropolitan life. We want more fresh air, more sunshine.

I cry out in behalf of the Church of God as well as in behalf of all healthful secularities, we want more sunshine and as well as in our secular literature. The reformers of the world go into the studies, and they sit and they sit, and they study and they study, and they get morbid and bilious and think everything is going to ruin. It is not going to ruin; it is going on to salvation; and those of us who are the children of God are not on the way to a penitentiary but to a palace, and this world is not going to be all desert, it is going to be all garden.

We want more sunshine in our theology. How are you going to get people in the kingdom of God—drive them in? You cannot drive them in. How does this old book say they are to be got in? "I if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me." You cannot drive them in. We want more fresh air and sunlight in our theology. So I wish that every winter our ponds and lakes might be all aquake with the heel and the shout of the swift skater, but now that warm weather has come I wish that the graceful oar might dip the stream and the eventide be filled with the song of the boatman, the bright prow splitting the crystalline billow. O! I am glad there are so many field sports, so that men may come back with strength in the arm and lustre in the eye, and ruddiness in the cheek and courage in the heart.

In this great battle now opening against the powers of darkness there is need not only of a consecrated soul but a strong arm and stout lungs and steady nerve, and healthful physique. I am glad there are so many recreations, some of them indoor, some of them outdoor, that are good for the body, good for the mind, good for the soul, and it is time that the church of God woke up; instead of standing and saying all the time, "don't do this, and don't do that, and don't do the other thing," tell the people of something they may do.

V. I come now—for I want my sermon to be climactic—I come now to and that is the pleasure of doing good. I have known a young man cross and sour, and queer, and feeble of body and mean of soul, disgusting everybody, under a heavenly touch transformed into a man buoyant and blissful, the earth and the heavens breaking forth into music. "O!" says some one, "I admit that that must be a great recreation, doing good, and I would employ that mode if I had the means." You have the means. "O," says some one, "my means are extremely limited; you would be surprised how small my means are, and I can't employ that mode of recreation." My brother, have you two hands? "Yes." Have you two feet? "Yes." Do you suppose that during the coming year you could devote ten dollars to charities? "Yes." Will you during the year be able to give twenty-five hundred cheerful looks to the desponding? "Yes." Would you during the coming year have five thousand words of encouragement if you should seek for them? "Yes." Magnificent equipment you have.

To-morrow morning on the way to the ferry you see a case of real destitution, for sometimes there is a call from God in such a case, and you can see right through and know the difference between a sham case and a real case of destitution. You contribute two pennies out of those ten dollars you are going to give during the year, and as the pennies rattle down into the blind man's hat he hears it and says, "God bless you, thank you, thank you, thank you." You look indifferent. You pass down with cultured indifference for fear some one is looking at you. You look as if you were not elated, but from scalp to heel you feel a thrill. No need of denying it. You feel a great satisfaction in having made that man happy.

Forenoon passing along, you see a poor lad trying to get a wheelbarrow up over the curbstone. He has failed in the attempt. You say, "Here, stand back, let me try that," and you push the wheelbarrow over the curbstone, you put it down, you start on. The poor lad is so surprised he has not even thanked you. You go on looking indifferent, but O! how thrilled you are. There is a great satisfaction, body, mind, and soul. You are made better. You are recreated.

After a while, perhaps in the middle of the afternoon, going along on some business errand, you see a sick man. He is not poor, he does not want any of your money, he has ten times more money than you have, but he is sick, O! so very sick, so despondent. Now you try on him one of those cheerful looks, one of those twenty-five hundred cheerful looks, one of those twenty-five hundred sympathetic, loving looks. You look at him as you pass. It thrills him. You are thrilled. You pass on. You do not tell any one the story, but in body, mind, and soul you feel it. You know

IT HELPED THAT SICK MAN.

On your way home you come by the store of a man whom you know very well, who is not getting on very well in business. He is embarrassed and discouraged. You go in and say, "Why you have a nice store here. Business, I think, will be better after a while in your department. Sometimes there comes a strange lull in certain styles of business, but you will get over this; after a while there will be plenty to do, I have no doubt. Besides that, I have some friends whom I will introduce to you, and I think they will trade with you. Good bye!" "Good bye!" he says. Thrilled again through and through with a holy satisfaction.

You get home. Somehow the door plate is brighter than it used to be, and you pass in the door, and everything is bright. It seems as if you never had such a beautiful supper as you have that night. And then after a while you are seated by the fire and you sing a little and you talk a little, and whistle a little, and you say after a while in an outburst, "Well, I don't know what is the matter with me; I never felt so splendidly in all my life."

I will tell you what is the matter with you. You gave two pennies out of the ten dollars that you are going to give during the year; you helped the boy up with his wheelbarrow; you gave ten or fifteen of the twenty-five hundred cheerful looks; you gave twenty, or thirty, or fifty of the five thousand cheerful words you are going to speak. That is what is the matter with you.

Why the most magnificent recreation on earth, for body, mind, and soul, is doing good. Some of you have tried it. You know it better than I do, the whole story. Some of you, I have no doubt, have given a lad sixpence just to see him hop and skip and jump. There are such men and women in the world, thank God. I cannot tell you the story. You can tell it better to me. But I will tell you I never had so bright a time as one day when I was on the lake in a boat. I had been through the park hundreds of times, sometimes riding with very radiant friends, delightful friends; but I never had such a time as that day. I was in a boat on the lake in the park and two ragamuffins on the banks said, "Here, mister, won't you give us a ride?" I said, "Certainly." So I pulled up to the bank and said, "Get in;" so they got in, one of them at one end the boat and the other at the other end the boat. Well, to hear those lads chatter and to see the joy they had in their hearts, shining out in their faces!

for God knows they had not had many boat rides—they had done the most of the journey of life on foot, and bare foot. One of them said to me, "Mister, it seems to me I have seen you somewhere." Said I, "Perhaps you have; you may see me again some time." They tried to guess who I was, and I tried to guess what their names were, and after about half an hour I put them on the bank, and I really did not know whether they had given me a ride, or I had given them a ride. I think they gave me a ride! O! it was a little thing to do, but you all know the joy of having made somebody else happy.

Now, what is the use of choosing out bad amusements when there are so many innocent ones. Go forth to your healthful entertainments and recreations. Why will you stop your ears to a Heaven full of songsters in order to listen to the hiss of a dragon? Why will you turn your back on a mountain side abloom with wild flowers, and adash with glittering torrents, in order with blistered feet to climb up the hot sides of a fire-belching Cotopaxi.

I admit that

seems to open brighter than the path of Christian pleasure. The young man says, "Come, now, I am going to have a good time. Never mind the economy. I'll get money. If I can't get money one way, I'll get it another. Come on. The road is smooth. Clear out. Crack the whip." On they dash over the highway. "Fill high the cups, boys. Drink! Drink to health, drink to long life, drink to plenty of rides like this."

Hardworking men standing by the road say: "I wonder where those men got their money. We have to work. We can't do that thing. They don't work and yet they have plenty of money." They go on down in their merriment. They swear, they swagger. The midnight hears their guffaw. They jostle decent people off the sidewalk. They parody the hymn they learned at their mother's knee, and when some man draws before them the picture of their coming doom, they say, "Who cares," or to some one giving them kindly advice they say, "Who are you?"

Passing along some night in the street, you hear a shriek in a grogshop and the rattle of a watchman's club and the rush of the police. What is the matter? Killed in a grogshop fight. He is carried home and the old people come and wash the blood off of the wounds and close the eyes in death. They forgive him; although he cannot ask it now, they forgive him. And the mother will go out into her little garden and gather the sweetest flowers she can find, and she will twist them into a garland for the still heart of her wayward boy, and will push from his swollen brow the long locks which were once her pride, and the air will be rent with the father's outcry as he says: "O! my son, my son, my poor boy, would God I had died for thee. O! my son, my son, my son, my son!"

The day is coming when we will have to give for sinful amusements, if we have indulged in them, and if we have led anybody else into them. It seems a very smart thing to get into sin yourself and lead somebody else into it, does it not? So smart to get some one else into sin. There are young men who pride themselves on that. It is the pride of their life that having gone into sin they got somebody else on the same road. But they will have to answer for all this.

I see before me

A GREAT THEATRE.

It is the theatre of the Judgment. Scene, the last day. For stage, the rocky earth. Enter lords, dukes, princes, clowns, beggars. No sword, no tinsel, no crown. For footlights, the kindling flames of a world. For orchestra, the trumpets that wake the dead. For galleries, the clouds with angel spectators. For curtain, the Heavens rolled together as a scroll. For applause, the clapping hands of the sea. For tragedy, the doom of the destroyed. For farce, those that tried to serve God and serve sin at the same time. For the last scene of the fifth act, the tramp of nations to receive their doom—some to the right, some to the left!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Fallen at Her Post.—At one of the Glasgow Conference meetings, Mr. Scroggie said: "I had a letter last night telling me of the death of a dear lady who has worked a good deal with Mr. Sankey. She lived at Eyemouth, a village on the coast, and she had been working day and night among the widows and children of fishermen who were drowned in the great storm of the 14th of October last. Her friends entreated her to go away and take a rest, as she was killing herself, but she said, 'How can I go away and leave these weeping widows and fatherless children?' I saw her the day after the storm, and she told me of the many homes that were stripped of their bread-winners. She said, 'I wasn't able to speak a single word. I felt it would be like tantalizing the poor mothers and children; but I would go and sit for half an hour beside a broken-hearted widow and her children, and I would weep with them. By and by her almost ceaseless labors and anxiety severely told upon her, and she was at last persuaded to go south for a change. She got as far as Reading. On March 22d, she said she felt weary, and she would go to bed. She went to sleep and slept far into the next day. Friends thought she was getting a refreshing sleep, and would not disturb her. Going to her bedside they found that she was just breathing; she was very weak, and she never woke up again in this world. Her spirit went to be with Jesus. I have seen at Eyemouth those strong men break down and cry like children as she was singing, 'Almost persuaded.'"

The Disappointed Mariner.—Mr. Scroggie said: "I remember my brother telling me that he was once coming from the south, and in the same compartment with him there was the mate of a vessel. He had been away on one of those distant voyages, trading on the Chinese coast, and he had not seen his wife or children for three years. He was full of joy at the prospect of again meeting them. As soon as his vessel got to London, he took the first express north, and he was talking about the children the whole of the way, telling their names and saying he thought they would hardly know him; he was sure the youngest would not. At one of the stations where the tickets were looked at, the official said to our friend, 'You are in the wrong train, and must come out.' 'No,' he said, 'it's all right; I was told to get in here, and I want to be home to-night.' 'You must come out,' said the official. 'No,' said the man, 'I must be at my destination to-night,' and the railway man had almost to pull him out of the carriage. 'When shall I get a train for such-and-such a place,' he anxiously asked. 'Not till tomorrow,' said the railway servant; and my brother in telling me the incident, said he never saw such a look of sadness and disappointment on a man's face. But, oh, my friends, what is that to the Lord Jesus passing by and leaving a soul behind for eternity?"

Spiritual Twins.—Mr. Graham, who stated that on the previous Sunday he had spoken with seventeen inquirers, thirteen of whom decided for Christ, said: "Lately, at one of the meetings on the south side, I went into the inquiry-room. A man and his wife entered. They were both very anxious, and I asked them to sit down. The woman was shaking all over, and the husband said, 'Don't be agitated, dear. There is nothing to be agitated about.' Then he said he did not believe in instantaneous conversion. I said, 'I believe you will find instantaneous conversion all through the Bible.' I then began to speak to his wife. I referred her to the 53d chapter of Isaiah, and the 6th verse—'All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.' She turned round almost immediately and said, 'Oh, Jemmy, don't you see it, don't you see it?' It is laid upon Jesus—your sin and mine,' and she began to plead with her husband there and then. I thought I had been mistaken, and said, 'How long have you been a Christian?' She said, 'I have just seen it this moment,' I turned to her husband and said, 'There is instantaneous conversion sitting beside you.' This broke him down altogether, and he began to weep. She continued to plead with him, and he at once accepted Christ. They were born of God in the same hour."

In Jail for Preaching.—Mr. Bundy said: "I recollect once preaching at Toledo, in Spain. A crowd assembled, and I was trying to preach with all the strength God had given me, when a policeman told me I must not preach there, I must go where the thoroughfare would not be stopped up. I went to some distance along the street, and began again, but once more I was interfered with and told I must go elsewhere. I then took up my stand on a vacant piece of ground, and almost immediately a policeman came and seized me, and took me off to jail. I then got under the staircase and again began to speak of Christ. The officers came to me and said, 'If you will promise not to make such a disturbance and gather up such a lot of people you can go.' I said as Paul did, 'You have brought me in here publicly, and now you are going to thrust me out privately. I had been in jail a good many times in the devil's service, but this was the only time I got in for serving God; but God delivered me in a very short time, and blessed my testimony outside and inside the prison."

Why the Child Died.—"Another Inquirer was a young mother. She was very anxious, and wept much. She told me that her husband had been converted the Sunday before at the National Hall. Then she began to weep afresh, and said, 'My darling little girl died three weeks ago. My husband and I were both very careless about spiritual matters. We did not go to any place of worship, and were quite callous. But when my child died I began to think that she had gone to heaven, and if I did not become a Christian I should never see her again. I could not bear to think of that; and I have been very much troubled since. Perhaps she was taken away from us to recall to our minds the reality of a death and of eternity.' That mother went away rejoicing in Christ."

A Wife's Solicitude Rewarded.—A Lady said that she induced her husband to attend a service at the Temperance Institute, and while he was there she was praying earnestly that he might get light, and be led to Christ. On his return home he announced that he had been converted, and he was trusting in the Saviour. The happy wife found that her husband was "born again" at the very moment she was praying for him.

A Sceptic's Mesmerism.—At the Young Converts' Meeting, U. P. Church, Berkeley Street, March 28th, an intelligent man said: "I am changed from my indifference and scepticism to a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, in whom I did not at one time believe. I spoke to a friend on the subject of my conversion, and he flippantly said, 'It is mesmerism—Mr. Moody has mesmerized you.' I said, 'If mesmerism can convict one of sin, can create a desire for holiness, can create a wish to walk after righteousness, praise the Lord for mesmerism! but it is the grace of God, and you will perhaps find that out some day.'"

A Young Man's Confession.—"This Day four weeks I was led into this church in great anxiety about my soul, but I did not see my way to Christ that night. I went home, and my dear wife, who is a Christian, endeavored to lead me to the Saviour. On the following night I went to another meeting, and Mr. Moody said: 'Those who are willing to take Christ just simply say, "I will";' and after a few others had accepted the kind challenge, and taken Christ in that way, I followed their example. Since that time I have been filled with an inconceivable joy. This night fortnight I came here with the intention of confessing Christ, but I hadn't the courage to do so at the first meeting, though I did it at the second, and I felt burdened because I had not had more courage. I wish now, therefore, to say I have found Christ, and He is unspeakably precious to my soul."

Drunk for Eight Years.—A Respectable young man said: "For sixteen years I was a drunkard, and for eight of those years I was almost every day more or less intoxicated. It is two years ago on the 11th of April since the Rev. Mr. Hutcheson came to my house and asked me if I would simply trust Jesus as my Saviour, and ask Him to take away the craving for strong drink? I said, 'I will,' for I was needing something to save me as I could neither eat nor sleep. But God in His infinite mercy at once renewed my appetite. I asked the minister how I should get on afterwards and he said, 'Watch and pray—trust the Lord.' I said, 'Am I to pray continually?' He said, 'Yes, pray without ceasing.' I did so, and I have been kept ever since. Fourteen months after I had been a teetotaler, I lost the craving for tobacco. The first time I was drunk was when I was thirty years of age. I won a stake in the St. Leger horse race, and in this way got hold of a large sum of money, and an old man said, 'You had better spend a pound for the table.' But, thank God that sort of thing is all over now."

Another Son of Bacchus Saved.—Mr. Simpson said: "At the meeting for the intemperate at the Circus, on Saturday night, one hundred and eleven anxious souls stood up desirous of finding Jesus as their Saviour, and about four hundred of the audience declared to have done with drinking. The case of the reclamation of a great drunkard has just been mentioned; I should like to repeat another. It is that of a man who was at the meeting on Saturday night week, who had been on the 'spree' since the Fast Day. Night and day he had been drinking. Three of his neighbors brought him to the meeting, but he went away undecided. On Tuesday night last, a friend was looking for some one to speak to, when this inveterate drunkard was pointed out to him. Some Christians were speaking to him, and my friend brought under his notice and explained to him the last three verses of the 6th chapter of 2d Corinthians, and before the closing sentence was reached, the poor drunkard found Christ as his Saviour. On Saturday night last he came again, his face beaming with joy, desiring to give thanks to God for having saved him from such an iniquitous curse, with so great salvation."

THE MAN CHILD.

Revelation 12:5.

The Main Incidents in Christ's Life Repetitive Visible Church Symbolized by the "Woman". The Divine Seed the Invisible Church yet to be Manifested—The Mystic Man Child must be Jewish—Objections to Dr. Seiss's Interpretation—Dr. De Burgh's Criticism—The Birth of the Man Child a yet Future Event—The Translation of the 144,000—"A Great Sign"—The Double Fulfilment—(1) The Ascension of Christ Personal—(2) The Ascension of Christ Mystic—Predicted Power and Rule.

CERTAIN Christian mystics, both ancient and modern, have held that the life of Christ, at least in its main incidents, is to be repeated alike in the history of the Christian Church and the experience of the individual believer. And this idea, though it may at first sight appear somewhat strange, will upon reflection be found to contain a large measure of truth. Although not distinctly stated in the pages of Holy Writ, it nevertheless belongs to the class of spiritual analogies in which, as in curiously wrought caskets, so much of the hidden treasure of Scripture is to be discovered by the scribe well instructed unto the Kingdom of Heaven.

For example, the analogy above suggested gives us the key, as I apprehend, to the interpretation of the vision contained in Revelation 12 respecting the Woman, the Man Child, and the great Red Dragon.

Dr. Anderson, in his work "The Coming Prince," says, "I purposely pass over chapter 11: because of the exceptional difficulties which attend the interpretation of it," and feels himself compelled to fall back, as "the only reasonable interpretation he has seen, on that of the late Dea Alford, who regards the 'Man Child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron,' and who was 'caught up to God and His throne,' as being the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Woman as representing that people 'of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came' (Rom. 9:5); though he has to admit that the objections to this view are considerable: 'First, past historical facts are thus introduced into a vision of the future, and I am not aware of any other instance of this in Scripture. Secondly, the main features of the vision, after verse 5, are not accounted for by the facts." (P. 181.)

Dean Alford's confidence in the correctness of the view which he adopts is very strong. "The Man Child," he writes, "is the Lord Jesus Christ, and none other." "And," he adds, "this result is a most important one for the fixity of reference of the whole prophecy. It forms one of those landmarks by which the legitimacy of various interpretations may be tested; and of which we may say, notwithstanding the contradiction sure to be given to the saying, that every interpretation which oversteps them is thereby convicted of error. Again, the exigencies of this passage require that the birth should be understood literally and historically, of that birth of which all Christians know."*

Now, so far as the supposition goes, that the vision of the bringing forth of the Man Child includes a reference to the historical birth of the personal Christ, Dean Alford's position seems to me to be unassailable; but that its interpretation must be thus restricted by no means follows; nor, indeed, for the reasons assigned by Dr. Anderson, as well as others, can it be established.

THE REV. SEISS'S VIEW.

But, let us turn for a moment to some of the alternative interpretations which have been suggested, such as that of Dr. Seiss, who affirms, with a confidence equal to Dean Alford's, that the Man Child symbolizes the true or invisible Church.

He says: "The Church of God exists, or is to be contemplated, in a twofold form: First, in the wide or general form of the whole congregation of those joined together in the confession of the Divine Word, and in the observance of the Divine rites and ordinances; and, second, in the narrower form, which embraces only those who are true believers, and are really the children of God; 'for all are not Israel who are of Israel.' In the one view the Church is a visible body, made such by the having of an outward call of God, by joining in an external fellowship, and by the use of the outward means and instruments through which God collects and edifies His Church. This we call the visible Church, or the Church in that aspect of it in which it is recognizable by man, and becomes a subject of human history. It is the Church thus viewed—that is, the general congregation of God's confessing people—that is symbolized by this wonderful Woman.

"With this assembly, however, many are outwardly connected whom the Holy Ghost has not regenerated, and who are not in reality the genuine children of God. A very great difference therefore exists between such members and those who have fully entered into their calling, and become partakers of that spiritual renewal and enlightenment which makes them truly the children and elect of God. . . . And this inner and narrower circle of the professed people of God we call the invisible Church; not because its members are not as visible as any others, nor yet as a Church separate and apart from the visible Church; but with respect to that feature in their case, that we cannot now see and certainly decide as to the fact of their being of the regenerate and elect.

"Now if the Woman (in this twelfth chapter of the Revelation) is the visible Church, who can that divine seed which she carries and nurtures within her body be but just these genuine children of God, whose characteristics are yet hidden, and who are only to be manifested at the great day, to wit, the invisible Church. Those who constitute the invisible Church are in the visible Church and for the present are still joined to the visible Church as the most important part thereof. They are her chief treasure. The visible Church exists for their begetting and nurture. Where she is, they are also. It is with them that she ever travails and cries out, and agonizes herself, that they may be brought safely to the birth and manifestation as the sons of God. The picture is as true and exact as it is beautiful, and as true of one age and dispensation as it is of another. Nor is there a single item in the whole case which does not go to strengthen the overpowering proof that this is what we are to understand by this mystic Child."

"The circumstances narrated hitherto have their locus on earth, and in particular Judea and Jerusalem: but at verse 19 the scene changes, for we read: 'And the Temple of God was opened in Heaven,' etc., while the same is the scene of the vision of chapter twelve, which, evidently in continuation, thus commences: 'And there appeared a great wonder in Heaven.' Where—in this last verse of chapter eleven—I would say we have also a distinct intimation that the Jewish people are concerned in the vision which follows—in the mention of 'the Ark of the Testament (or Covenant)' seen in the Temple opened in Heaven."† Hence we see that the Man Child must, in a certain sense, be Jewish, and that His birth only takes place after the sounding of the seventh trumpet.

OBJECTIONS WHICH MAY BE URGED.

One objection of a general character to Dr. Seiss's interpretation is this, that it is not the usage of the New Testament to attribute either regeneration (=conception), or resurrection (=birth) to the Church. Believers are born again of the Holy Spirit—not of the Church, and to regard the "visible Church" as our mother, or to talk of "Holy Mother Church" savors far more of Romanism and Lutheranism, than of Scripture. It is an altogether un-Scriptural conception, at the root of which lies, as a concealed but cankerous worm, the false and pernicious dogma of baptismal regeneration. "Except a man be born from above he cannot see the kingdom of God." "That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that body, being many, are one body: so also is Christ. For by one Spirit were we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have all been made to drink into one Spirit" (John 3:36; 1 Cor. 12:12-13). Even when St. Paul speaks of "Jerusalem which is above and free; which is our Mother" (Gal. 4:26), he is speaking of a city and a covenant, not of the visible Church on earth. Another objection to Dr. Seiss's interpretation is that he regards the birth of the Man Child as to be fulfilled in the resurrection and rapture of the saints at Christ's Second Advent. He seems to forget, however, that about that time "the visible Church" will become "the apostasy," which Christ has "spued out of His mouth" (Rev. 3:16), and whose true portrait is to be found in the harlot of chapter 17, rather than in the Divine and heavenly woman of this vision, who is clothed with the sun," and has "the moon under her feet," and whose brow is encircled by a diadem of twelve lustrous "stars."

As regards the identification of this woman with the Church of God, Dr. de Burgh advances an objection more apparent than real—viz., the circumstance of the Dragon's persecution of the Woman's remaining seed, after her own retirement into the place prepared for her of God. "For how," as he asks, "can the Church (the woman) be in safety from the Dragon, and her members (the remnant of her seed) at the same time exposed to his power?"

Still, if the identification of the Man Child with the true Christian Church—the mystical body of Christ—be accepted as only partial, and confined mainly to the period of the first resurrection, there is doubtless a measure of truth contained in it, inasmuch as, in accordance with the pregnant analogy referred to at the commencement of this paper the history of Christ personal is—in a certain degree—repeated in the history of Christ mystical.

THE REAL EXPLANATION OF THE MYSTERY.

The real fact is that the birth of the Man Child must find its final and exhaustive accomplishment in some event which is yet future.

The Man Child represents the "hundred and forty and four thousand" sealed ones of Revelation 14 (not chapter 7, who are Jews) to whom it shall be granted to "rule the nations with a rod of iron," according to the Lord's promise in chapter 2:27; and who shall be placed out of the reach of the Dragon watching for their destruction, by being literally "caught up to God and His throne," in other words, translated at the first stage of Christ's coming in the air, in accordance with Isaiah 26:20: "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself, as it were, for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast." They are seen, in Revelation 14, "standing on the Mount Zion," that is, "the heavenly Jerusalem," see Heb. 12:22; and "singing a new song before the throne." This is somewhat the view taken by the Rev. Richard Chester, and also by Dr. de Burgh, in his "Exposition of the Revelation," fifth edition; though these writers differ in what may be called points of detail.

The appearance in heaven of the woman who gives birth to the Man Child is spoken of at the commencement of the chapter as "a great sign." It is, the apostle tells us, in the first place, a sign, σημεῖον, a word which occurs here for the first time in the Apocalypse, and which signifies not simply that the object to which it is applied is a "wonder," as the Authorized Version has it, but the adumbration of some spiritual reality, or actual event belonging to the future. And we are further informed that it was "a great (μέγα) sign." In itself the vision, as the seer beheld it, was of a very sublime and imposing character: "A woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars." Let a painter try to embody the description, and it will at once be seen how remarkable and impressive was the spectacle. But the "greatness" of this sign must properly be understood in reference to the person or event signified. Hence the calling out and rapture of a Jewish remnant in the last days, as supposed by some, will not meet the necessities of the case; the vision is too sublime, the imagery too splendid, the accompanying events too momentous to be thus exhausted.

A well-known scientific writer has described the production of what he calls a "generalized portrait" by the combination of many particular portraits. "I threw," he says, "magic-lantern portraits of different persons on the top of one another, on the same screen, and elicited a resultant face which resembled no one of the components in particular, but included all. Whatever was common to all the portraits became intensified by combination; whatever was peculiar to each portrait was relatively too faint to attract attention, and virtually disappeared." In like manner, if we regard the present vision of the Man Child as finding a partial fulfilment in the birth and ascension of the personal Christ, and its plenary fulfilment in the separation and detachment of 144,000 watchful, living Christians (the wise virgins) from among the general body of true Christians, and their ascension to God's throne, we shall attain the comprehensive meaning of the Divinely-suggestive symbol.

TWO HARMONIZING INTERPRETATIONS.

We thus have the two separate interpretations, as it were, one on the top of another, and the light of Divine inspiration shining through both of them. There is a double fulfilment, year-day and literal-day. First, the ascension of Christ personal about 500 years before the 1260 years of the Papal Antichrist's chief power; and secondly, the ascension of Christ mystical (the 144,000 wise virgins) about 500 days before the 1260 days of the future democratic infidel Antichrist's chief power.

Of the personal Man Child Christ we read, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." So, also, of saints it is said, in the 149th Psalm: "Let the saints be joyful in glory; let them sing aloud upon their beds. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the judgment written: this honor have all His saints" (Ver. 5-9). And in Rev. 2:27, "To him that overcometh will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate, after a Protracted Contest, Confirmed the nomination of Colonel Worthington to be Collector of the Port of Boston, Mass., on Monday, May 15th, by a vote of 38 to 14. The nomination has been the subject of more comment than other appointments, because of its similarity to the famous struggle over the New York Collectorship. On this occasion the protest against the appointment arose from the section of the party which in the New York case were gratified by the change. It was contended, however, by those Senators who voted for confirmation, that the cases were not precisely parallel, inasmuch as Colonel Merritt was displaced to make room for Judge Robertson, whereas Colonel Worthington succeeds an officer whose term had expired. Senators who opposed the confirmation, however, urged that all nominations made on the principle that dictated that of Colonel Worthington and Judge Robertson are objectionable. It was, however, noticed that Senator Miller, of New York, who owes his elevation to the dispute over Judge Robertson, on this occasion voted against confirmation, although he is not reported as having explained his apparent inconsistency.

New Indictments Against the Star Route conspirators were returned on May 20th, by the Grand Jury of the Criminal Court of the District of Columbia. These have become necessary owing to discovery of defects in those now set down for trial, which will be dismissed in favor of the new presentments. The charges are substantially the same in both cases, but four allegations of overt acts, committed outside of the statute of limitations, have been omitted. Twelve new overt acts have been inserted, the acts being in making fraudulent claims against the government based on the fraudulent allowance for increase allowed by Second Assistant Postmaster-General Brady. The name of J. L. Sanderson is omitted from the list of the accused. Mr. Rerdell will be included, as he still persists in his refusal to surrender the books and documents he formerly offered to Mr. MacVeagh, who for some unaccountable reason neglected to accept the offer, and so failed to obtain possession of the most conclusive evidence it was possible to present to the court.

An Important Report from the Committee on Civil Service was presented to the Senate by Senator Pendleton on May 15th, urging the adoption of the bill reported in March last. The report expatiates on the evil influence the spoils system exerts upon the President; it maintains that instead of devoting his time to great questions of statesmanship he must spend most of it in weighing in the balance the political considerations that shall determine the claim of this friend or that political supporter to the possession of some office of profit or honor under him. The President of the Republic conceived by the Constitution and the Chief Magistrate of to-day, it is maintained, are two entirely different public functionaries. There has grown up such a perversion of the duties of the Presidential office, such a prostitution of it to ends unworthy the great idea of its creation, imposing burdens so grievous and so degrading to all the faculties and functions becoming its occupant, that a change has already occurred in the character of the government itself, which, if not corrected, will be permanent and disastrous. In this department the report avers "political influences and compensations have come to dominate and subordinate all other considerations, and the distribution of official spoils has come to be the lawful prerogative of political ascendancy. Offices have come to be sought and bestowed as so many charities, furnishing support to the needy, and exacting in return partisan service, not as so many trusts, imposing duties on the holders." These facts were notorious before the report was presented, but it is well that they should be thus officially placed on record.

The Approaching Season is Awaited with some anxiety by the medical scientists in the South. A prominent journal thus remarks on the apprehensions of an outbreak of yellow fever: "Below the thirty-fourth parallel there has been practically no winter, and the spring has been early, warm, and humid. Besides, a vast territory has been inundated, which, when the waters retire, will expose an unusual amount of dead vegetable matter to the ferment of summer. Three of the conditions supposed to favor the development of yellow fever are thus found to be present. The past three years have been unmarked by yellow fever in the United States, and therefore the germs of previous epidemics must be viewed as now dead. If, then, yellow fever is strictly an exotic, it only depends upon a vigilant quarantine maintained throughout the season to insure that the summer will pass without a case of local origin. If, on the contrary, despite the gates of import being barred, sporadic cases appear in the Gulf States, it must be acknowledged that the disease is no longer an alien, but has permanent settlement in the United States, subject only to climatic conditions for its periodical outbreaks. This being once established, the efforts of the authorities should be directed to the improvement of local sanitary conditions rather than to cutting off commerce during one-half the year."

The Rev. C. F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., as President of the School of Christian Philosophy, has, with the assistance of the committee of able men who have joined the school since its session last summer, prepared a very attractive programme for this year. The session will be held again in the Warwick Woodlands on Greenwood Lake, which have been much improved and beautified since last year. The lecture course includes the names of Professor George P. Fisher, of Yale, Dr. Lyman Abbott, W. Morris Butler, of Middletown, Professor George T. Ladd, of Yale, Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie, Dr. Washington Gladden, of Springfield, Professor Charles A. Young, Dr. Francis L. Patton, of Princeton, Professor Noah K. Davis, of the University of Virginia, and Professor John Bascom, of the University of Wisconsin. The session will commence July 11th, and will hold meetings daily, morning and evening, until July 25th. In these days of scientific scepticism, it is impossible to place too high a value on the work of this school, proving as it does that scientific knowledge and culture are in no way antagonistic to simple Christian faith.

The Unanimous Decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the assassin Guiteau, was announced on Monday, May 22d. The only point in the bill of exceptions presented by Guiteau's counsel on which it was feared there might be a divergence of opinion was that of the jurisdiction of the court, owing to the President having died in New Jersey. But on that point the judgment is very explicit. It is thus summarized by the Washington Post, "The Court holds that the bullet fired at the President by Guiteau on the 2d of July, at the railroad station in this city, was the cause of death, and that the trial could only have been held in Washington; that the death of the President New Jersey, except as affected by a local statute, could not change the jurisdiction. The assassin had not been in New Jersey, had committed no offence against New Jersey laws, and the fact of the victim being removed to Elberon prolonged his life or save it if possible, could not be made to affect the character of the crime." The Post further says: "After the delivery of the opinion the prisoner will be taken at once to a solitary cell in the jail where he is now confined and placed under a continual guard, better known as death-watch. Every action will be observed up to the fatal moment and not a word will be permitted to be spoken to him except by his spiritual adviser or by persons specially authorized by the ward. General Crocker, who has entire charge of and responsibility for the assassin, from this time on until his execution." The miserable man has written another letter repeating the blasphemous claim he proclaimed at his trial, that his act was inspired.

A Reformatory for Inebriate Women about to be opened in Chicago. A journal that city says: "The directors of the Washington Home, of Chicago, have purchased the military school property at Lake View, and will fit it up as a reformatory for inebriate women. The demand for such an institution has appeared in application for the admission of women to the reformatory in the city. In Boston the women's inebriate reformatory has 249 inmates, and is doing a successful work. It is startling to find so many women in this country seeking the help of such an institution, in trying to escape the ruinous appetite drink."

An Invitation to Messrs. Moody and Sank to return to Chicago has been extensively signed that city. The movement originated with the Evangelistic Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, and on a recent Sunday the invitation was offered for signature in the churches of the city. President Magoun, in presenting the matter at the First Church, in Dr. Goodwin's absence, spoke of recently meeting the evangelists England, and of his impression that such an invitation would be favorably entertained by them. The Methodist ministers in their weekly meeting heartily indorsed the call and pledged co-operation.

A Confidential Retired Liquor Dealer has some curious disclosures to a Times reporter last week which ought to interest all who do not abstain from intoxicants. He said in the course of his conversation: "If I should give you the trick of the trade and with my name this city would be a hot place for me. But few liquor drinkers have the faintest idea in regard to the extent of the evil of adulteration. For instance, more than two thirds of the stuff sold for brandy in this country is the meanest kind of poison. It is manufactured from an oil of cognac. Gin is considered a safe drink by thousands, who believe that it is the only liquor which escapes adulteration. They are mistaken. In most of the gin sold there will be four parts of vitriol, oil of turpentine, oil of almonds, sulphuric ether, and extract of grains of paradise. It is in the manufacture of whiskey, however, that the adulterators do their finest work. You can purchase oils and essences from which 'whiskey of any age' can be produced. This style of whiskey when tested will show sulphuric acid, caustic potassa, benzene, and nux vomica, and other poisons. This is the sort of stuff that bores into the coatings of the stomach and creates ulcers. I porter you will find opium, henbane, capsicum, cocculus indicus, copperas, tobacco, and sulphuric acid. In beer, alum, opium, nux vomica, green copperas, vitriol, sub-carbonate of potash, and jalap are used. Of course, ale of this character is dangerous to drink. If you don't believe me, drop in at any of the beer shops near the wharves of the East or North Rivers and drink one of the 'schooners' that are sold for five cents. If it does not produce complete nausea it will surely cause intoxication." We have plenty of opportunities of observing the evil moral effects of these intoxicants; these revelations show how fearful must be the physical damage they effect.

A Momentous Quarter of an Hour was Spent by a farmer on May 1st at Cumberland, Md. He went to the city from his home thirty miles off to purchase a plough. On his way back to the depot he passed the room where the special services in connection with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad work are conducted. Mr. George A. Hilton, who has throughout interested himself in these services, thus describes what followed. "As the farmer passed the door with his plough on his shoulder he stayed to read the notice of the meeting, and having to wait fifteen minutes until the western express train started, set his plough down at the door, and came in to spend the spare time. He had not listened many minutes before he was upon his knees seeking earnestly for forgiveness, and the result was that when he started again for his home he went rejoicing in the possession of seed that no farm can produce and no money buy."

A Five-Figure Cheque on a Shingle was once cashed by a bank at Oakland, Cal. The incident is recalled by the death, on May 1st, of Mr. Joseph C. Palmer, the gentleman who drew the cheque. Mr. Palmer, in the early days of California, was a member of the firm of Palmer, Cook & Co., a bank which did an immense business. It is related that once a depositor called to draw twenty-eight thousand dollars from the bank. Mr. Palmer's consent was necessary, but he had been called away to attend to some duty at a lumber yard some mile or more from the bank. Thither the depositor hastened and made known his wants and the necessity of having them attended to at once. Mr. Palmer could find neither pen, pencil, ink, or paper. But without a moment's hesitation he picked up a shingle, borrowed a piece of red chalk, and with it wrote a cheque on the shingle in large and distinct letters for $28,000. This was promptly honored when presented. It is probably the only instance on record of such a cheque being drawn and honored; but in this case the paying teller accepted the instructions of his principal, though conveyed in an unusual manner, without hesitation. Would that Christian men were as ready to obey the intimations of God's will, even if they are revealed in unlooked-for ways and are opposed to preconceived notions. The apostle Peter showed this readiness on one memorable occasion (Acts 10: 10-23).

A Letter Arrived at Milwaukee, Wis., on May 10th, which had gone astray from its destination about five thousand miles. It was mailed at Mannheim in Germany, and was written to a person residing at Warbheim, a place only a few miles off; but owing to a defect in the address it was put in the American mail bag and sent to Milwaukee, whence it was sent back to Germany. It may be hoped that after its journey of ten thousand miles it will eventually reach the person for whom it was intended. The writer of the letter, receiving no answer, is not at all unlikely to blame the person to whom he wrote, or the post-office, or any one but himself, until his blunder is exposed. When we hear men say that they do not get answers to their prayers we may well question whether they have made a similar blunder in not observing the conditions on which alone God will answer prayer (Heb. 10: 22).

A Sorrowful Scene was Witnessed on Saturday last in Jerry McAuley's Mission Hall. There, surrounded by tearful faces, was laid a coffin in which were the remains of a victim of vice. Dr. North, who conducted the funeral services, briefly sketched the sad history of the dead girl. He said she was only twenty-eight years old when she died. She had been brought up in the fear and love of God, was well educated, and had been a Sunday-school teacher at Greenbush, near Albany, where she resided with parents who were most loving and kind to her, up to her marriage, four years ago, when she came with her husband to reside in New York. Here temptation and trouble came upon her, and by stages, easily understood by those who have labored among the fallen, she drifted into a haunt of vice in a notorious locality in the city. As long as she retained her beauty and her health she was held in this mundane hell, and, as she told with a loathing terror, obliged to witness scenes which filled even her, fallen as she was and for most of the time under the influence of liquor, with horror and disgust. At length the usual result of dissipation came in a sudden breakdown of health. Then she was cast into the street under the escort of a servant, who was instructed to take her to a groggery, fill her with liquor and leave her to die. On hearing this she clung to the servant's arm and begged to be taken to some Christian people. She was eventually conducted to Jerry McAuley's Mission. There her cries were heartrending. "I am lost, lost," she said. "Pray for me, if God will have mercy on such a one as I." Mrs. McAuley talked and prayed with her, and succeeded in calming her agitation and directing her to the Saviour. After a while she said: "Mrs. McAuley, I am dying; can you find me a place to lay my weary head and quietly end my shameful life?" On hearing this Mrs. McAuley said: "Yes, poor child, I will see you cared for to the last." Mrs. McAuley took her to the Magdalen Home, where she remained until she died. She was sensible up to the last moment of her life, and was not only peaceful, but joyous in her faith that Christ had forgiven her sins.

"The Christian Army," Organized by Bishop Fallows, of the Reformed Episcopal Church, is engaged in work closely resembling in object and methods the Salvation Army in England. The bishop reports that the army in Chicago is now reaching at least two thousand different persons a week, and that during the few months since its organization not less than two hundred and fifty persons have been hopefully converted.

A Life was Sacrificed for a Dog in Chicago recently. The Chicago Tribune says that a woman sixty-four years of age was crossing the North Western track when a train approached. The woman cleared the track with some difficulty, but looking back she saw her pet dog still in front of the approaching train. She turned, and reaching over, seized the animal and flung it out of the reach of danger. But in doing so she overbalanced, and falling was crushed under the engine wheels. There is something very sad in such a calamity, and it is impossible to avoid regretting that the woman should not have held her own life more precious than to imperil it for that of a dog, however dear it may have been to her. It is, however, only another instance of affection lavished on unworthy objects which is but too common; and it often happens that the soul, which is of far more value than natural life, is sacrificed rather than some cherished passion shall be surrendered (Matt. 5: 28, 29).

Poisoned by the Thorn of a Rose is the strange cause assigned for the death of a citizen in New York, who expired in great agony on May 10th. On Sunday, April 30th, while arranging a bouquet on his dinner-table, he scratched his thumb on one of the thorns on the stem of a rosebud. At the time he did not notice it, nor were the three trifling scratches on the thumb discovered until he began to feel pain some hours afterward. Within twenty-four hours from the time of the infliction of the wound inflammation set in, and the scratches developed into painful wounds. The family physician, was called, and, despite the best known methods of treatment, erysipelas set in, and was followed by abscesses of the hand and the lower part of the forearm. Other physicians were called in consultation, the abscesses were lanced; but, though every treatment that modern surgical and medical science has devised in such cases was tried, blood poisoning resulted. Intense suffering followed, which continued until he died. Whether the injury from the rose-thorn was the absolute cause of disease and death the attending physicians will not state as a certainty, though no other local cause leading to the final result can be ascertained. It is probable that the seeds of disease were already in his system, which the trifling injury only served to develop. Analogous cases are often met with in moral and spiritual life. An amusement usually regarded as harmless, a glass of wine offered in friendship, may be the cause of arousing a demon within, which, like a tiger that has tasted blood, rages until the victim is destroyed (1 Cor. 8: 13).

MY HOURLY PRAYER.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
"Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe; and I will have respect unto Thy statutes continually."—Psalm 119: 117.

Two Notes from the Same Bell—Prayers the Shadows of Coming Blessings—I. The Upholding—A Danger Implied—The Believer Upright—The Way Slippery—Hell Place on the Grimsel Pass—Cunning Foes—The Height to which God Elevates—Most People do not Keep Upright—How God Keeps His People Upright—By Angels—By the Ministry—By Chastisement—By Constant Occupation—II. Two Blessed Results—Safety—From all Real Harm—From Grievous Sin—Safe in his Dealings—Watchfulness—Heedless and Too Bold—Must be Continual—Prayer in Business and Recreation—Nervous People—In Prosperity and Adversity—In Old Age—In Death.

"HOLD thou me up." This is no novelty as a prayer; we have met with it many a time. Another form of it lies hard by. Look at the verse immediately before the text, and see it there in another shape. "Uphold me." I know of no difference in the two prayers, "Uphold me" and "Hold me up;" they are two notes from the same bell, and they teach us that the Psalmist's mind was full of the petition, for he was conscious of his need of this upholding—this holding up.

You notice that in the first prayer "Uphold me," it is for very life that he entreats for this upholding. "Uphold me according unto Thy word, that I may live; and let me not be ashamed of my hope." He feels that unless fresh grace shall flow into his soul his spiritual life must utterly fail. Do not forget this; let it give weight to your pleadings. But in the second of the two verses—the one which makes our text—he looks for more than life as the result of upholding; he looks for safety, a life of unsullied holiness and consequent restfulness and security. "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe, and I will have respect unto Thy statutes continually." Both verses show you the importance of the prayer, and both together will, I hope, enlist your earnest attention to what I may have to say upon it.

A prayer is the shadow of a coming blessing. Therefore do we pray, because the blessing is coming. It is said that prayer cannot alter the purpose of God. Of course it cannot. It does not alter it, but indicates it; and since people are moved to pray this way or that way by the Spirit of God, it is because the Spirit knows the mind of God, and his movement to pray is a revelation of the mind of God to the praying one.

Now, I conceive that it is always according to God's mind to hold His servants up. He delights not in their slips or falls—to suppose such a thing were blasphemous. "The steps of a good man are ordered of the Lord." God is pleased with the steadfastness of His chosen, He smiles upon the firmness of their standing. God would not have one of His people even dash his foot against a stone, and hence He sets the angels to guard them. If they do trip in their walk He is quick to restore them, for He cannot endure that they should lie in the mire.

This prayer shows in David a great sense of the need of being upheld, a strong conviction that God could uphold him, and an expectation and hope that He would surely do so in answer to his prayer. May we appropriate this prayer with somewhat of David's feeling, deeply conscious of utter helplessness, fully believing that the omnipotent grace of God can meet that helplessness, and confident that He will hear our cry and answer us and uphold us to the end. Let us believe that our heavenly Father will keep us from falling, but let us be well assured that apart from His keeping our soul will fall, and great will be the fall thereof.

First I shall speak of God's holding us up, and then of the two blessings that come out of it, namely, safety and watchfulness. "I shall be safe," and "I shall have respect unto Thy statutes continually."

I. First, then.

UPHOLDING

—God's holding us up. It implies a danger, an that danger takes many forms.

The true description of a believing man's life is, that he walks in his uprightness. The figure is not hard to understand. "God made man upright, though He hath sought out many inventions." The very form and figure of man's body teach us that we are not made to go on "all fours," gazing at the earth from whence we sprang, but erect upon our feet, looking upward to the heaven toward which we tend by God's rich grace. You know what is meant by an upright man, a man who does not lean this way or that, and who is not biassed or inclined to that which is wrong. The upright column is the only one which can stand alone, and he who is upright is independent, taking his stand, maintaining his place without a buttress to keep him in it. A very pillar of the earth is such a man. He may say, like David, "The earth is dissolved: I bear up the pillars thereof."

So have I seen amid vast masses of surrounding ruin a goodly pillar lift its capital aloft as if it laughed at destruction. There is something bright and cheering about the thought of the believer being an upright man; but the danger is that he many not continue upright. Columns, slowly undermined, lean to this side or that, and their fall is near. Unseen earthworms sink the hidden bases of pillars and cast them down, and secret vices have thus brought down full many a noble character.

A Christian man is a pilgrim, and he makes progress in his march to glory so long as he walks uprightly. But will he keep his uprightness? No; he is certain not to keep upright unless he be upheld, for

THE WAY IS SLIPPERY.

Ah, how slippery do some find it! It is as a hill of ice, and at some points it is more treacherous than usual. Those who have ever gone over the Grimsel Pass will remember that on one side of it, in descending, there is a place they call "Hell Place," because the road is narrow and shelving, and the precipice on that side is exceedingly deep, while the path is singularly smooth. Drippings of rain water, and sometimes considerable runnels, flow over the red rock, and keep it polished as the floor of a royal salon; and though they chip out grips across the road that there may be a foothold, yet most travellers find it best to leave their mules and tread with timid footsteps over the slippery way. I have a lively recollection of that marble floor; I think they called it porphyry, but it had no charms for me.

Most of us have had a "Hell Place" in our journey to heaven. You remember Joseph's slippery way, and how God upheld him, else had he fallen, never to rise. David had the like, and his fall was grievous. I say that there is scarce a man who has not had some glassy bit of road where, at the best, his feet had almost gone, his steps had well-nigh slipped, and he had been down on his face if almighty grace had not interposed. Nor is the best part of the road without its dangers. Believe me, no foot of the way is safe to the careless. I have noticed that more men sin without temptation than with it, and that the heaviest falls occur upon perfectly level road where there does not seem to be a stone to catch the foot. Oh, take heed! Take heed! for there is not one point in the journey, from the setting out at the wicket-gate even till you reach the river's brink, which has not dangers in it; and the prayer is always in season, "Hold Thou me up!"

But that is not all, for there are

that seek to trip us up. They lay snares for us; they dig pits; they cast their nets across the way.

Perhaps some of you are happily free from temptations in your own households, and possibly some are free from distinct temptation from the world. I congratulate you; but very few of us are in that condition. Our foes compass us about like bees. Some threaten; others flatter. A few would bribe us; more would bully us. The bad would deceive, for they put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter; and the best of men, if you follow them too closely, may mislead you. Trust ye not in any brother; neither lay hands upon any human guide. There is One that can conduct you safely, but if you do not follow Him you will soon slip with your feet.

Many watch for our halting; and if they could find us tripping they would report it with glee to all the sons of Belial. Therefore have we good need to say, "Hold Thou me up." Specially is there such need to those of you who work in shops where ungodliness is in the ascendant so that religion is held in ridicule. Great need is there in the cases of children of ungodly parents with a father who will, if he can find you doing a little amiss, make a great deal of it. Equal necessity is there to you young men who meet with conceited coxcombs who talk philosophy and rail at our old-fashioned faith. You should pray, "Lord, hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe."

Nor is this all, though it is quite enough; for sometimes, dear friends, the difficulty of keeping our balance is not caused by the way itself, but by the height to which God may elevate us. There are brethren whose position is high, whose brain might long ago have reeled had not infinite mercy held them up. I know those who have not a tenth of their popularity or a hundredth part of their influence, who nevertheless give themselves mighty airs. These lofty-minded gentlemen are in the greatest danger. Let me speak of these grandees; with all due reverence let me take them at their own value for once, though I should be sorry to be forced to complete the purchase.

My dear friend, when you are getting on in the world and prospering, something whispers, "You are a clever fellow," and when you have won respect by your talent, then again a voice sweetly sings, "You are a highly superior person." At such times you are in serious peril. It happens to most of us at times to have done so well as to have won the approbation of our little circle; and then the temptation is quite great enough—though it comes not from thousands, or even from hundreds, but from half-dozens—for us to feel that we are somebody; then the brain grows dizzy, and the danger is great. Anything which leads to self-esteem leads to the utmost jeopardy. If you have a lowly opinion of yourself, I congratulate you; for this is a main element of safety.

The prayer is all the more needful for one other reason, namely, that the most of people do not keep upright. Go forth into the world to-morrow.

BORROW THE LANTERN

of Diogenes, and try if you can find an honest man. You will succeed, but when you have done so, take security for his keeping so. On the exchange, in the market, almost everywhere, the bulk of men are not upright, they are down on all fours. There is a great gold scramble, and they are clutching at it with all their might. Get money. Get money. Is not that the world's own favorite teaching—get it honestly if you can; but, if you cannot get it in that way, get it how you can. Puff; lie; cheat; do anything; only make a fortune. He is the cleverest fellow who can grasp the most gold. That is the picture of the business world—a nursery floor of grown-up children scrambling on all fours.

But you say—they do not lie. No, no; only white lies. No, they do not cheat; only it is "the custom of the trade," you know. "Now, do not talk," they say to me, "what do you know about it?" More than you think, perhaps, for lookers-on see more than players. "But, sir, business is business." I know it is, and business has no business to be such business as it often is. Woe to the man whose business will destroy his soul. Woe, double woe to the man whose business destroys the bodies and souls of drunkards! Woe three times over to the wretch who fattens on the iniquities of his fellow men, and gets rich by their damnation, and yet pretends to religion!

But I am wandering; it is because so many people lean this way, or that way, or go altogether on all fours, that it is not the easiest thing in this world for a man to stand bolt upright. He ought to say, "If the world's fate hung on a lie, and I by speaking the lie could save it, I would speak the truth." If our life depended upon doing what God would not approve, we ought rather to die than sin. Such should be the resolve of the believer, and he should ask for grace to carry it out. Lord, hold Thou me up; keep me upright. Whatever happens, do not let me be any other than an upright, downright, perpendicular man, knowing the right thing, speaking the right thing, doing the right thing, by Thy grace, even to the end.

But you see the danger; the text suggests it me. To my ear there is a sharp sound in it. It is almost a cry of sudden alarm. It is as if one felt himself falling, and cried aloud, "Hold me up." The deep descent yawns before him, the earth glides from under him, he cannot regain his footing, and piteously he implores, "Hold Thou me up." It has come to this pass, that there is no end of the man unless a power beyond his own shall uphold him. O Lord, see Thou to it.

HOW DOES GOD KEEP HIS PEOPLE UPRIGHT?

He has many ways of doing it; and hence you may pray very hopefully. He can preserve you by angels: "They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." How many stones you and I might have dashed our feet against if it had not been that we have received mysterious intimations which have put us on our guard. Often and often have I been inwardly admonished, and so preserved from evil. We never knew where it came from, but perhaps the Lord sent the singular intimation by an angel whose noiseless wing came and went, and we knew not of the messenger though we felt the message. God works mightily this way with many who are obedient to His will.

At other times God holds up His people by the ministry of the word. I have often been told that when you have come in here, I, not knowing anything of your case, have nevertheless spoken to you exactly; and you have had the admonition, or the encouragement, and direction, which you needed at this point and that. To many of you my voice has been as the oracle of God, and that in the verse of a hymn, or in the chapter chosen, or in the pointed remark in the sermon. Is it not so? Could not many of you bear testimony to it? God's word wherever it is faithfully spoken is a wall of fire round about God's people.

Often God keeps His people upright, and holds them firmly,

BY CHASTISEMENT.

When roughly smitten you feel as though you were a child falling over a precipice, half dazed by his terror; and think that your father has taken hold of you, and, by severely shaking you, has awoke you and saved you. I have seen a driver give a horse a flip because he was getting sleepy and had stumbled; that cut woke up the creature and he went with a sure foot afterward. The Lord has often saved us from a sad fall by a sharp chastisement. "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept Thy word."

It is clear that our gracious Lord can hold us up by many methods; we are very far from having hinted at the tithe of them. I have known Him preserve His people by giving them great aspirations, high ideals, noble desires. With his eye of the stars the sailor boy is steady at the masthead. I have known Him hold up His servants by giving them plenty to do—by putting them into the Sunday-school and interesting them with the children or drafting them into the Loan Tract Society, and keeping them there. It is a grand way of keeping us right—never to let us have an idle ten minutes nor a spare napkin to wrap a talent in.

The supreme power which upholds us is the Holy Spirit, who, dwelling in us, warns us against evil, sets us on our watch-tower against temptation, and incites us to all manner of good things, and helps us to stand in the evil day. How much we owe to the love of the Spirit! He keepeth the feet of the saints.

II. Briefly, I desire to show the

that come out of this holding up.

If God uphold us, then, according to the text we shall be safe. "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe." It is a great point to be safe; though there are some who prefer to be sharp. Some are always trying little dodges by which they would take advantage of their neighbors. "A sharp fellow, that," cries one. "A desperately clever man," says another. "Hardly know where to find him," hints a third. "Rather sharper than honest," mutters a fourth. Just so. Now, if God hold you up, I do not say that you will be clever, but you will be what is a deal better: you will be safe.

"Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe;" that is, you will be safe from all real harm. Suppose that you should meet with great troubles in business, you will still be safe if God upholds you, so that you do not lose your integrity. So long as we do not lose a good conscience we have not lost much if we have lost all beside. He that damages his character has sustained a mortal man can know; but he that is held up—kept upright—has been kept safely. It may be that he shall be slandered; but if he knows that before God he has walked uprightly he shall be "safe."

You shall be safe, too, from descending into grievous sin. The man who is held upright shall not insensibly sink lower and lower, as some do. Alas, I have seen the godly man put forth his hand unto iniquity. At first he seemed excused. No one could blame him. It was an hour of dire necessity, and that he was overcome and did a questionable thing was not much to be marvelled at, though it was enough to make an angel weep that such a man as he should stoop to it. After once doing the questionable thing, he had spoiled the chastity of his conscience, and he was open to a grosser ill, and he fell into that grosser ill, yet still it was not such a fault as the world would much condemn.

A little farther and but a little farther, and he committed a crime that made the godly cast him off and the wicked exult over him. "Howl, fir-tree; for the cedar is fallen!" For you and for me there is no safety in any degree of bending. We must stand upright or we cannot stand at all. "Hold Thou me up"—up, up—"and I shall be safe." But if I begin to incline downward in any way I am not safe. He that leans will fall; but the upright will stand, for God is able to make him stand even unto the end.

The man that walks uprightly, and is kept in God's way, is "safe"; and I venture to give another meaning to that word "safe"—namely, that he becomes a safe man in his dealings with others. If you catch a man playing the double-shuffle at any time, let him play it for himself, and not for you. Never link yourself in business with a person who is capable of doing an unrighteous action. Sink or swim for yourself, but never set foot on board such a coffin ship. Sooner or later it will go to the bottom. May God make you to be upright, that you may be a safe man, true and trustworthy; for men delight to trust in men when once they find them "safe." If you would possess the best of human friends, you will be happy should you meet with the man who in youth was an ardent Christian and has continued so throughout a generation. In times of stress and trial when others fell he stood upright and incorruptible. Under slander he has smarted, but he has outlived the reproach, and disproved every false report. To-day his name is the guarantee of truth, the watchword of honor. Where he leads others feel it safe to follow; they wait till he speaks, his judgment rules the board. Because the Lord kept him upright he grew to be safe in the esteem of his neighbors, and now he is as a hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the storm. May God make you such a man. The way to such honor lies by that prayer, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe."

But, lastly, when a man knows that he is "safe" by God's grace, does he then become idle and careless, and think he may do as he likes? No, listen: "I shall be safe, and I will have respect unto thy statutes continually."

attends such sacred safety, and is at once its fruit and its sign.

A holy man—a man made holy by God's grace—has great respect to every command of God. Before he moves he looks round him to see whether he shall transgress by his proposed movement. You have heard of the child whose mother said, "John, you have broken one of the commandments," and he answered, "Mother, those commandments are awfully easy to break." With such natures as ours sin is a very easy thing. You break the law before you know it; and unless a man has respect unto all the commandments he will soon be trespassing and getting into mischief. We ought in our daily life to walk as one that has to tread among eggs or delicate china.

Heedless and Too-bold soon rush into sin; but the genuine believer feareth always. "You are very jealous of how you act," said one to a saint of God.

"Yes," he replied, "I serve a jealous God." "You are too precise," said another. "That is a crime," said he, "that God will never charge any of His children with." A conscience tender as the apple of an eye is what we want. To be alarmed even at the distant approach of sin is the safeguard of a child of God.

Those who dally with vice will rue such dalliance when it cannot be undone. If somebody told me that there was a cobra at the far end of my room, I should look round me for the door; I think such venomous creatures are near enough if they remain in their native jungles; I do not desire their interesting society. So should it be with sin. We should flee from it at once, avoiding its first appearance, hating it in thought and word before it hatches into act, abhorring even the garment spotted by the flesh.

This holy jealousy to do the Lord's will must last continually. "I will have respect unto Thy statutes continually." I will always try to obey. I will always endeavor to avoid any transgression of the law. Now, dear friends, you see, this safety comes, and this special tenderness towards God's law comes of God's holding us up, for He holds us up so that we never go down. Under His incessant upholding we shall be "safe," and we shall be conscientious, but not otherwise. A few minutes' folly may ruin years of character. The man that is not held up goes down, and rolls in the mire, and he never is a conscientious man or a "safe" man, perhaps, for the rest of his life.

I know some that I hope are God's people, but they have not been upheld so as to be always complete in their integrity, and consequently they are not "safe." They are people that we have to watch over with great care, for we are afraid of them. We could not trust them to lead, for their example is a lame one. Moreover, they are not keenly, sensitively conscientious. They can go to much greater lengths than the Lord Jesus would approve, and yet they are members of the church, and pretty talkative members too. May God improve them and mend them. They need it, but God alone can do it, for they do not take their minister's plain hints.

So I close by commending to you, my dearly beloved in Christ, the prayer of the text, "Hold Thou me up."

EVERY MORNING

before you see the face of men register this prayer in heaven, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe, and I shall have respect unto Thy statutes continually." Are you going down stairs without that prayer? Then you may fall into sin at the breakfast table. You may lose your temper, and a trifle not worth noticing may put you off the tram lines for the day. Therefore pray ere the car moves.

You have taken your hat and your gloves, and you are going off to the city. Does it happen that there you meet careless, godless men? Are you tempted there? Then as you get into your train, or as you trudge along the pavement, breathe the prayer, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe." You can meet the worst of men without fear. Did you say that you are not going to the city to-day? It is a day's excursion, is it? You are going into the country to see friends, or you are to make holiday with a few companions? All well and good. You may have such recreations very properly; but now is a special time for the prayer, "Hold Thou me up."

No, but that does not happen to be your lot. You are not indulged with a day's pleasure; you are going to perform a service surrounded with difficulty. It tries your brain and frets your heart. It is more than you feel at all able to carry through, and yet you must do it. Now is your peculiar time of need. Now is the hour to pray, "Hold Thou me up." I have known young brethren who, when first they have gone to a bank, have been so anxious to have their balances right, and when they had gone round collecting have been so careful to be correct that they have made great errors; not through any dishonesty, but simply through their blundering because they were too excited. In their consuming anxiety to be exact they have confused themselves into error.

DO NOT BE NERVOUS,

but be prayerful. Ask the Lord to help you. Ask Him to help you about everything—about casting up a column of figures. My Lord Jesus counts the very hairs of His children's heads, and He will help them in their little things as well as in their great things; you may ask that you may have favor in the sight of those that employ you, and God will give it you if it be good for you. Only cry, "Lord, help me to do right; and if I make a mistake let it be a mistake; but do Thou hold me up and upright to the end."

But it may be, dear friends, that you are prospering. God is giving you success, and the desire of your heart has come to you. Be sure to pray earnestly, "Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe," for it is a dangerous thing for a child of God to prosper in this world, and yet it is a danger which many unwisely covet. If you are growing rich and great, pray God to hold you up. Or it may be that you are now going down into adversity. Things have gone wrong with you, as you think. You have to give up that fine house and lovely garden. You are moving into small rooms now. You need have small expenses, for your income has shrunk terribly. You hardly know how you shall support your wife and children. Now pray, "Hold Thou me up." Ask Him to uphold you still; He is able to do it, and as willing as He is able.

Ah, some of you are getting old; I respectfully commend to you this prayer as suitable for the close of life. Young people, you must pray, for your passions are strong, and your wisdom is little. O young men and maidens, pray each one of you, "Hold Thou me up." But, oh, dear aged brethren, excuse me who am so much younger, when I solemnly add, to you is this word of warning sent. Cease not to plead for upholding grace. Horses sometimes fall.

AT THE BOTTOM OF THE HILL;

the drivers grew careless, and thought there was no further need for caution, and down went the horse. The worst falls I have ever seen in the church of God have happened to elderly men, men of experience and years. All through Scripture we meet with cases of the aged falling into sin. Mind that. They boast their experience and wisdom; and then the devil laughs in his sleeve and makes fools of them.

And when we get to Jordan's brink, and the chill stream begins to rise to our ankles, what a blessing it is that the Lord will hold us up. "Courage, brother!" said Hopeful to Christian, when he was up to his neck in the stream—"Courage, my brother! I feel the bottom, and it is good." And so they joyfully crossed over and climbed the hill whereon the Celestial City was built. And there, I think, among the songs that we shall sing unto our Well-beloved this will be a peculiarly sweet one, "When I said, My foot slip-peth; Thy mercy, O Lord, held me up." "Now unto Him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy, to the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen."

MR. WILLIAM APPEL.

Continental Education—Religious Impressions—Conversion—Preparation for Mission Work—Christian Efforts—Call to the "Regions Beyond."

MR. WILLIAM APPEL, whose portrait appears on this page, was born in London on July 3d 1860. At the age of seven years he was sent to Hanau, near Frankfort-on-Maine, Germany, where he remained over four years for the purpose of receiving a continental education. During this period of his life he was a witness of many of the stirring scenes connected with the war between France and Prussia.

On his return to England in 1873 to continue and complete his studies, he found that he had quite forgotten the language of his childhood; but by the aid of a German teacher he soon made rapid progress in the acquisition of his native tongue. Having finished his educational course, the next thought before his mind was as to how he should spend his life, and, after some deliberation, he finally settled upon a commercial career.

Up to this time he was entirely a stranger to the grace of God, and, although leading a strictly moral life under the guardianship of his parents, was seeking only the fleeting pleasures which this life can afford. After a time, however, and without any apparent outside influence, he became dissatisfied with himself and was deeply impressed with his need of Christ, and of the reality of the Christian life. No one had ever spoken to him about his soul's salvation, and this Divine leading can only be attributed to the Spirit of the Lord calling forth his young servant to the work which He had for him to do.

Having been convinced that true happiness could not be derived from the world's pursuits he tried to live the life of a Christian, but failed in the attempt, made in his own strength, and became much discouraged with his religious experience. One Sunday evening while living in London, not knowing what place of worship to go to, and without any direct object in view, he found his way to a hall where the Rev. M. Baxter, Editor of The Christian Herald, was preaching on the speedy Second Advent of Christ, and here he became thoroughly impressed with the necessity of a COMPLETE CHANGE OF HEART.

With this conviction before him he left the meeting; and that night, in his own bedroom, he took the Lord Jesus Christ as his Saviour, and consecrated his life to God. This change was the turning-point in his life. He attended religious meeting at every opportunity, and took the deepest interest in Christian work in London. His mind was attracted to foreign missionary work by attending a class conducted by Mr. Richard Hill, Secretary of the China Inland Mission. He soon became impressed with the great need of the heathen in foreign lands, and was, at this time, much engaged in prayer on their behalf.

One night he found that not only had he been praying for the heathen, but had also, unconsciously, offered himself to God, if need be, for foreign service, by repeating the familiar words, "Here am I, send me." His interest in foreign mission work, after this, continued to increase; and his sympathies were chiefly drawn out on behalf of Africa. For a length of time he labored in various ways in London, in connection with various agencies of Christian usefulness.

GOD'S CALL TO THE "REGIONS BEYOND."

At this time he realized the distinct call of God to the "Regions Beyond," and at once communicated his convictions to his friends. He heard of Mr. Guinness's Training Institution for Foreign Missions, and after a time made application and was duly accepted as a student at Harley House, where he has remained in training for nearly two years and a half, with the object of going to the Congo region of Central Africa. His studies in the Institution have been largely of a scientific character, which will, undoubtedly, prove of the greatest help to missionary enterprise in the wide field which he is about to enter.

Mr. Appel has of late availed himself of a course of study in connection with the Royal Geographical Society, and has also been provided with the necessary instruments, which will enable him to help forward, in addition to missionary effort, the important work of geographical research. During his residence at Harley House, Mr. Appel, by his kind and courteous disposition, earned for himself the respect and esteem of his fellow-students, who now follow him with many prayers for his future usefulness and prosperity.

MEETING OF DR. LIVINGSTONE AND MR. H. M. STANLEY.

OUR illustration above, depicts a memorable incident in the life of the great missionary-explorer of the region to which Dr. Sims and Mr. Appel, whose portraits appear beside it, are going. Dr. Livingstone had penetrated far from his base of supplies in 1870, and so long was it since any communication had been received from him that fears were entertained of his death. Still he had so often been given up as lost and had returned, that his friends clung to the hope that he still lived. It was reserved for an American newspaper correspondent to set the doubts and fears at rest.

Mr. H. M. Stanley, the representative of the New York Herald, at Madrid, the capital of Spain, undertook the task of searching for the explorer. He landed at Zanzibar, on the Africa Coast, in January, 1871, from which point he set out for Ujiji. At that time Livingstone was provisionally journeying toward the same place from the west, as Stanley was approaching it from the east. After months of hard marching and imminent peril, bravely encountered and providentially escaped, Stanley and his party, on October 28th 1871, obtained a view of Lake Tanganyika.

Having feasted their eyes on this wonderful prospect, they hurried on with eager footsteps toward Ujiji, now close at hand. At length the sight of the town gladdened their eyes, for there they believed, if anywhere, tidings of Livingstone would be obtained. The American flag was flying out to the breeze, and when near the town muskets were fired to rouse the little town, which as yet knew nothing of the strange and unexpected visitors now at its gates. The natives hurry up by hundreds to ask what all this means, this fusillading, shouting and flag-flying. Arabs run up breathlessly to meet the party and ascertain where they came from. "Where is Livingstone?" is Stanley's first inquiry. Suddenly a man, a black man, at the young American's elbow, shouts in English, "How do you do, sir?" "Hallo! who in the world are you?" replies Stanley. "I am the servant of Dr. Livingstone," is the gratifying answer, and with the speed of the wind runs towards the town.

Stanley's own account of the discovery and interview is as follows: "We have at last entered the town. There are hundreds of people around me—I might say thousands without exaggeration. It seems to me it is a great triumphal procession. As we move, they move; all eyes are drawn toward us. The expedition at last comes to a halt; the journey is ended for a time, but I alone have few more steps to make. There is a group of the most respectful Arabs, and, as I come nearer, I see the white face of an old man among them. He has a cap with a gold band around it; his dress is a short jacket of red blanket cloth. I am shaking hands with him. We raise our hats, and I say 'Dr. Livingstone, I presume;' and he says, 'Yes, Finis coronat opus.' The object of the long and perilous journey was achieved, and after giving Livingstone much needed succor and receiving his directions as to sending on assistance, Stanley returned to the coast while Livingstone continued his last long journey.

AN ENCOUNTER WITH WOLVES.

It is not often that a more thrilling story is told than that related of an adventure which befell a party of Russian travellers one moonlight winter night, in a forest in the interior of the country. A Russian merchant, with his family, travelling from St. Petersburg to their home in Central Russia were beated at a small posting town. The next stage must be travelled by sleigh, and it lay for some distance through a forest which had the bad reputation of being infested with wolves. None, however, had been seen for several months, and even when they had seemed to have lost much of their natural ferocity. Travellers, therefore, had been more venturesome and no fatality had occurred.

The merchant had good reason for hastening his journey. Both he and his wife were longing to reach home, for the unsettled state of the country and other reasons of a private nature made them uneasy when away. But when he announced his intention of proceeding at night, many warning protests were raised. Some prudent friends advised the party to remain in the town that evening and defer their journey till the morrow, and so great was the fear of venturing through the forest by moonlight that no driver could be found brave enough to undertake the journey.

Growing desperate, double fares were offered to induce some one of the sleigh-drivers to run the risk. Bribes of money proving insufficient, recourse was had to plentiful libations of their favorite spirit, and then heated with the liquor that had been freely supplied, one driver more reckless than the rest engaged to be ready to start in a few minutes, but his companions were successful in dissuading him, and so the merchant resolved to drive himself. He and his servant were both well armed, and wrapping up his wife and child to protect them from the cold, the party started for the run across the forest, just as the silver moon was rising over the horizon.

The distance to be travelled was not great, and the horses were fresh, and needed no urging to extra speed. It seemed as if a sense of the dangerous enterprise in which they were engaged animated them, and Orloff had not proceeded far from the confines of the town before he remarked to his wife that at the rate at which they were then travelling it would not be long before they would reach the first house in the next town. Scarce had the words passed from his lips before his ears were greeted with the distant baying of wolves. Well knowing that ere many moments were over they would be up with the sleigh, Orloff urged the already frightened steeds to increased speed, and handing the reins to his servant seized his gun and prepared for an encounter with the foe.

These preparations were only just completed when out from a cluster of tall pines some dozen wolves rushed. The howling creatures, with tongues protruding, and eyes glaring red, gained upon the travellers; but Orloff resolved to sell life dearly, and prepared, if need be, rather to lose his horses than that he or those dear to him should fall a prey to the appetite of the ferocious creatures now panting close in their wake. Just at this moment the wolves attacked one of the two foremost horses, and at the same time one bolder than the rest made a rush at the sleigh. Orloff fired, and happily the shot told, and the wolf rolled over in the snow dead. The attention of the wolves was diverted from the sleigh to their fallen companion, which they at once commenced to devour, and all their energy was devoted to the rending and tearing of the victim thus provided.

It would have been easy while they were thus engaged to have sent a volley into the pack, but the necessity of husbanding ammunition was clear, and the merchant employed redoubled efforts to gain the outskirts of the town. Its welcome lights were now clearly visible across the snow, and if the next mile could be passed without the pack overtaking them they were safe. Their lives now hung on the race between their horses and the wolves on their track. They held their breath with terrible excitement. Again the ominous bay of the pack was heard, and looking back they could see them coming nearer. Now the merchant changed his tactics. He was so near the town that he might venture a chance shot. As soon, therefore, as the foremost wolf came within range he fired, and then taking advantage of the momentary closing in of the wolves, he fired again, hoping thus to provide his assailants with a full meal on each other. His scheme was successful. A long stretch of road lay between him and his enemies, and in a few minutes the hoofs of the horses were ringing on the bridge which marked the entrance to the town.

It was a narrow escape, such an one as leaves an indelible impression on the memory of those who pass through it. Between life with its joys and pleasures, and a horrible cruel death there was but a step, and those alone know the intensity of such a moment who have been in a position in which they did not know whether the step would be taken or not. At such times men do their best and try all they know. The cause is that life is sweet and the danger of losing it imminent. But even if saved death eventually comes. We must die some time. It is strange that knowing this and knowing too that eternal life may be secured, men do not strive to obtain that endless joy with the earnestness they do to gain the smaller and limited boon of prolonged life on earth (John 6 : 40).

A Wrong Ticket. — A man said to Mr. Moody lately : "I thank God I can say that I am saved. Up to January, 1881, I was what may be termed a moral-living young man in a country parish. I was, however, far from God. Up to the date given, I was a Sabbath-school teacher, and I then was awakened by the Holy Spirit, though I did not think He was the Holy Spirit. I came to Glasgow on the 1st of February last, and went on a Sunday evening about a month afterward to the St. Andrew's Hall. However, I had a wrong ticket, and I was turned from the door. I wandered into Buchanan Street, and went into a meeting there. The text was 'Prepare to meet thy God.' The sermon did not seem to affect me ; but I placed myself in the way of the preacher, and had a conversation with him. He said, 'Are you on the road to heaven?' The time was when I could have said 'I hope so,' but I could not truly say so now. He invited me to his house, and then we had some conversation, and in the end I saw there were but two sides to the question, either to decide for Christ or not—I was led to decide for Christ, and I have been resting on Him ever since."

COBWEEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

The Voice of the Dead.

IN his lonely garret in London, Jean Merle was living in an isolation more complete even than that of Engelberg. There he had known at least the names of those about him, and their faces had grown familiar to him. More than once he had been asked to help when help was sorely needed, and he had felt, though not quite consciously, that there was still a link or two binding him to his fellow-men. But here, an unit among millions, who hustled him at every step, breathed the same air, and shared the common light with him, he was utterly alone. "Isolation is the sum total of wretchedness to man," and no man could be more completely isolated than he.

Strangely enough, his Swiss proclivities seemed to have fallen from him like a worn-out garment. The narrow, humble existence of his peasant forefathers, to which he had so readily adapted himself, was no longer tolerable in his eyes. He felt all the force and energy of the life of the great city which surrounded him. His birthright as an Englishman presented itself to his imagination with a splendor and importance that it had never possessed before, even in those palmy days when it was no unthought-of honor that he might some day take his place in the House of Commons. He called himself Jean Merle, for no other name belonged to him; but he felt himself to be an Englishman again, to whom the life of a Swiss peasant would be a purgatory.

Other natural instincts were asserting themselves. He had been a man of genial, social habits, glad to gather around him smiling faces and friendly voices; and this bias of his was stirring into life and shaking off its long stupor. He longed, with intense longing, for some mortal ear into which he could breathe the story of his sins and sufferings, and for some human tongue to utter friendly words of counsel to him. It was not enough to pour out his confessions before God in agonizing prayer; that he had done, and was doing daily. But it was not all. The natural yearning for man's forgiveness, spoken in living human speech, grew stronger within him. There was no longer a chance for him to make even a partial reparation of the wrong he had committed; he felt himself without courage to begin the long conflict again. What his soul hungered for now was to look at his life through another man's eyes.

But his money, economize it as he might, was slowly melting away. Unless he could get work—and all his efforts to find it failed—it would not do to remain in England. At Engelberg he had secured a position as a wood carver, and his livelihood was assured. There, too, he possessed a scanty knowledge of the neighbors, and they of him. It would be his wisest course to return there, to forget what he had been, and to draw nearer to him the simple and ignorant people, who might yet be won over to regard him with goodwill. This must be done before he found himself penniless as well as friendless. He therefore set aside a certain sum; when that was spent he must once more be an exile.

Until then, it was his life to pace to and fro along the streets of London. Somewhere in this vast labyrinth there was a home to which he had a right; a hearth where he could plant himself and claim it for his own. He was master of it, and of a wife, and children; he, the lonely, almost penniless man. It would have been a small thing to him now to pay the penalty the law could demand of him. A few years more or less in Dartmoor Prison would be nothing to him, if at the end of them he saw a home waiting for him to return to it. But he never sought to look at the exterior even of that spot to which he had a right. He made no effort to see Felicity.

He stayed till he touched his last shilling. It was already winter, and the short, dark days, with their thick fogs, made the wintry months little better than one long night. To-morrow he must leave England, never to return to it. He strayed aimlessly about the gloomy streets, letting his feet bear him whither they would, until he found himself looking down through the iron railings upon the deserted yard in front of the Houses of Parliament. The dark mass of the building loomed heavily through the yellow fog, but beyond it came the sound of bells ringing in the invisible Abbey.

It was the hour for morning prayer, and Jean Merle sauntered listlessly onwards until he reached the northern entrance and turned into the transept. The dim daylight scarcely lit up the lofty arches in the roof or the farther end of the long aisles, but he gave no heed to either. He sank down on a seat and bent his gray head on the back of the chair before him. The sweet solemn chanting of the white-robed choristers echoed under the roof, and the sacred and soothing tones of prayer floated past him. But he did not move or lift his head. He sat there absorbed in his own thoughts, and the hours seemed only as fleeting minutes to him. Visitors came and went, chatting close beside him, and the vergers, with their quiet footsteps, came one by one to look at this motionless, poverty-stricken form, whose face no man could see; but nobody disturbed him. He had a right to be there, as still, and as solitary, and as silent as he pleased.

But when, after three or four hours, Canon Pascal came up the long aisle to evening prayers, and saw again the same gray head bowed down in the same despondent attitude as he had left it in the morning, he could scarcely refrain himself from pausing then and there, before the service proceeded, to speak to this man. He had caught a momentary glimpse of his face, and it had haunted him in his study during the interval, until he had half reproached himself for not answering to that silent appeal its wretchedness had made. But he had had no expectation of seeing it again.

It was dark by the time the evening service was over, and Canon Pascal hastily divested himself of his surplice, that he might not seem to approach the stranger as a clergyman, but rather as an equal. The Abbey was being cleared of its visitors, and the lights were being put out one by one, when he sat down on the seat next to Jean Merle's, and laid his hand with a gentle pressure on his arm. Jean Merle started and lifted up his head. It was too dark for them to see each other well; but Canon Pascal's voice was full of friendly urgency.

"They are going to close the Abbey," he said; "and you've been here all day without food, my friend. Is there any special reason why you should pass a long, dark winter's day in such a manner? I would be glad to serve you if I can. Perhaps you are a stranger in London?"

"I have been seeking the guidance of God," answered Jean Merle, in a bewildered yet unutterably sorrowful voice.

"That is good," replied Canon Pascal; "that is the best. But it is good also at times to seek man's guidance. It is God, doubtless, who has sent me to you. As His servant, I earnestly desire to serve you."

"If you would listen to me under a solemn seal of secrecy!" cried Jean Merle.

"Are you a Catholic?" asked Canon Pascal.

"Is it a confessor you want?"

"I am not a Catholic," he answered; "but there is a strong desire in my soul to confess. My burden would be lighter if any man would share it, so far as to keep my secret."

"Does it touch the life of any fellow-creature?" inquired Canon Pascal; "is there any great crime in it?"

"No; not what you are thinking," he said; "there is sin in it; ay, and crime; but not a crime like that."

"Then I will listen to it under a solemn promise of secrecy, whatever it may be," replied Canon Pascal. "But the vergers are waiting to close the Abbey. Come with me; my home is close by, within the precincts."

Jean Merle had risen obediently as he spoke, but, exhausted and weary, he staggered as he stood upon his feet. Canon Pascal drew his arm within his own. This simple action was to him full of a friendliness to which he had been long a stranger. To clasp another man's hand, to walk arm-in-arm with him, he felt keenly how much of implied brotherhood was in that. He was ready to go anywhere with Canon Pascal, almost as a child guided and cared for by an older and wiser brother.

They passed out of the Abbey into the cloisters, dimly lighted by the lamps, which had been lit in good time this dark November evening. The low, black-browed arches, which had echoed to the footsteps of sorrow-stricken men for more than eight hundred years, resounded to their tread as they walked beneath them in silence. Jean Merle suffered himself to be led without a question, like one in a dream. There seemed some faint reminiscence from the past of this man, with his harsh features, and kindly, genial expression, the deep-set eyes, beaming with a benign light from under the rugged eyebrows, and the firm yet friendly pressure of his guiding arm; and his mind was groping about the dark labyrinth of memory to seize his former knowledge of him, if there had ever been any. There was a vague apprehension about him lest he should discover that this friend was no stranger, and his tongue must be tied, even though what he was about to say would be under the inviolable seal of secrecy.

They had not far to go, for Canon Pascal turned aside into a little square, open to the black November sky, and stopping at a door in the gray, old walls, opened it with a latch-key. They entered a narrow passage, and Canon Pascal turned at once to his study, which was close by. As he pushed open the door, he said "Go in, my friend, I will be with you in a moment."

Jean Merle saw before him an old-fashioned room with a low ceiling. There was no light beside the warm, red glow of a fire, which was no longer burning with yellow flame, but which lit up sufficiently the figure of a woman seated on a low stool on the hearth, with her head resting on the hand that shaded her eyes. It was a figure familiar to him in his old life—that life which lay on the other side of Roland Sefton's grave. He had seen the same well-shaped head, with its soft brown hair, and the round outline of the averted cheek and chin, a thousand times in old Marlowe's cottage on the uplands, sitting in the red firelight as she was sitting now.

All the intervening years were swept away in an instant—his bitter anguish and unavailing repentance—the long solitude and gnawing remorse—all was swept clean away from his mind. He felt the strength and freshness of his boyhood come back to him, as if the breeze of the uplands was blowing softly yet keenly across his throbbing and fevered temples. Even his voice caught back for the moment the ring of his early youth as he stood on the threshold, forgetting all else but the sight that filled his eyes. "Phebe!" he cried; "little Phebe Marlowe!"

The cry startled Phebe, but she did not move. It was the voice of one long since dead that rang in her ears—dead, and faithfully mourned over; and every nerve tingled, and her heart seemed to stay its beating. Roland Sefton's voice! She did not doubt it or mistake it. The call had been too real. She had answered to it too many times to be mistaken now. In those days of utter silence, when dumb signs only had passed between her and her father, Roland's pleasant voice had sounded too gladly in her ears ever to be forgotten or confounded with another. But how could she hear it now? The voice of the dead! how could it reach her? A strange pang of mingled joy and terror paralyzed her. She sat motionless and bewildered, with a thrill of passionate expectation quivering through her. Let Roland speak again; she could not answer his first call!

"Phebe!" She heard the cry again; but this time the voice was low, and lamentable, and despairing. For in the few seconds he had been standing, arrested on the threshold, the whole past had flitted through his brain in dismal procession. She lifted herself up slowly and mechanically from her low seat, and turned her face reluctantly toward the spot from which the startling call had come. In the dusky red light stood the form of the one friend to whom she had been faithful with the utter faithfulness of her nature. Whence he came she knew not—she was afraid of knowing. But he was there himself, and not another like him. There was a change, she could see that dimly; but not such a change as could disguise him from her. Of late, while she had been painting his portrait from memory, every recollection of him had been revived with keener vividness. Yet the terror of beholding him again on this side of death struck her dumb. She stretched out her hands toward him, but she could not speak.

"I must speak to Phebe Marlowe alone!" said Jean Merle to Canon Pascal, and speaking in a tone of irresistible earnestness. "I have that to say to her which no one else can hear. She is God's messenger to me."

"Shall I leave you with this stranger, Phebe?" asked Canon Pascal.

She made a gesture simply; her lips were too parched to speak.

"My dear girl, I will stay, if you please," he said again.

"No," she breathed, in a voice scarcely audible.

"There is a bell close at your hand," he went on, "and I shall be within hearing of it. I will come myself if you ring it however faintly. You know this man?"

"Yes," she answered.

She saw him look across at her with an encouraging smile; and then the door was shut, and she was alone with her mysterious visitor.

They stood silent for a few moments ;—moments which seemed hours to Phebe. The stranger—for who could be so great a stranger as one who had seen many years dead?—had advanced only a step or two from the threshold, and paused as if some invisible barrier was set up between them. She had shrunk back, and stood leaning against the wall for the support her trembling limbs needed. It was with a vehement effort that at last she spoke.

"Roland Sefton!" she faltered.

"Yes!" he answered, "I am that most miserable man."

"But you died," she said with quivering lips, "fourteen years ago."

"No, Phebe, no," he replied; "would to God I had died then."

Once more an agony of mingled fear and joy overwhelmed her. This dear voice, so lamentable and hopeless, so well remembered in all its tones, told her that he was still living, whom she had mourned over so many years. But what could this mystery mean? What had he passed through? What was about to happen now? A tumult of thoughts thronged to her brain. But clearest of all came the assurance that he was alive, standing here, desolate, changed, and friendless. She ran to him, and clasped his hands in hers; stooping down and kissing them, those hard worn hands, which he left unresistingly in her grasp. These loving and deferential caresses belonged to the time when she was a humble country girl, and he the friend very far above her.

"Come closer to the fire, your hands are cold, Mr. Roland," she said, speaking in the old, long-used accent of her early days, as she might have spoken to him while she was yet a child. He threw a few logs on the fire, and drew up Jonathan Pascal's chair to the hearth for him. She felt spellbound; and as if she had been suddenly thrust back upon those old times.

"I am no longer Roland Sefton," he said, sinking down into the chair; "he died, as you say, many a long year ago. Do not light the lamp, Phebe; let us talk by the fire-light."

The flicker of the flames creeping round the dry wood played upon his face, and her eyes were fastened upon it. Could this man really be Roland Sefton, or was she being tricked by her fancy?

THE TRANSFIGURATION.

S.S. Lesson for June 4, Mark 9: 2-13. Golden Text, John 1: 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DURING the whole period of His ministry, our blessed Lord was carrying on His disciples' education and preparing them to be witnesses of His resurrection and His Messiahship. He had unfolded to them something of the cost which following Him involved, and the question might have presented itself: "Is that which we gain really worth such a sacrifice?" He had said unto them, "Verily I say unto you, that there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they have seen the kingdom of God come with power." But the meaning of these words was entirely hidden from them until after six days, when "Jesus took with Him Peter, and James, and John, and led them up into an high mountain apart by themselves: and He was transfigured before them." We know not whether even then they recognized the fulfilment of their Lord's prediction. But they gazed upon that face shining as the sun; upon that shining raiment "exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them." He was human and yet invested with supernatural glory. The kingdom of God in that glorified form was come with power, the Man Christ Jesus was manifest in glory, weakness was changed to strength, humiliation exchanged for wondrous radiance. The three apostles were in society such as they had never known before: "There appeared unto them Elias, with Moses; and they were talking with Jesus."

Dull as were the disciples, their spiritual sensibilities were awake enough to make them cry,

"Master it is good for us to be here." But they did not say that which would perhaps most have rejoiced their Master's heart, "Now, Lord, we begin to see that it is worth while to lose our own lives for Thee." It is a common thing for Christians to like well enough to get into a good, warm, spiritual atmosphere where faith is in active operation, and where the power and reality of the presence of God can be felt. But there are few who are willing so to forsake all that they have and to give themselves up so unreservedly to God, that He can fill them with His Spirit and make them continuously inhale and exhale a spiritual atmosphere. How often we hear believers talking of good times which they have had in such and such a meeting, how they felt the presence of God, how the things of time seemed to loose hold upon them, and it was as though heaven were begun; and yet, no sooner were they in other surroundings than all was changed, the world resumed its power, and they succumbed to the influence of minds not in harmony with God.

Peter said, "Let us make three tabernacles; one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias." O how little knew Peter of the Master's heart! If he had his way, there would have been no atonement made for his sins, or for the sins of others, three men would have had a season of unspeakable joy, and then they and the whole world beside would have perished. But is not this just the spirit which actuates the large number who are seeking spiritual enjoyment in attending meetings, who are drinking in all the refreshment they can, yielding themselves up to all the excitement, and yet not yielding themselves as living sacrifices to be at God's disposal; to do, to say, to suffer, to endure, all to which He may call them?

drank more deeply into the spirit of her Lord when, after she had found Him again, whose sepulchre she had so mournfully and faithfully watched, He sent her to tell the message of resurrection and she went. Surely she might have said, "It is good for me to be here, entreat me not to leave Thee." But to do the will of Jesus at any cost to herself, was dearer to her than to enjoy Jesus, and yield to self-satisfaction. Peter "wist not what to say" (Luke says he knew not what he said), "for they were sore afraid." Afraid and yet happy! Perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment. Until the disciples had learned implicit confidence in their Lord, they were not in a condition to make tabernacles for the glorified; they were permitted to look upon the glories of a spiritual body, but they had yet to complete their education and their service in their own natural bodies.

While Peter "thus spake, there came a cloud, and overshadowed them: and they feared as they entered into the cloud. And there came a voice out of the cloud, saying, This is My beloved Son; hear Him" (Luke 9: 34, 35). After his selfish wish, Peter lost sight of Jesus and of His saints. Their discourse about His death which He should accomplish at Jerusalem ceased, and only three astonished and perplexed disciples were left enveloped in the cloud. Peter, who had rejected the cross, who had said to the Lord about His death, "Be it far from Thee, Lord; this shall not be unto Thee;" Peter was not prepared either to understand, or to enter into their discourse. And the disciples, who were struck with terror when their Lord had walked upon the water, were filled with fear now. O how they needed to be saved from fear, to be established in their confidence, to learn unbounded reliance upon Him whom they owned to be the Christ, the Son of the living God! And yet they have transmitted their fear and inconsistency through all generations of believers until this day.

Who is there among the children of God who does not own Jesus to be the Christ, yet who relies on Him as such? Who claims the wonder-working power of the Son of the Most High God, in his life, as it was exercised in the life of Jesus Himself? Who expects to do the works which He did, and yet greater (John 14: 12)? God has long patience with His poor weak children, and when He cannot bring us up to His glory, He comes down to our weakness. He spoke out of the cloud, to comfort and strengthen the failing hearts of the disciples, and said, "This is My beloved Son; in whom I am well pleased, hear ye Him" (Matt. 17: 5).

Peter, speaking later on of this time, says, "And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with Him in the holy mount" (2 Peter 1: 18). How came it then that the same Peter denied his Lord with oaths and curses, when the very things came to pass which He had predicted? O how clearly we see that no past experience, and no measure of knowledge, can keep a child of God from sin; if God does not keep him, he must fall. Peter had faith, knowledge, zeal, devotion, and yet because he relied on himself he fell.

"HEAR HIM,"

this was the message from heaven, and this is the will of God. Let our ears be open all day long to all which Jesus says, and we cannot go wrong; but O how slow we are to shut our ears to our own desires, imaginations, and preconceptions, and to hear Him.

John bore testimony to the transfiguration of Jesus, and said, "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the Only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth." Peter dwelt more on the voice from heaven, John more on the Person of Him who spoke; the one was impressed with the authority, the other with the grace (the undeserved love) and the truth and righteousness of his Lord. The voice of God dispersed the cloud; "suddenly when they had looked round about, they saw no man any more, save Jesus only with themselves." They had been vouchsafed a glance into the future, when Christ will come down with His glorified saints to reign over, and to commune with, men upon the earth (Rev. 5: 10; Luke 19: 17, 19; 1 Cor. 6: 2). But that time was not yet come, the reigning Messiah, on whom their hearts were set, must first be the suffering Messiah, the cross must precede the crown, for "before honor is humility" (Prov. 18: 12).

"And as they came down from the mountain, He charged them that they should tell no man what things they had seen, till the Son of man were risen from the dead." This was not the first occasion when Jesus had spoken to them about His resurrection, but it so ill accorded with their own ideas, that no ray of light upon His meaning penetrated their souls; so "they kept that saying with themselves, questioning one with another what the rising from the dead should mean." He had told them He must be killed and rise again, they had seen Him raise the daughter of Jairus, and knew thereby that He had power over death; but that He should die was so contrary to their thoughts that they could not admit it, and they were consequently all at sea about His teaching.

"They asked Him, saying, Why say the scribes that Elias must first come? And He answered and told them, Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man, that He must suffer many things, and be set at nought." This repetition of His former declaration made no impression on them; they heard as though they heard it not. And He continued, "But I say unto you, That Elias is indeed come, and they have done unto him whatsoever they listed, as it is written of him." "Then the disciples understood that He spake unto them of John the Baptist" (Matt. 17: 13).

O how this glorious transfiguration of our Lord holds out to us the glory which shall be revealed when the time is come for "the manifestation of the sons of God," when "this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality," when we shall all be changed, although "we shall not all sleep" (1 Cor. 15: 51, 53), when we shall realize the end of the groaning to which we and the creation are subject, even "the redemption of our body" (Rom. 8: 23). But transfigured bodies require transfigured souls, and even now the transformation is being made, for they who behold "as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord" (2 Cor. 3: 18).

The New Bill to Assist Irish Tenants who are in danger of eviction for the non-payment of arrears of rent was introduced in the British House of Commons on May 15th by Mr. Gladstone. The proposed arrangement is that where no rent has been paid since November, 1878, the tenant shall pay one year's rent, the government will pay one year's rent on his behalf, and the owner will be required to remit the remainder. The government will appropriate the necessary amount from the confiscated property of the Irish Church. Mr. Gladstone explained that the bill was limited to tenancies up to $150, Griffiths' valuation. The bill is to be administered by a land commission, which will be assisted by a county court judge, before whom the tenant will be obliged to prove inability to pay arrears. Either the landlord or the tenant may apply to the commission.

The Irish Police are Still Searching Unsuccessfully for the murderers of Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke. A Dublin despatch says that the police have discovered that the car in which the murderers escaped was hired by a stranger from a stable in the southern part of the city, and was returned about eight o'clock on the evening of the murder. The police hope to be able to trace the driver. The assassins dispersed when the car returned to the stable on the night of the murder. The police merely suspect who the driver is. They have the man under surveillance, and he may be arrested, but the detectives have no chance of bringing home his guilt unless an informer comes forward.

The Treaty of Kilmainham is the Phrase Applied to the arrangement made between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell, under which the latter recovered his liberty. It was strenuously insisted upon, at first, both by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell that the release had been unconditional, but on May 15th Mr. Parnell rose in the House of Commons and read a copy of the letter he had written from his prison, which had been submitted to the Cabinet and had led to his release. This letter stated Mr. Parnell's views of what it was necessary to do in order to satisfy the Irish party. These views were that on the question of arrears a settlement had become imperatively essential, and if this were of a satisfactory kind it would enable the Irish party to show the small tenants that they were being met with justice and generosity, from which he confidently hoped that by the efforts which they would then strenuously and unremittably be able to make, outrages and intimidation would be stopped. Mr. Forster, the ex-Secretary for Ireland, was present in the House and had with him the original letter submitted to the Cabinet. At the close of Mr. Parnell's statement Mr. Forster produced the letter, which was read. From this it appeared that Mr. Parnell had omitted to read a most important section, in which he had said: "This will enable the Irish party in future cordially to co-operate with the Liberal party in forwarding Liberal principles." This omitted passage the House of Commons regarded as equivalent to a promise that if Mr. Parnell were released he would support Mr. Gladstone on party questions. This had so much the appearance of a bargain, the existence of which both gentlemen had emphatically denied, that no little excitement was caused, in the midst of which one member said that the compact with the suspects "was unexampled in infamy." He declared that the statements of Mr. Gladstone might be verbally accurate, but they were substantially inaccurate.

Mr. Parnell has Explained to a Correspondent of the New York Herald his object in treating with the government for a release from prison. He said, we saw evictions, daily increasing in number, of poor tenants utterly unable to pay rents; 7000 persons having been evicted during the first quarter of this year. We had every reason to fear that during each ensuing quarter the number would increase, and that there would be 21,000 persons evicted for the current quarter, and possibly many more, as we know that the greater proportion of small tenants in the counties of Sligo, Donegal, Leitrim, Mayo, Galway, Kerry, and parts of Roscommon, where the famine reached such an extent in 1879-80, had merely settled temporarily with their landlords by paying them six and twelve months' rent on account. They were still liable for arrears to the extent of from three to five, and in many cases seven and eight years, and in some instances fifteen years; and that as time went on, if no settlement of the arrears question took place, they would be literally turned out in thousands during the coming winter. On the other hand outrages were daily increasing in number and gravity. We were threatened with this Coercion bill, which has been introduced in the House. The situation summed up then was—wholesale and daily increasing evictions, stringent and even severe coercion with savage retaliation." Under these circumstances he said he considered himself justified in making the offer he had done. The statement, it is understood, was made by Mr. Parnell for circulation in America in the hope that it might lead to a recovery of his popularity here, which his bargain with the government has impaired.

A List has been Published of the Outrages committed in Ireland during the first quarter of the year. It shows that there were six murders without a single conviction. Altogether 1417 outrages were committed, for which only fifty-one persons were apprehended. Of these twenty-one were convicted.

Another Attempt to Blow up the Mansion House in London, where the Lord Mayor of that city resides, was made on May 12th. A telegram to the New York Herald says, "A suspicious-looking canister was discovered outside of the Mansion House at half past nine o'clock P.M. It was suspended by a brass hook to the railing in front of the building. Attached to it was a lighted fuse, which was extinguished by a policeman. The fuse was made of rag soaked with paraffine, and was inserted in a hole in the box. The box was full of blasting powder. It is twelve inches long and six inches in diameter. The police around the Mansion House and other city buildings have been doubled, and many reserve policemen have been called out for extra duty."

The Garfield House Home in England for working girls was opened on Wednesday, May 17th. Mr. James R. Lowell, our Minister at the British Court, performed the inaugural ceremony. He has himself contributed $250 toward the expenses of founding the Home. It is situated on Brixton Road, London. A luncheon was served at which there was a large assemblage, including the Countess of Jersey, Lord Kinnaird, Mr. William H. Gladstone and Canon Spence. Mr. Lowell said he had been drawn to the opening of the Home, first, by the name of Garfield, and, second, by his own real interest in the object of the institution. He referred to the good the Peabody buildings had done in London. Letters of regret at their inability to be present were read from Mr. Spurgeon, Lord Salisbury, Lord Cairns, and the Lord Mayor of London.

The Ring Theatre in Vienna Destroyed by fire on December 8th, 1881, appears to have been a regular death-trap. On the first day of the trials of the persons charged with responsibility for the catastrophe, the manager of the theatre conveyed a vivid impression of the bad arrangement of the structure by declaring that the passages were all labyrinths, and that after having been there for weeks he could never find his way to his own office or even to the staircase leading to it without guidance.

The Crisis in Egypt has Ended in the Submission of the Ministers to the Viceroy. The despatches say: "The Cabinet completely submitted to the Khédive. They kissed his hands and garments, implored his pardon and expressed loyalty. The Khédive received them coldly. He said he would sink personal differences to save the country, which was placed in serious danger. The Ministers withdrew humiliated. The English squadron, consisting of six vessels, has arrived in Suda Bay. It is reported that the Turkish squadron in the Archipelago has been ordered to Suda Bay. The French squadron has also arrived in the same harbor. The Khédive was advised by the English and French Consuls to pardon the Ministry. The English Consul issued a proclamation declaring that the presence of the Anglo-French fleet is purely amicable, and that no occupation would take place if the negotiations with the Egyptian Government were successful. The attitude of the army is still doubtful. The whole country, excepting the army, is loyal to the Khédive.

Prince Victor Napoleon, whom Prince Louis Napoleon named in his will heir to the tradition and claims of the Napoleons, in a recent letter written from Heidelberg in Germany, says: "I am leading here a life of study and work. My sole thought is to become worthy of the name I bear and to prepare to serve my country well when duty calls me to do so." He adds, however, that he is loyal to his father, Prince Napoleon Jerome, and should always resent any attempt to advance himself before his father.

The Proposals for a Truce Between Chili and Peru were presented to the Peruvian representative by Mr. Trescott, the United States Envoy, on April 26th, on behalf of Chili. The principal condition was that Chili should keep the province of Tarapaca as a conquest and that Peru should be obliged to sell to Chili the Peruvian province of Arica. The proposals were promptly rejected, and Señor Elmore, the Peruvian Minister at Washington, in commenting upon the news, says that the province of Tarapaca is worth $1,000,000,000, and that under the proposed arrangement Chili would virtually buy the province of Arica with Peruvian money derived from the province of Tarapaca.

The Colonization of the Jews in Palestine is a project of which Mr. Oliphant is still sanguine. He is reported as saying that in Palestine, the Jews, provided they have some money of their own, will be able to form a compact body, which will represent the most prosperous and intelligent element of the local population. Mr. Oliphant states that he is going to Roumania in order to hold a consultation with the local committees of emigration, and thence to Constantinople and Palestine. The Sultan, he now says, displays the greatest willingness to receive the Jews, and has promised to extend many privileges to them on their settling in Palestine.

The Losses Russia has Sustained by the anti-Jewish riots are thus summarized by the St Petersburg newspaper correspondent. He says "According to trustworthy data the material damage done by the anti-Jewish movement, including houses, breadstuffs and other property destroyed and money taken away by the emigration of Jews, amounts to $110,000,000, all lost to Russia. To this must be added the losses resulting from the prevention of labor and profit, not only of the Jews, but of others during the riots, and from the stagnation of trade generally, which would increase the total by many more millions."

A Monument in Memory of William Tyndale, the translator of the Bible into English, is to be erected in London. At a meeting of the committee charged with the execution of the project, held in London recently, it was agreed that J. E. Boehm, the eminent sculptor should prepare and place a bronze statue ten feet in height upon a granite pedestal, on a site granted for the purpose, on the Thames Embankment. The expense of the monument will be $12,000 toward which $6000 have already been guaranteed by subscribers.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 6 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

IT is well that examples of conspicuous instances of the omnipotent grace of God should be brought prominently before the attention of believers, as well for their encouragement in persevering prayer as for an incentive to them in seeking every opportunity to lead even the worst of sinners to the Saviour. This is one of the reasons why THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week publishes the portrait of the eminent evangelist Mr. Brownlow North, with a sketch of his eventful life. As it will be seen, his remarkable energy and his wonderful eloquence were signally blessed of God to the conversion of sinners, though for many years, in spite of his early Christian training and notwithstanding continual prayer to God for him, he led a godless, wicked life.

Brownlow North, one of the most eminent and successful evangelists of the present century, was born at Chelsea, near London, England, on January 6th, 1810. His father was the Rev. C. A. North, Rector of Alverstoke, Hants, and his grandfather was Dr. Brownlow North, who was successively bishop of the sees of Lichfield, Worcester, and Winchester. The family has produced several members who have exercised an appreciable influence on the community, both in Church and State.

From a very early period the boy gave unmistakable evidence of considerable shrewdness and much natural quickness of mind. At nine years of age he was sent to Eton, and remained there until he was sixteen. He was a great favorite with his fellow-scholars, and though by no means an industrious pupil, he gained a great reputation as a swimmer, and for athletic accomplishments generally. The prayers and pious training of his mother, who was a most godly woman, bore as yet no fruit in the wild and wayward character of her boy, who was not simply indifferent to her affectionate admonitions, but, unhappily, manifested the strongest aversion to all that was good.

In 1825, his father died, and young Brownlow was removed from Eton, and went out to Corfu with his cousin, Lord Guildford, who was Chancellor of the Ionian Islands, where he had founded a Theological College, in which it was hoped that his young relative might be induced to continue his studies. Nothing, however, seemed able to subdue the wild, high spirits of the lad; and Lord Guildford, after finding one day that the window of his class room had been made the winning post and last jump of an amateur steeple-chase, which Brownlow had got up, regretfully sent him home to England again, as beyond his control.

"THE GRAND TOUR."

He was then sent abroad with a tutor, to make, as it was then termed, "the grand tour;" but this experiment, owing to an unfortunate selection of a tutor, proved as unsatisfactory as the preceding, for discovering his tutor in a gambling saloon the first night after their arrival in Paris, he insisted, under penalty of exposure, that all the books they had brought with them from home should be left behind at Paris, as unnecessary encumbrances. Afterward, on the journey to Rome, he won from the unhappy tutor at play all the money with which he had been entrusted to defray the expenses of the tour, so that their position became completely reversed; the pupil was now master, and the tutor only tolerated as a useful and humble companion.

Upon his return from the Continent he joined his mother, who then resided at Cheltenham. He was now seventeen years of age, and being very fond of dancing and riding, he found in that fashionable town both these pleasures in profusion. So great an impression did he make upon his fair partners, and so unprincipled was he, that he proposed to no fewer than nineteen ladies in one winter, and was accepted by them all!

NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

His propensity for riding, which developed itself in galloping up and down the promenade, a long straight boulevard, would undoubtedly have been attended with fatal consequences, had not a merciful Providence watched over him and interposed to save his life. He was racing with one of his companions, and had just been successful, when his hair-brained rival challenged him again to another contest. They started at full speed, and when coming down the hill and round a corner, there stood right before them a heavy travelling carriage and a pair of post chaises. To avoid a collision was clearly impossible, and Brownlow went dashing on and straight against the body of the carriage. His companion was thrown over the top and received such serious injuries that he shortly died. (This scene is depicted in the left hand section of the upper portion of our front picture.)

This melancholy event made Cheltenham no longer agreeable to him, so having several friends in Ireland, he determined to cross the Channel, and try

THE ATTRACTIONS OF THE EMERALD ISLE.

There one attraction at least he found potent, for the daughter of a highly-esteemed Protestant clergyman so captivated him, that he made her an offer of his hand, and was married to Grace Ann, second daughter of Rev. Dr. Coffey, of Galway, on December 12th, 1828, before he had completed his nineteenth year.

About this period, however, great, and to him most important, changes had taken place in the circle of his relations. His kind old friend Earl Guilford had died, and been succeeded in the earldom by his uncle Francis, his father's eldest brother. Brownlow was now the next heir to the peerage, for his uncle was childless. Naturally an austere man, he had no sympathy with the youthful extravagances of his nephew, and when the death of his wife took place, he decided upon marrying again. He did so, and became the father of a family, and his grandson now perpetuates the name, Dudley Francis, Seventh Earl of Guildford.

RUINED BY GAMBLING.

His expectations of a fortune and a peerage being thus doomed to disappointment, and his young wife having borne him two sons, the question of maintenance became one of most pressing importance to Brownlow North. His sole income was derived from his fees as registrar of the diocese of Winchester and Surrey, to which office he had been appointed when quite a youth, by his grandfather, the bishop. At this time he was in receipt of about $1500 per annum, a sum quite insufficient for his habits; so to improve his finances he had recourse to the gaming-table, and with such bad success that he lost a much larger sum than he could pay; he therefore concluded to leave England for Boulogne, taking his wife and children with him.

There for some time he amused himself as before; but finding his funds running low, and wishing for fresh excitement, he sent his sorrow-stricken wife and children home to his mother, and started off as in Portugal. After an interval of several months, Dom Pedro's affairs being settled, the prodigal returned home, to be forgiven; and in the summer of 1835 he accompanied his brother-in-law to Scotland. His wife and two children went with him; and from that time till his death, more than forty years afterward, Scotland was the land of his adoption and the home of his choice.

Gay, pleasure-seeking, and ungodly though he was, it must not be imagined that he had no up-braidings of conscience, no stirrings of the Holy Spirit, and no seasons when he resolved to forsake self and sin, and seek the Lord. On the contrary, like most persons who have been trained at a Christian mother's knee, he was, during his life, the subject of deep religious impressions, these impressions more than once awakened those who yearned for the salvation of his soul, hope that he was about to give himself to Christ, but, alas! all his fair promises of amendment faded as the morning cloud or the early dew.

A MEMORABLE DINNER.

The cause of the deepest religious conviction which he experienced, previous to his awakening and conversion, was a conversation which the late Duchess of Gordon, a godly woman, had with him at the dinner-table at Huntly Lodge. He was staying in Huntly at the time, engaged in shooting, and utterly careless and ungodly. Some of his friends having written to the Duchess, urging her to take some notice of him, with the object of withdrawing him from his evil courses and companionships, she gave him an invitation to dinner. When at dinner, Brownlow North sat beside his generous hostess, and suddenly said to her with much gravity, "Duchess, what should a man do who has often prayed to God and never been answered?" She looked inquiring in the face, and said quietly, so as not to be overheard by others, "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts" (James 4:3). His countenance changed, and he indicated much perturbation of mind during the remainder of the evening. (The right hand panel in the upper portion of frontispiece represents this incident.)

BECOMES A STUDENT AT OXFORD.

Not long after this his heart was further softened and impressed by the dangerous illness of a second son, Brownlow, to whom he was much attached, and by perusing a little book which the Duchess of Gordon had given Mrs. North to read to her sick child. So deep and apparently hopeful was this impression, that he determined to change entirely his mode of life, commence a course of study at Oxford, and take a degree with a view to entering the ministry of the Episcopal Church. A few months later he matriculated at Magdalen Hall as a Gentleman Commoner. Though he did not know even the Greek alphabet when he began his self-imposed task, such was the power of his memory, and so intense his application, that he passed his examinations with credit and distinction.

INTENDED ORDINATION PREVENTED.

For a considerable time after entering Oxford he corresponded regularly with the Duchess of Gordon, who had also written to some of her friends to look after him there. When he was almost ready for ordination, and had obtained the promise of a curacy at Olney, the bishop was made acquainted, by an anonymous letter, with some of the excesses of his early years; which led him to make further inquiry. North had also some qualms of conscience in the matter, for he afterward told his friend the Duchess of Gordon, that at a private interview the bishop said to him, "Mr. North, if I were in your position, and you in mine, would you ordain me?" to which he candidly replied, "My Lord, I would not."

THE OLD LIFE OF PLEASURE.

After this he threw himself openly into his old life of pleasure and sin. He forgot God, and wished that God would forget him. In 1845 he took moors for shooting in Scotland. His influence and example upon his friends and associates, and upon the whole neighborhood, was very pernicious. He delighted in shocking the Christian principles of his neighbors, and on a Sunday, when other people were going to church, he would often be seen driving along the road in a dog-cart with his gun or fishing-tackle, for a day's sport.

CONVINCED OF SIN WHILE PLAYING CARDS.

In the beginning of November, 1854, while he had still health and vigor to relish sport upon the moors as much as ever, his thoughts were often troubled about his relationship to an insulted and neglected God. Prayer was still ascending for him, and the great crisis in his spiritual history was at hand. One night, while he was sitting playing at cards, he was unexpectedly filled with the greatest concern about the safety of his soul. The occasion of his anxiety was a sensation of sudden illness, which led him to think that he was going

e. He said to his son, "I am a dead man; take me upstairs." As soon as this was done, he threw himself down on the bed. His first thought then was, "Now, what will my forty-four years of following the devices of my own heart profit me? In a few minutes I shall be in hell, and what good will these things do me, for which I have sold my soul?" At that moment he felt impelled to pray for mercy. He afterward said—

CONSTRAINED TO PRAY.

"I was not sorry for what I had done, but I was afraid of the punishment of my sin. And yet all there was something trying to prevent me putting myself on my knees to cry for mercy, and that was the presence of the maid-servant in the room, lighting my fire. Though I did not believe at that time that I had ten minutes to live, and knew that there was no possible hope for me but in the mercy of God, yet it was a balance with me, a thing to turn this way or that, I could not tell now, whether I should wait till that woman left the room, or whether I should fall on my knees and cry for mercy in her presence. By the grace of God I did put myself on my knees before that girl, and I believe it was the turning point with me." (This episode is represented in the left hand picture of the lower portion of the frontispiece.) On the following day he announced publicly to his friends staying in the house, and to others by letter, that from that instant he had become a changed man.

Thus suddenly arrested, awakened, and reformed, it was some time before Mr. North found peace through a loving faith in Christ. He underwent a severe and long period of deep spiritual conflict, which made the strong man become feeble through the intensity of his emotion and the protractedness of his distress.

HOW A LONG SPIRITUAL FIGHT WAS WON.

At length he was delivered out of all his distresses and perplexities, and the following is his own description of how the fight was won, and the peace of God was gained. "I had risen from my bed in my soul agony—I was unable to sleep—and had gone into my closet to read my Bible. The portion I was reading was the third chapter of Romans; and as I read the twentieth and following verses, a new light seemed to break in on my soul. 'By the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in God's sight.' That I knew. But then I went on to read, 'But now, now, the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe: for there is no difference.' With that passage came light into my soul. Springing from my chair, I cried, 'If that Scripture be true, I am a saved man! That is what I want; that is what God offers me.'"

BEGINS TO WORK FOR CHRIST.

And now the light having been kindled, it must shine; the fountain having been opened, its waters must flow forth. About eleven months after his awakening at Dallas, he felt it to be his duty to render some service for the Lord, but thought he could not. It was suggested to him that he might at least distribute tracts, but he felt that to do so would make himself ridiculous, and that the people would laugh at him and call him mad. At last he resolved to try, and putting a number of tracts into his pocket, he went into the most secluded part of Elgin, in which he was then living. The first person he met was an old woman, who amazed him by accepting his tract without laughing at him. To another old woman whom he saw coming down the road he presented another tract, and she received it with thanks. The third he gave to a policeman, who said, "Thank you, Mr. North." He recorded it as his experience after fourteen years' trial, that only on one occasion was a tract refused, and that was by a professed infidel, and yet he had systematically given away tracts to persons of all ranks, in all sorts of places.

FIRST ADDRESS IN THE OPEN AIR.

In 1856 a providential circumstance led him to believe that the Lord was calling him to speaking, and not to hold his peace. He had gone to England to see his beloved mother, and when in London, he went one Sunday afternoon to visit a young man from Scotland, who had been appointed Secretary to a Young Men's Christian Institute. This young man used to spend his Sunday afternoons in street preaching. Mr. North accompanied him to one of his stations, and the young man began to address a promiscuous but not very numerous assembly. His words, however, did not tell, and were received at first with indifference, and soon with angry opposition and a torrent of the very foulest blasphemy.

Mr. North was beginning to doubt the wisdom of thus casting pearls before swine, when several voices were heard calling upon him to speak. "We'll hear that stout man with the dark eyes." Thus called on, he felt constrained to speak. Instantly every eye was fixed on him. He riveted and retained the attention of all; and when he met the blaspheming sophistry of the infidel, he manifestly carried the bulk of his audience along with him. When addressing to them a closing personal appeal, he was forced to stop through sheer exhaustion and want of breath. Many cried out, "Go on, sir, we want to hear more." But he was physically unable to say more. An old man in the crowd exclaimed, with glistening eyes, "Sir, your words should be written in letters of gold."

HIS 20 YEARS' EVANGELISTIC WORK.

Of his grand and triumphant work for Christ during the following twenty years which culminated in his death, we have no space to give full details on the present occasion. Perhaps there is no one of his contemporaries to whom spiritual and vital religion in Scotland owes more than to Brownlow North. He gave it an aggressive force and character which it was not exercising when he came forth as its herald, and under his leadership evangelical religion, instead of standing on the defensive, assaulted the strongholds of worldliness in all classes of society, from the highest to the lowest, with undaunted determination and success.

Being thoroughly assured that the Lord would have him preach the Gospel in the towns and villages of Scotland, with characteristic energy he threw himself enthusiastically into the work, giving up without hesitation his settled home. Having begun to preach in the Free Churches of Dallas and Forres in the beginning of July, 1856, he subsequently consented to preach in many of the churches of Morayshire and the adjoining counties. Wherever he went the Lord accompanied His Word by awakening the careless, and stimulating the negligent to consideration for their souls. In 1859 he was formally recognized as an Evangelist by the Free Church of Scotland.

THE GREAT ULSTER REVIVAL.

In the early part of 1859, that remarkable work of grace broke out in the north of Ireland, which must ever rank as one of the most notable revivals of modern times. It had been preceded by the great American revival of 1858, and was succeeded by the revival in Scotland of 1860. Mr. North passed over to take part in the wonderful work which was then progressing, and, in company with the Rev. Grattan Guinness, drew immense audiences in Londonderry, Belfast, Ballymena, and many other places, when hundreds of persons were prostrated by the suddenness and strength of their convictions of sin, and found peace, with forgiveness, at the foot of the cross.

EVANGELISTIC LABORS IN ENGLAND.

During the years which intervened between 1860 and his removal from Elgin to London, in 1871, he had spent much of his time in England, visiting most of the large towns and cities, with increasing success. Having fixed his residence in London he consecrated himself anew to the work of the Lord, and carried on his campaign with unabated interest, and in the next three years visited on his glorious errand a large number of the towns in the South and Southwest of England, and everywhere his solemn message was owned and blessed to the conversion of souls.

HIS LAST HARVEST IN SCOTLAND.

In 1874-5, Mr. North was permitted to reap another harvest of rich blessing in the great city of Glasgow. In the earlier months of the former year, while Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey were holding their memorable meetings in the various districts of Glasgow, Mr. North was at work in the large and populous parishes which girdle that city—Govan, Partick, and Hillhead.

A SINGULAR PROCESSION OF WORSHIPPERS.

Wherever he went he readily gained the ear of the populace, and very speedily had taken loving possession of their hearts. The announcement that Brownlow North was expected to speak in any church or public building was sufficient to attract eager listeners from quiet country homes far remote from each other, and for miles around. He was advertised to preach at Lochwinnoch, in the West of Scotland, but in consequence of the recent heavy rains, the whole district was covered with water, in some places to the depth of several feet.

But a number of people, undaunted by the discomfort and difficulty of locomotion, appeared at the meeting, who had finished a most toilsome journey, and got across the deepest part of the flood by walking along the top of a wall on the roadside. The singularity of this long procession of serious and solemnized worshippers going homeward in the still, gloomy night, marching in single file along the narrow path of stone, on either side of which lay a wide waste of waters, will long be remembered by many in the parish. (The illustration in the right hand panel of the lower portion of our front picture represents the scene.)

But the hour at length came when the Master summoned His servant home from his labor to his reward. The Vale of Leven Young Men's Christian Association had invited him to conduct a series of services which they had arranged for in the town of Alexandria, Dumbartonshire, and on October 24th, 1875, he preached in the Public Hall of Alexandria, to a crowded and attentive congregation. About 1200 persons were present. He preached for nearly an hour in his usual pointed and searching style, but was nearly prostrated by the effort. He preached, however, in the Free Church on the Wednesday and Friday following.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

It was on this Friday evening, while he was speaking on the 86th Psalm, to between six hundred and seven hundred persons, that he was struck down with illness. From the first, the physician who was summoned, took a gloomy view of the case, as both his heart and liver were seriously affected. For a week he rallied occasionally, and his anxious friends alternately hoped and feared. One of those who attended him, afterward told a stranger, who spoke to him on the concerns of his soul, that it was while watching by Brownlow North's dying bed that he was first impressed with the fact that there is reality in religion.

A friend who was present till the last likened him in his closing hours to "a great ship of war slowly entering the harbor, the sails all furled, the guns unshot, the excitement and the perils of the voyage over, and the desired haven reached." On November 9th, the Gates of Pearl swung back upon their hinges, and at the age of sixty-five, he entered into the presence of his Lord.

Escape of Lord Shaftesbury's Son from

Kaffirs.—At the annual meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society, recently held in London, the Earl of Shaftesbury narrated as a practical evidence of the influence of mission work, the following incident: "My son, who went out with Sir Bartle Frere, was commissioned to go on a political mission through Kaffirland. One day he turned a corner, and on the slope of a hill he saw a house filled with armed Kaffirs. He gave himself up for lost, as he was worth plundering, having some horses and firearms with him, and jewelry and money. He thought he would take a bold step, and so he walked into the house, when he was met by a Kaffir chief in a red blanket, who accosted him with the inquiry as to whether he had not seen him before. He replied, 'Very likely you have.' 'Were you not in the house of the missionary lately?' He replied, 'Yes, I was there.' 'That is sufficient, then, you may go in safety, for I will do you no harm,' and he went safely through Kaffirland to Cape Town."

MUSCULAR CHRISTIANITY.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"And called his name Samson: and the child grew, and the Lord blessed him."—Judges 13:24.

Exploits of Samson's Eventful Life—The Wedding-day Riddle—Four Practical Lessons to be Learned from the Text—I. Physical Power is not always an Index of Moral Power—II. The Damage Physical Strength can do if it be Misguided—III. Great Physical Power must Crumble and Expire—IV. We shall be brought into Judgment for the Employment of our Physical Organism—An Old Scotch Minister on Robert Pollock—The Judgment.

THERE are two sides to the character of Samson. The one phase of his life, if followed into the particulars, would administer to the grotesque and the mirthful; but there is a phase of his character fraught with lessons of solemn and eternal import. To these graver lessons we devote our morning sermon.

This giant no doubt in early life gave evidences of what he was to be. It is almost always so. There were two Napoleons—the boy Napoleon and the man Napoleon—but both alike; two Howards—the boy Howard and the man Howard—but both alike; two Samsons—the boy Samson and the man Samson—but both alike. This giant was no doubt the hero of the playground, and nothing could stand before his exhibitions of youthful prowess. At eighteen years of age he was betrothed to the daughter of a Philistine. Going down towards Timnath, a lion came out upon him, and, although this young giant was weaponless, he seized the monster by the long mane and shook him as a hungry hound shakes a March hare, and made his bones crack, and left him by the wayside bleeding under the smiting of his fist and the grinding heft of his heel.

Passing along after a while the same place, he turned into the thicket to see the remains of the monster that he had slain. Under the hot climate all the perishable particles of the lion had disappeared, and under the rain and the sun the skeleton had been washed and bleached until it was as pure and white as a vase of porcelain or a tank of gold. Into this skeleton the bees had gathered their honey—the sweetness of grass tops, the juice of the pomegranate, the aroma of the wild flowers which had stood in the gloom of the thickets, pale nuns in Nature's convent!

ON THE WEDDING-DAY,

Samson had propounded a riddle—a riddle so foolish that it has been recorded as a warning for those who, without talent for facetiousness, attempt that sort of thing. By the treachery of his wife the riddle was easily guessed by the Philistines, and Samson in his indignation slew thirty people. Further to avenge the wrong done him, he sets on fire three hundred foxes, and these terrified creatures in their alarm rush into the corn-shocks and the vineyards, until the whole land is ablaze with desolation. Surrounded one day by three thousand men, this giant picks up a jawbone from the wayside, and mows down the armed men as in a harvest field the full-head grain tumbles under the swing of a sickle.

Coaxed and over-persuaded by a woman who had almost pestered his life out, he tells the secret of his strength—that it lies in his long hair. His hair is shorn, and he becomes as weak as other men. Then his eyes are put out, and he is thrown into prison. But his hair begins to grow, his strength begins to come back, and one day, while three thousand people were ridiculing Samson in the temple of Dagon, he lays hold of the pillars and brings down the building in wild and thunderous wreck, nothing escaping save the groans of three thousand crushed idolaters.

I call your attention this morning to some practical lessons to be learned from the physical strength of Samson, drawing also some illustrations from our modern times.

I. First of all, behold in this giant of the text that physical power is of moral power. He was a huge man. The lion found it out, and the three thousand men whom he slew found it out; yet he was the subject of petty revenges and out-gianted by low passion. I am far from throwing any discredit upon physical stamina. There are those who seem to have great admiration for delicacy and sickliness of constitution. I never could see any glory in weak nerves or sick headache. Whatever effort in our day is made to make the men and women more robust should have the favor of every good citizen as well as of every Christian.

Good people sometimes ascribe to a wicked heart what they ought to ascribe to a slow liver. The body and the soul are such near neighbors that they often catch each other's diseases. Those who never saw a sick day, and who, like Hercules, show the giant in the cradle, have more to answer for than those who are the subjects of lifelong infirmities. He who can lift twice as much as you can, and walk twice as far, and work twice as long, will have a double account to meet in the judgment.

How often it is that you do not find physical energy indicative of spiritual power. If a clear head is worth more than one dizzy with perpetual vertigo—if muscles with the play of health in them are worth more than those drawn up in chronic "rheumatics,"—if an eye quick to catch passing objects is better than one with vision dim and uncertain—then God will require of us efficiency just in proportion to what He has given us. Physical energy ought to be a type of moral power. We ought to have as good digestion of truth as we have capacity to assimilate food. Our spiritual hearing ought to be as good as our physical hearing. Our spiritual taste ought to be as clear as our tongue. Samsons in body, we ought to be

GIANTS IN MORAL POWER.

But while you find a great many men who realize that they ought to use their money aright, and use their intelligence aright, how few men you find aware of the fact that they ought to use their physical organism aright. With every thump of the heart there is something saying, "Work! work!" and, lest we should complain that we have no tools to work with, God gives us our hands and feet, with every knuckle, and with every joint, and with every muscle saying to us, "Lay hold and do something."

But how often it is that men with physical strength do not serve Christ. They are like a ship full manned and full rigged, capable of vast tonnage, able to endure all stress of weather, yet swinging idly at the docks, when these men ought to be crossing and recrossing the great ocean of human suffering and sin with God's supplies of mercy. How often it is that physical strength is used in doing positive damage, or in luxurious ease, when, with sleeves rolled up and bronzed bosom, fearless of the shafts of opposition, it ought to be laying hold with all its might, and tugging away trying to lift up this sunken wreck of a world.

It is a most shameful fact that much of the business of the Church and of the world must be done by those comparatively invalid. Richard Baxter, by reason of his diseases, all his days sitting in the door of the tomb, yet writing more than a hundred volumes, and sending out an influence for God that will endure as long as the "Saints' Everlasting Rest." Edward Payson never knowing a well day; yet how he preached, and how he wrote, helping thousands of dying souls like himself to swim in a sea of glory! And Robert M'Cheyne, a walking skeleton; yet you know what he did in Dundee, and how he shook Scotland with zeal for God. Philip Doddridge, advised by his friends because of his illnesses not to enter the ministry, yet you know what he did for the "rise and progress of religion" in the church and in the world.

Wilberforce was told by his doctors that he could not live a fortnight, yet at that very time entering upon philanthropic enterprises that demanded the greatest endurance and persistence. Robert Hall, suffering excruciations, so that often in his pulpit while preaching he would stop and lie down on a sofa, then getting up again to preach about heaven until the glories of the celestial city dropped on the multitude, doing more work, perhaps than almost any well man in his day, while many of the clergy of his time were getting the gou on fat salaries, or, with horn and hound out on the fox-chase. Oh! how often it is that men with great physical endurance are not as great in moral and spiritual stature.

In this connection I might call to your mind that man whose death a few years ago excited so much attention (W. M. Tweed). When he was living, I gave you my idea of his business, and I gave it to you in unmistakable terms. When a man is living is the time to arraign his sins. Then, if he is arraigned falsely, he can answer. It is cowardly to assault the grave. That man has gone into the eternal world, and it is not our business to declare his destiny. The day of judgment will explain to all the universe, and give full satisfaction. But I call your attention to the fact that to no man in our country did God give more physical endurance. He was with nerves of iron and endurance unparalleled.

Whether he used that strength in slaying lions of sin, and pulling down temples of wrong, you know. God certainly gave to no man more magnificent opportunities of showing what a giant could do. Adjoined to such a body, had there been a soul full of love to God and majestic endeavor to improve the spiritual condition of the world, he might have challenged anything but omnipotence. While there are achievements for those who are bent all their days with sickness—achievements of patience, achievements of prayer, achievements of self-denial, achievements of Christian endurance, I call upon men of health to-day—men of muscle, men of nerve, men of physical power, to devote themselves to the Lord. Giants in body, you ought to be giants in soul.

II. Behold also in the story of my text illustration of the fact of

if it be misguided. It seems to me that this man spent a great deal of his time in doing evil—this Samson of my text. To pay a bet which he had lost by the guessing of his riddle, he robs and kills thirty people. He was not only gigantic in strength, but gigantic in mischief, and a type of those men in all ages of the world who, powerful in body, or mind, or any faculty of social position and wealth, have used their strength for iniquitous purposes.

It is not the small, weak men of the day who do the damage. These small men who go swearing and loafing about your stores and shops and banking houses, assailing Christ and the Bible and the church—they do not do the damage. They have no influence. They are vermin that you crush with your foot. But it is the giants of the day, the misguided giants, giants in physical power, or giants in mental acumen, or giants in social position, or giants in wealth, who do the damage.

The men with sharp pen that stab religion and throw their poison all through our literature; the men who use the power of wealth to sanction iniquity, and bribe justice, and make truth and honor bow to their golden sceptre.

MISGUIDED GIANTS.

Look out for them! In the middle and the latter part of the last century no doubt there were thousands of men in Paris and Edinburgh and London who hated God and blasphemed the name of the Almighty; but they did but little mischief. They were small men, insignificant men. Yet there were giants in those days.

Who can calculate the soul-havoc of a Rousseau, going on with a very enthusiasm of iniquity, with fiery imagination scizing upon all the impulsive natures of his day? or David Hume, who employed his life as a spider employs its summer, in spinning out silken webs to trap the unwary? or Voltaire, the most learned man of his day, marshalling a great host of sceptics, and leading them out in the dark land of infidelity? or Gibbon, who showed an uncontrollable grudge against religion in his history of one of the most fascinating periods of the world's existence—the decline and fall of the Roman Empire—a book in which, with all

* Last Tuesday being a legal holiday THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to press one day earlier than usual, consequently an interesting sermon by Dr. Talmage, which has not before appeared in these columns, is inserted this week in place of his last Sunday morning sermon, which will be published at the first opportunity.

splendors of his genius he magnified the errors of Christian disciples, while with a sparseness of price that never can be forgiven he treated of the Christian heroes of whom the world was not worthy?

Cæsar Borgia, Hildebrand, Robespierre, Byron, misguided giants. O, men of stout physical health, men of great mental stature, men of high social position, men of great power of any sort, I want you to understand your power, and I want you to know that that power devoted to God will be a crown on earth to you typical of a crown in heaven; but misguided, bedraggled in sin, administrative of evil, God will thunder against you with His condemnation in the day when millionaire and pauper, master and slave, king and subject shall stand side by side in the judgment, and money-bags, and judicial ermine, and royal robe shall be riven with the lightnings.

III. Behold also in this giant of the text and in the giant of our own century that great and expire. The Samson of the text long ago went away. He fought the lion. He fought the Philistines. He could fight anything, but Death was too much for him. He may have required a longer grave and a broader grave; but the tomb nevertheless was his terminus. So it was with the Samson of our own day.

There never was so grand a fight for life as that man made. He fought Death back from the ballot-boxes of election, fought Death back to the deck of a Southern steamer, fought Death back to South Carolina, fought him back to Florida. Then here came a turn in the battle, and he fought Death back to New York, and fought Death back to Troy, and fought Death back to Saratoga! It was the most tremendous battle for life I ever read of, but unsuccessful. Ah! if the giant of the text and the giant of our century could not finally succeed in the contest against Death, we of lesser fibre and lesser strength I think will have to surrender.

What! do you tell me that the muscle of the arm must be shrunken, that the tongue must be palsied, that the foot must halt in its march, and halt forever? Yes. If the giant of the text surrendered, and the giant of our century surrendered, we shall surrender. By prudence, by good habits, by the enthronement of moral principle, we may postpone the hour; but come it must and come it will.

If, then, we are to be compelled to go out of this world, where we are to go to? Shall we stand here trying to decide the destiny of while we have not decided our own? Why, you make me think of a sea captain who, caught in a cyclone, bothers himself about whether the ship belonging to the White Star Line and the ship belonging to the Cunard Line are going to outride the tempest, while he forgets all about his own ship, which is already within the roaring of the Newfoundland breakers.

Oh, my friends, we have an immortal nature we must get into harbor. This body and soul must soon part. What shall be the destiny of the former I know. Dust to dust. But what shall be the destiny of the latter? Shall it rise into the companionship of the white-robed, whose sins Christ has slain? or will it go down among the unbelieving, who tried to gain the world and save their souls, but were swindled out of both? Blessed be God,

WE HAVE A CHAMPION.

He is so styled in the Bible. A Champion who has conquered death and hell, and He is ready to fight all our battles from the first to the last. "Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, mighty to save?" If we follow in the wake of that Champion, death has no power and the grave no victory. The worst man trusting in Him shall have his dying pangs alleviated and his future illumined.

IV. In the light of this subject, I want to call your attention to a fact which may not have been rightly considered by five men in this house, and that is the fact that we must be brought into judgment for the employment of

OUR PHYSICAL ORGANISM.

Shoulder, brain, hand, foot—we must answer in judgment for the use we have made of them. Have they been used for the elevation of society, or for its depression? In proportion as our arm is strong and our step elastic will our account at last be intensified. Thousands of sermons are preached to invalids. I preach this sermon this morning to stout men and healthful women. We must give to God an account for the right use of this physical organism.

These invalids have comparatively little to account for, perhaps. They could not lift twenty pounds. They could not walk half a mile without sitting down to rest. In the preparation of this subject I have said to myself, how shall I account to God in judgment for the use of a body which never knew one moment of real sickness? Rising up in judgment, standing beside the men and the women who had only little physical energy, and yet consumed that energy in a conflagration of religious enthusiasm, how will we feel abashed!

Oh, men of the strong arm, and the stout heart, what use are you making of your physical forces? Will you be able to stand the test of that day when we must answer for the use of every talent, whether it were a physical energy, or a mental acumen, or a spiritual power?

HARK! IT THUNDERS.

That day advances, and I see some one who in this world was an invalid, and as she stands before the throne of God to answer she says, "I was sick all my days. I had but very little strength, but I did as well as I could in being kind to those who were more sick and more suffering." And Christ will say, "Well done, faithful servant." And then there will come up one who will say, "I went on crutches, all my days. It was very hard for me to get about, but I tried to serve the Lord, and I tried to be patient under all my infirmities, and though I have not many stars in my crown I rejoice that I have been able to do something for Jesus." "Well done, faithful servant," says Jesus; "well done."

And then a little child will stand before the throne, and she will say, "On earth I had a curvature of the spine, and I was very weak, and I was very sick; but I used to go out and gather flowers out of the wild wood and bring them to my sick mother, and she was comforted when she saw the sweet flowers out of the wild wood. I didn't do much, but I did something." And Christ shall say, as He takes her up in His arm and kisses her, "Well done, well done, faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

What then will be said to us—we to whom the Lord gave physical strength and continuous health? Hark! it thunders again.

THE JUDGMENT! THE JUDGMENT!

I said to an old Scotch minister, who was one of the best friends I ever had, "Doctor, did you ever know Robert Pollock, the Scotch poet, who wrote 'The Course of Time'?" "Oh, yes," he replied, "I knew him well; I was his classmate." And then the doctor went on to tell me how that the writing of "The Course of Time" exhausted the health of Robert Pollock, and he expired. It seems as if no man could have such a glimpse of the day for which all other days were made as Robert Pollock had, and long survive that glimpse. In the description of that day, he says, among other things:

Begin the woe, ye woods, and tell it to the doleful winds,

And doleful winds wail to the howling hills,
And howling hills mourn to the dismal vales,
And dismal vales sigh to the sorrowing brooks,
And sorrowing brooks weep to the weeping stream,
And weeping stream awake the groaning deep;
Ye heavens, great archway of the universe, put sack-cloth on:

And ocean, robe thyself in garb of widowhood,
And gather all thy waves into a groan, and utter it.
Long, loud, deep, piercing, dolorous, immense.

The occasion asks it, Nature dies, and angels come to lay her in her grave.

What Robert Pollock saw in poetic dream, you and I will see in positive reality, the judgment! the judgment!

JEWS FLOCKING TO JUDEA.

THE persecution of Jews in Russia continues with such severity that thousands of them are emigrating to Syria and Palestine. The great problem as to how Scripture prophecies regarding their restoration to Palestine would be fulfilled is now being solved. The marvel used to be what circumstances could ever lead to the Jews returning to Judea. Now we see that the moving cause is to be persecution driving them unwillingly out of Russia and Poland. This constitutes the most remarkable sign of the speedy approach of the Second Advent of Christ. (Ezekiel 38, etc.)

On May 2d the Committee of Russian Ministers considered a series of regulations for the treatment of the Jews, which have been prepared at the Ministry of the Interior. These regulations are accompanied by a general report on the Jewish question, and the position of the Hebrew population in Russia. The report is described by the more Liberal organs of the press as being of the nature of a general indictment against the whole Jewish race, accusing them of every conceivable crime.

It is proposed to make more absolute the existing penal prohibitions against the purchase by Jews of land or houses; to make their residence in any but the larger towns contingent on the consent of the surrounding Christian inhabitants; to enforce more stringently the laws confining their right of residence to specified districts, and to prohibit them from tavern-keeping in any but the larger towns. The first of these measures is said to be suggested by the complaints of the peasantry as to the scarcity of land. The second will simply place the Jews in the villages at the mercy of the peasants, who will be tempted to extort money from them for the permission to remain in their homes, and will force them to submit quietly to every species of ill-treatment, under pain of banishment should they complain. The third, by crowding the Jews together, makes their gaining of a livelihood by trade alone more difficult, and prevents the possibility of their assimilation with the other races in the empire; while the fourth, which purports to have for its motive the necessity of checking the demoralizing influence of tavern keeping, will only cause the houses to change hands, to the pecuniary damage of the Jews, and to the presumable detriment of the morals of the Christians who will succeed them in the trade.

Alarming accounts have been received from Poland of a fresh outbreak of fanaticism against the Jews. A town in the district of Warsaw is reported to have been laid in ashes.

The crowd of Jewish fugitives fleeing from Russia grows daily, and the relief committees are powerless to deal with the terrible distress. Doubts are now raised whether it will be possible or desirable to despatch so many emigrants to America. Baron Bleichröder suggests that some should be forwarded to those parts of Turkey where railways are been constructed; and he has promised to intercede to get the emigrants employment on the works.

Trains of Jewish emigrants from Russia have arrived at Lemberg in Austria. They were mostly children and women, whose lineaments bore witness of the awful terror and misery these unfortunate people have had to suffer. The fugitives were entertained by a committee of ladies, and were sent to Hamburg with a great number of other emigrants in the evening. Two thousand Jews have already emigrated from Warsaw in Poland, but much greater is the number of the expelled from Kiev and Moscow. The Governor of Odessa, General Gourko, is reported to have said that he would not be able efficiently to hold in check the persecutors of the Jews with the military forces under his command, and he has declared in favor of the proclamation of martial law. The landowners in Southern Russia are already beginning to feel the consequences of the expulsion of the Jews.

As the corn trade with foreign countries was almost entirely in their hands, the utmost confusion and disorder have been introduced into those departments of industry dependent upon this important branch of Russian commerce.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Breaking the Wine Bottles.—At the Prayer meeting, April 25th, speaking of the "burning of the books" as related in Acts 19, Mr. Jack said: "I remember a revival that broke out in the North, and one effect of it was that the people took the whiskey barrels and rolled the contents over the rocks into the sea. I recollect, too, being in Kells, when a lady named Miss Scott asked a number of temperance reformers to go to her residence and see her break the bottles of wine in the wine cellar which she had inherited, and pour the liquor down the sewers. Her intention she faithfully carried out. The Tweed ultimately received the contents of her cellar. A physician complained of the waste, saying that the wine might have been given to the infirm, but whatever view be taken, no one was made intoxicated by the wine."

A Publican's Death.—At the Testimony Meeting on April 24th a young man said: "I thank God that He has saved my soul. It is about a month ago, when you were preaching at the church in Brown Street. What impressed me was the story you told about the Yorkshire farmer going to London, and finding and forgiving a prodigal, whom he led to Christ. I had a godly mother, but when she died I went headlong into drink again, having for some time previously resisted temptation; in fact, I had been a Good Templar for three years. It was by seeing the death of a saloon keeper, a comrade of mine, that I began to think what a miserable thing a drunkard's life is, and how awful his end, and I resolved to reform when I first came to Glasgow. Through faith in Christ I have now found eternal life."

A Blacksmith Born Again.—At the Meeting on April 24th, a speaker said: "A week ago I went to the workshop of a blacksmith, a notorious drunkard, and asked him to go to the Circus meeting, but he refused. I prayed for him and at last he consented to attend. A lady spoke to him about his soul, and he was led to Christ and went home rejoicing. His wife told me that for ten years her husband had not been a single Sunday without strong drink; in fact, the Sabbath was a terror to her. But now he is clothed and in his right mind, and testifying to what the Lord has done for him. I went to his smithy just before I came to this meeting, and he told me that he had been up and at work since six o'clock. He never used to rise until nine or ten o'clock on the Monday morning, as he required an extra rest to sleep off the fumes of whiskey."

Wines and Spirits in the Way.—Mr. Campbell White read the following letter: "Dear Mr. Moody—I tried but could not pray for the proposed special efforts to be put forth to reach the mass of drunkards in Glasgow. A voice within me cried, 'Put away the cursed thing.' Now, I have long considered myself a very pious Christian, and an exemplary head of a family, but wines and spirits I regarded as a sort of domestic necessity in well-ordered families, and I did not see occasion to give up the usage of good neighbors; but when this cursed thing had to be prayed against for the benefit of others, I had either to remove it from my tent or go perilously near the portion of Meroz (Judges 5: 23); and for the same reason I resolved to approach the matter with clean hands. I know now you will see a manifestation of Jesus's saving power which will surprise even you."

Two Medical Students Won for Christ.—Mr. Campbell said: "I had the privilege a few nights ago of speaking to two young students of medicine at the university, as they were leaving the Circus. As I put my hand on the shoulder of one of them, I said, 'Are you not going to stay?' He replied, 'I am not at all anxious; it is only the anxious who are invited to stay.' I said, 'Stop awhile, and we will reason on the matter a little.' There in the shadow of the curtain which hangs over the doorway we began our conversation, and in a short time the young man got interested. The tears began to trickle down his face, and his soul was evidently deeply stirred. We had talked together for three-quarters of an hour, when his friend came forward, reminding him that it was late, and asking him if he were not going. He added, 'You can come back and hear more another time.' I said to the weeping one, 'Are you inclined to go?' He said, 'I am not particularly anxious to go; I should like to hear more.' The friend who had brought him into the meeting, and who was a Christian, now approached, and I said, 'Will you just take your acquaintance in hand and go with him, for he also seems anxious about his soul.' He did so; and leaving the place about an hour afterwards, I saw the two going along leisurely together, though it was pouring with rain, and in earnest conversation about Christ and Him crucified. Three weeks since the second young man was converted in the National Hall."

The Man in the Ditch.—Mr. Scroggie said: "About eighteen years ago three ministers were walking on a country road a little north of Aberdeen. It was late at night, and they had been attending a meeting in the country. As they went along they noticed a countryman scrambling on all fours out of a ditch. One of the ministers said, 'I must go and speak to that man.' The two others tried to dissuade him, telling him it was of no use, and that he would get nothing but abuse. But the minister said, 'The Spirit of God bids me, and I must speak to him.' By this time the man had got out of the ditch. The minister began to speak to him, whereupon the fellow took off his coat and wanted to fight him. The minister said, 'I can fight, but not with your weapons'; and getting down on his knees, he began to pray very earnestly for the man. As he pleaded, God touched the man's heart, and he got down on his knees beside the minister. By the time the minister had finished his prayer, the drunkard was ready to be spoken with; and he was pointed to a sin-forgiving God. They stopped at the first cottage on the road, and asked the people if they could lodge the man for the night. After looking at him, the cottier said, 'Why, we have just been holding a prayer-meeting for that very man—HE IS MY BROTHER! We have had a special prayer-meeting to-night to ask God for his salvation.' Five years afterward, when that friendly minister told me this story, he said that the man was still standing a living witness to the power of God, and he was being used as a great blessing to others."

A Lady Stopping a Fight.—At one of the prayer-meetings in Glasgow, Mr. Stoughton said: "I was greatly struck by a story told me by a lady who has been working for many years in Gospel temperance work. She was going along the street one day with her husband, when she saw two men fighting. She went up to them and asked them to desist. They did so. Then she said, 'Are you going to stop in the town?' 'No,' they said, 'we are going away at six o'clock.' It was then four o'clock. She said, 'Come to my house and have tea!' They looked surprised, but after a little hesitation they accepted the invitation. They went with her, had tea, and then the lady said, 'Perhaps you would like to hear me sing something?' They said, 'Yes, we should,' and on her asking them what they would like, they proposed a drinking song. The lady had often visited the saloons, and knowing the song, she sang it, there being nothing morally objectionable in it. 'Now,' said the lady, 'I have sung something to please you, and I want to sing something to please myself.' She then sang one of Mr. Sankey's solos, and the men were melted to tears. She next spoke to them about their souls, and having seen them off at the station, made earnest prayer for their conversion to Christ. About two years afterwards, the lady was speaking in a mission hall in the same town, and when the meeting was over a man came up to her and said, 'Don't you remember me?' She said, 'No, I haven't any knowledge of you.' He said, 'Don't you remember stopping me and another man fighting?' The lady then remembered the circumstance. He said, 'What you then said and did was the means of my conversion. I am now working for the Lord.'"

Music in the Drunkard's Ears.—At a Temperance prayer-meeting, Mr. Barclay said: "Of late we have seen wonderful work. During the past year we have been holding special Gospel temperance meetings in connection with the Carrubers' Close Mission, and some of the worst people in the have been saved. About a month ago a woman who was one of the most notorious drunks attended one of these meetings, and heard that God could save every drunkard. It sounded like music in her ears. She had so frequently broken the pledge that she had given herself up lost. Her friends were well connected, but she living in the home for inebriates. Hearing the full tidings, she there and then accepted the Jesus Christ and besought him to deliver her from this horrid curse of drink. He did it. She changed her life so told upon the inmates of this place that they began to say, 'What is it; how has come about?' and the woman said, 'It is the Jesus Christ who has saved me from the drink.' They inquired, 'Could some of those friends come here?' and so this woman wrote a letter. Some of us soon afterwards went down. Our brother, Mr. Dunn, was the first to speak, and mighty power of God was in the meeting. Several women stood up and cried to God for mercy in midst of the meeting. One hundred and seven these notorious drunkards have been reclaimed, and many of them have given themselves to Christ. One poor woman entered the Home last week she had been there many times before—and said, 'This is not the same place I have been before. There used to be nothing but oaths, curses, but now there is nothing but hymn-singing and prayer to God.' We find the blue ribbon great use; it is a profession that the wearer done with drink."

THE KING OF THE SOUTH.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Bible Name of Egypt—The Past History of the Land—Napoleon's Career—Rivalry between France and England—The Political Importance of Egypt—The Fall of the Turkish Empire—The Suez Canal—Financial Collapse of Egypt—French and English Interest in Egypt's Predicted Future—England and Russia—Near Fulfilment of Prophecy.

EGYPT is just now brought so prominently before the public mind, in consequence of its critical political condition, which threatened but a few weeks ago to precipitate a crisis, the ultimate results of which it was difficult to foresee; that it may not be unprofitable if I here attempt somewhat to supplement what has been already said regarding its prophetic future, as well as its present condition.

THE BIBLE NAME OF EGYPT.

Mizraim, the Bible name of Egypt, is supposed by many writers to be the name of a patriarch, as much as it occurs as such in the list of Noah's descendants in Genesis 10: 6; but as the word itself is a dual form, meaning, according to Sayce, "the two Mazors" or "fortifications," most probably denotes Lower and Upper Egypt, the latter being properly called Pathros, or "land of the south," from which circumstance, well as from its geographical position in relation to Palestine, may have arisen the fact that in prophecies of Daniel the ruler of Egypt is designated "the king of the south" (Daniel 11).

That this is a fact; that the identification of sovereign of Egypt with "the king of the south" is no mere speculative opinion, may be learnt from the seventh and eighth verses of the eleventh chapter of Daniel, where we are told that one of the royal family of Egypt "shall come with an army and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, and shall deal against them and shall prevail, and shall also carry captive into Egypt the gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver and gold; and he (i.e., the bearer out of the roots of the daughter of the king of the south mentioned in verse 6, now himself become ruler of Egypt) shall continue more years than the king of the north. So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom (i.e., Egypt, as shown in the preceding verse), and shall return into his own land."

THE PAST HISTORY OF THE LAND.

It is not necessary on the present occasion that I should refer to the past history of Egypt. "The Land of Ham," or Chem, as the Arabs call it, has now, ever been a land of "wonders," and its history has scarcely been less wonderful than architectural and geographical peculiarities. After ranking as one of the first of the nations many centuries, it was conquered first by the Persians, under Cambyses, B.C. 525, and in more recent times by the Turks, under whose debasing cruel rule the solemn prediction of Ezekiel has literally fulfilled: "It shall be the basest of kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations. For I will diminish it, that they shall no more rule over the nations" (Ezekiel 29:15).

It was in connection with the important events which immediately followed the great French Revolution at the close of the last century, that Egypt again became something more than a geographical expression, in the estimation of sovereigns and statesmen of Europe. The essence of those whom the great English statesman, George Canning, denominated "the without God," was not long permitted to exercise unchecked its reign of blood and terror.

A GREAT MILITARY USURPER

One whose name as well as his career served to reflect him in many minds with the predicted final Antichrist—was raised up to occupy the place of the "eldest son of the (Romish) church," to make an end of the "Holy Roman Empire," to carry the Pope himself in humiliating captivity to Fontenoy. Napoleon's armies triumphant occupied nearly every capital in Europe, but he subsequently proved that his commission, scourge sent by God, was specially restricted to territories of the apostate church of Rome. In England, Russia, and in the East he was merciless; his career of conquest was arrested by his march to Moscow, which ended in that disastrous retreat in which his army perished amid the snows of Russia, and after the deadly wound at Waterloo the captive eagle was left to pine out its remaining days amid the solitudes of the barren rocks of St. Helena.

It does not seem out of place at the present time in the history of Egypt, which is so strikingly connected with the rapid evolution of the prophetic future, to recall the fact that it was the scene of the first Napoleon's victory over the Sultan, when he sought to inspire his troops by telling them that forty centuries looked on them from the summits of the pyramids. Indeed, the conquest of the East, beginning with Egypt, had been the original object of his vaulting ambition, and accordingly the youthful hero of Austerlitz and Arcola, after reducing the Sardinians and Persians to abject submission, set sail, in 1798, for the Nile, filled with dreams of eastern conquest as illustrated the history of Alexander the Great.

His, however, was not to be; by the invasion of Egypt he manifestly exceeded his commission, although, after defeating both the Mamelukes and the Turks, he entered Cairo as a conqueror, and his French fleet was annihilated by Nelson in the bay of the Nile very shortly afterward, by which his victory his army was imprisoned in Egypt, and finally defeated by Sir Ralph Abercromby, and compelled to capitulate. In these events it is difficult to think, not to see a foreshadowing of what still to take place in the not distant future.

RIVALRY BETWEEN FRANCE AND ENGLAND.

The old rivalry between France and England for supremacy in Egypt, though just at present inactive, is by no means dead, and must, it is to be feared, again end in the arbitrament of the sword; for the virtual if not the nominal possession of Egypt by England has now become a matter of vital importance to the latter, and inspired policy as well as political exigencies, plainly demand that it must shortly become un fait accompli. The mission of the ships of Chittim (i.e., us; comp. Daniel 11:30 with Numbers 24) in connection with the working out of the destiny of Egypt is not, we may rest assured, by means as yet fulfilled. A mightier and more powerful enemy than France has yet to feel their way.

It is to return to the recent history of Egypt, and the termination of the great revolutionary war, Egypt continued as before to be a Turkish province; but in 1806 the able and energetic Mehemet Ali Pasha was made Viceroy of Egypt, and was succeeded by his son, Ibrahim Pasha, who in 1831 defeated the Turks, invaded Syria, and would in all probability have achieved his independence had he not, in 1840, been compelled to submit to the armed intervention of England. It was his son, Said Pasha, who granted the charter of concession to the great Suez Ship Canal Company, formed for the purpose of restoring the connection between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea, of which I shall have to speak presently.

THE POLITICAL IMPORTANCE OF EGYPT.

Among the present circumstances which give such grave importance to "the Egyptian Question" in the eyes of the statesmen of Europe in general, and those of Great Britain in particular, the four following seem especially to call for mention:

1. The intimate connection of the future of Egypt with the impending fall of the Turkish Empire.
2. The creation of a new route to India by the making of the Suez Canal.
3. The financial collapse of Egypt, originating the present Anglo-French financial control.
4. The conflicting interests of England and France in Northern Africa.

THE FALL OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE.

As regards the first of these "problems of practical politics," as they may well be called, it is the universal conviction, not of "crazy prophecy-mongers" alone, but of well-informed politicians throughout Europe, that the final downfall of the Turkish Power in Europe can only be a question of a few years; and strange to say, by none is this conviction more strongly felt than by the Turks themselves, the year 1883 having even been fixed upon as the limit of the era within which the Crescent is to return to Asia, and the Cross supplant it on the towers of Stamboul. Now the question is, when this event takes place—as soon take place it must—when "the sick man" at last dies, and his possessions are scrambled for by a number of hungry and not over-scrupulous heirs, to whose share is Egypt to fall? Neither Germany nor Austria, nor even Russia, if once in possession of Constantinople, have any special interests in Egypt; but with England and France, to say nothing of Italy, the case is different; the question of the virtual possession of Egypt being to England, as I have already said, a vital one.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

2. Of course the vast importance to England of the question who is to have dominion over Egypt, arises from the existence of the Suez Canal, which has made the latter country practically the key to India. With that key in any other hands it would be in perpetual danger. For, of a truth, if the saying of the great Napoleon, that "whatever European nation obtained possession of Egypt could conquer India," was true when he uttered it, how much more true has it become since the opening of the Suez Canal. Lord Palmerston, at least, was not blind to the political consequences of the scheme when it was first mooted, and steadily opposed its execution; moreover, the natural difficulties were enormous; but nothing can prevent the working out of the designs of Providence: in spite of English opposition, in spite of the desert sands, the great work was finally accomplished, the canal was opened in 1869, and thereby, it is not too much to say, the future destiny of two continents was materially affected.

THE FINANCIAL COLLAPSE OF EGYPT.

3. It was after the brilliant but prodigal career of Ismail Pasha, who succeeded his brother Said in 1863, that the financial collapse took place, out of which the Anglo-French financial control and the present crisis have both originated. It so happens that the bulk of the Khédive's creditors are either English or French, and this circumstance gives France the right to be associated on equal terms with England in the adjustment of Egyptian finances on behalf of her bondholders. Now this Anglo-French "control" not only contains within itself the seeds of future serious complications between the two countries, but the present Egyptian national movement, as it is called, and of which the recent military émeute was only a grave symptom, owes its origin and much of its strength thereto.

The Egyptian fellaheen are an ignorant, over-taxed and suffering people, and it is not to be wondered at, therefore, that they should regard the action of England and France in a very unfavorable light. "You have remedied the fiscal administration," they indignantly cry out, "but only for your own selfish interests, that your bondholders may be paid. What have you done for us? Have you listened to our demands for justice? Have you lightened our burdens? Are we one iota the better off because of your interference?" Hence the cry of "Egypt for the Egyptians," and the rapid spread of the movement.

"Notwithstanding the apparent lull in the situation at Cairo," writes a correspondent of the Telegraph, "there seems to be ground for apprehension as to the future. Everywhere there are manifestations of a grave character. The Khédive is dissatisfied, and has no confidence even in Sherif Pasha. The outlook is a gloomy one, and it will be interesting to watch the coming proceedings of the Chamber of Notables."

FRENCH AND ENGLISH INTERESTS.

4. But the financial difficulty is, it is much to be feared, not the only one likely, sooner or later, to bring England and France into collision in reference to Egypt. By her recent invasion of Tunis, in the subjection of which state she is at the present moment engaged, at a great loss of life and treasure, France has clearly revealed her intention of becoming supreme in North Africa. When the conquest of Tunis is accomplished, that of Tripoli will doubtless follow, and then, if not before, must come the question of Egypt.

Now, as has already been observed, neither Germany, Austria, nor Russia have any paramount interests in Egypt; but when, on the collapse of the Turkish power, the time for the distribution of the territories still ruled by the Sultan shall have fully come, it will exactly suit the policy of these powers to bring about a rupture between France and England, so that while they are fighting over Egypt, Russia may swoop down upon Armenia and Constantinople, while Austria occupies the Balkan peninsula, and Germany finds compensation by the absorption of Holland and Denmark, Belgium being handed over to France as an equivalent for the lost provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. Politically viewed it will thus be seen that the present aspect of the "Egyptian Question" is sufficiently dark and threatening.

(To be concluded.)

A Dying Idiot Girl's Song.—Mrs. Wall, of Rome, Italy, says that a woman, whom she calls M. S., was brought to Christ by means of suffering and tribulation. At Naples she was led to attend an evangelical meeting, but she never understood the Gospel, thinking the object was rather political than religious. She came with her husband to Rome, but, not being able to procure employment, he was led away by evil companions, and with them committed a theft, for which he was imprisoned for four years. At this time, in the bitterness of her grief, left with two children, a little boy of four and a girl of fourteen, quite an idiot, she came to the meetings for the poor, hoping to get a little relief, and was converted to Christ. Last winter she was obliged to go to the hospital, and it was with the greatest difficulty she could get any one to receive her idiot child, not even by paying. The poor child had never spoken, and could only make a strange noise. When she wanted food, if it was not given her, she would bite even her mother. The only thing in which she showed any reasonable interest was singing. Her mother could often quiet her, when everything else failed, by singing some of the hymns she had learned at the meetings for the poor. One day in September she persisted in making her mother sing, "Safe in the arms of Jesus;" while listening the child was taken with convulsions, and in two hours she closed her eyes, and without a struggle passed from this world, which to her had been so full of clouds and darkness.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate has Passed the Bill to Distribute the unappropriated portion of the money awarded to the United States by the Geneva Arbiters in the Alabama dispute. The bill, which has already passed the house with only two dissentients, passed in the Senate by a vote of 38 to 12. The President is believed to be opposed to the proposed method of dividing the money, but in view of the large majorities by which it passed the Senate and the House it is believed that he will not veto it, as the majorities are sufficient to pass it over his veto. The bill revives the Court of Commissioners. The order of precedence for claimants on the fund is first those who suffered direct damage from Southern cruisers; and second, those who paid heavy war risks as insurance premiums. It will be remembered that both these classes of claims were expressly barred out at Geneva, but having received the award Congress is of opinion that it has the right to distribute it according to its own ideas of right, and rejected a proposal that the money unawarded should, as a matter of justice, be returned to England.

A Contested Election Case in South Carolina occupied the attention of the House of Representatives during the greater part of last week, and fears are entertained that it may result in a deadlock. This would be exceptionally inconvenient at this time when so few appropriation bills have been passed. From the speeches made, it appears that at the last election in South Carolina the seat was claimed by the Democrats for Mr. O'Connor, while the Republicans insisted that his opponent, Mr. Mackey, was duly elected. Mr. O'Connor died before taking his seat, and a new election was ordered; but as the Republicans claimed that Mr. O'Connor was never elected, they did not put a candidate in the field, and Mr. Dibble, a Democrat, was in consequence, elected. The question now before the House is as to the validity of Mr. Dibble's claim to the seat.

A Most Humiliating Report has been Issued by the committee appointed by the Legislature of New York State to investigate the methods of insurance receiverships. The committee severely censures the receivers and the judge of the Supreme Court, who was most active in appointing them. It charges that in the cases of insolvent insurance companies the receivers have unreasonably delayed the distribution of the assets, have made excessive charges, have employed legal advisers unnecessarily, and have frequently performed no kind of work whatever in return for their enormous fees, but have employed deputies paid out of the estate to perform their duties. The report also censures the judge for appointing such men. This scandal is exceedingly heinous on account of the condition of the people who incurred loss. The sufferers in most cases were widows and orphans whom the failures plunged into abject poverty. It seems doubtful whether the wrongdoers can be punished under the law as it now exists, but it may be hoped that the exposure may prevent a recurrence of the offence, and lead also to the enactment of a law under which offenders may be punished.

The House of Representatives has Passed the important bill introduced by Mr. Crapo for extending the charters of the national banks by a vote of 125 to 67. The majority was made up of 103 Republicans and 22 Democrats. The minority consisted of 56 Democrats, 8 Greenbackers, and 3 Republicans. Several amendments were introduced, but they were lost. The most persistent effort to change the character of the bill was made on a proposal to issue more greenbacks to take the place of the notes issued by the banks. Mr. Crapo's bill as it finally passed the House provides that any national bank may, two years before its charter expires, renew it for a period not longer than twenty years. It must redeem all its notes prior to extension and issue new ones readily distinguishable from its old ones.

Mr. Shipherd Proposes to Publish the Documents in proof of his charges against the ex-Secretary of State in the Peruvian matter. Among them he asserts is a letter from President Garfield, and copies of correspondence which passed between the State Department and Lima. The Investigating Committee invited him to present all documents in his possession relating to the case, but Mr. Shipherd declined. It is most important that the real facts of the case should be known to the public, but it is doubtful whether Mr. Shipherd's intended method will have that effect.

Prohibition in Kansas is Still much Under discussion in political circles, which are divided in opinion as to the effect it has had upon the prosperity of the State. Some of the State journals say that the State was never more prosperous and the population never increased more rapidly. As to the political aspects of the question one of them sums up the situation thus: "At least three-fourths of the Republican voters of the State are prohibitionists, while the Democratic party is divided upon the subject, with the organization of the party probably in the hands of the anti-prohibitionists. The discussion of the Gubernatorial question, which has a near relation to the same subject, has developed the fact that there is no public man in Kansas with either the courage or temerity to take the field as an avowed opponent of prohibition."

The Conviction of General N. M. Curtis on Thursday, May 25th, was a surprise to the politicians. The jury found the defendant guilty of having received $5 for political purposes from Peter Vogelsang, a messenger in the Custom House. Also of having received a check for $80 from Charles Treichner, employed as an auditor in the Custom House. The counsel for General Curtis gave notice that he would move for an arrest of judgment on the ground that the conviction was unconstitutional, and June 2d was fixed as the date for argument on the motion. General Curtis was allowed to go on his own recognizance. Some consternation was caused in official quarters by the intelligence of the result of the trial, as if the law is stringent enough to convict the receiver of assessments, it is strong enough to punish those who pay them.

The Peabody Trust Fund Invested in Tennessee bonds at six per cent, has not drawn any interest, it appears, since the repudiation policy has been adopted. Mr. Peabody, when he gave these bonds to the Institute, advised the trustees not to sell them at a discount, believing that the State would pay them in full, principal and interest. From the Peabody Educational Fund, the State of Tennessee has received down to 1881 $247,650. Mr. Enoch Pratt has now made an appeal to the Governor and legislature of the State for a reconsideration of the claim. "I cannot think," he says, "that a State which has been the recipient of this large bounty from Mr. Peabody—a free gift to its people—would willingly or knowingly destroy or injure an institution which he had greatly heart by a refusal or failure to pay to that institution its just dues. I understand that the State of Tennessee protects its own educational institution making, in its settlement with its creditors, an exception in their favor; and it seems but just that the Peabody Institute, which is educational in its operations, should be included in the same provision of law, especially since the State has already received from Mr. Peabody's educational fund sum nearly equal to the original debt due this institute." A report is current that Mr. Pratt's appeal will find support in influential quarters.

The Immigration of the Past Month has been unprecedented in the history of the country. The returns for the Port of New York alone were no less than 70,376, an increase of 9100 over the same month in 1881. The total arrivals from January 1st were 142,716, against 109,123 for the same period last year. Of the arrivals during April, 1882, 28,533 were Germans. The other nationalities were represented as follows: Ireland, 7836; Sweden, 7189; Italy, 6391; England, 6186; Holland, 2691; Norway, 2282; Denmark, 2057; Switzerland, 1794; Scotland, 1199; Austria, 956; Russia, 775; Bohemia, 579; Hungary, 405; France, 385; Poland, 19; Wales, 117; Belgium, 99; other countries, 41. Such figures show how unspeakably important is that the efforts made to spread the knowledge of the gospel among these new arrivals should not be relaxed.

Provision for the Widows and Children of the gallant men who lost their lives in the Jeannet Expedition will be made by Mr. James G. Bennett who fitted out the expedition. The New York Herald says that, "with or without the action of Congress or of the public, care will be taken of the widow and orphan of De Long, and not of the alone but of every widow and every orphan of the men who sailed with the Jeannette and have perished." It is gratifying to learn that Lieutenant De Long had this assurance before starting on his perilous voyage, and that almost the last words uttered by the magnanimous commander of the Jeannette to Mr. Bennett were a recognition of the event of possible misfortune to himself which he fully contemplated and knowingly ventured, care would be taken of his wife and child. In that dreary arctic solitude in which brave men lay down to die it must have been consolatory to them to know that the loved ones at home would not be left to the mercies of Congress.

The Serious Illness of Rev. Thomas Harrison "the Boy-Preacher," is announced. He went to Tiffin, Ohio, at the conclusion of the series of services in Cincinnati, and while there was prostrated by disease induced by nervous exhaustion. On one service had been held at Tiffin when Mr. Harrison was laid aside.

Major J. H. Cole is now Holding Special services in the Tabernacle, Cleveland, Ohio. The services commenced on May 21st, when nearly three thousand persons were crowded together to hear the distinguished revivalist. Large numbers of awakened souls attended the after meetings to the conclusion of the service, and it is believed that many of them found peace in believing. There are indications that a great work has been started in the city, and that the Holy Spirit is working mightily among Christians and unbelievers. Morning as well as evening services are being held every day in the week except Saturday.

The Old Salutation with a Changed Signal now often observed on the Baltimore and Ohio Company's Line as the result of God's blessing on the labors of Miss Jennie Smith and her fellow laborers. Until recently the ordinary salutation to the employes of the company when two freight trains met and swiftly passed each other would be a hand raised aloft with a playing card in it. Latterly, however, by the blessing of God, card-playing is not so general as it used to be among the employes. The customary mode of recognition still kept up, but now it is by no means an uncommon sight to see in the hand held up a Bible, or the same precious book waved in reply from the other train.

A Counterfeiter's Estimate of the Value of his soul was described at the Fulton Street prayer meeting on Monday. A city missionary said he knew a young man who had been arrested by God's grace in his wild career of sin. He was a good counterfeiter, and when his old comrades saw that he was leaving them they sent him five hundred dollars, and said there was plenty more if he would come back to the old life. He told a friend who was earnestly seeking his salvation, that he kept the five hundred dollars for two days, but then he thought him that his soul was worth more than that, and so he returned the money. He became a Christian, and is now not only a very happy Christian, but he has received such a start in an honest business life, as few men have.

A Fraudulent Vendor of Ocean Passage orders was arrested in New York last week. A Brooklyn lady three months ago purchased at his office for twenty-seven dollars a paper purporting to be an order on Messrs. Schrader & Co., of Bremen, for a passage from Germany to New York. She sent the order to her brother in Germany to enable him to emigrate to America. Her brother, however, returned the order with the information that it was worthless, and the vendor was accordingly arrested. It is possible, however, to purchase orders for such voyages which will be honored on presentation. There are many people expecting to get to Heaven in much the same way. Payments of money to priests, large sums of money given to religious institutions or bequeathed to hospitals are some of the ways in which people try to buy their way into the heavenly city. All such persons are deceived as surely as the purchaser of this trans-Atlantic order was. There is but one way, and that is by Christ, and money does not help in that solemn transaction (Isa. 55 : 1).

Spiritualism has Driven Mad a Prominent citizen of Yonkers, N. Y. Last week there was brought before Justice S. D. Gifford a gentleman whom his friends desired to have committed to the asylum. He formerly occupied a high position in the city, had been editor of a local journal, and had taken an active part in educational matters. But some months ago his attention was attracted to Spiritualism, and he commenced attending séances. It was noticed that the subject soon monopolized his thoughts, and he seemed never contented but when he was either at a séance or was studying the subject in books. A short time ago it became evident that his mind was unsettled, and during the past two weeks he gave evidence of being completely demented. Judge Gifford after examining him signed the order for his committal. It would be well if people before falling under the fascination of this sinful pursuit considered this sad case. They should understand that spiritualism is nothing else but communion with demons, against which we are explicitly warned (1 Tim. 4 : 1-4).

A Lawsuit in the Courts for Twenty Years reached another stage in its progress at the recent session of the Supreme Court. A traveller with a large quantity of valuable baggage went one day in 1862 to the Philadelphia depot to take the cars for Chicago. Some dispute arose just as the train was about to start, over a charge for extra baggage, and the passenger thereupon left the car and said he would not travel by the Pennsylvania route. It was too late then to have the boxes taken off the baggage car, and they went through to Chicago. The night after their arrival there the Chicago Railroad Depot was destroyed by fire, and the boxes were consumed with the other property. Then the owner brought suit for damages, which has been tried with varying results in different courts. The litigation has gone on for twenty years, the decision of one court being reversed by another. The recent verdict awards the traveller as compensation, $13,248, but the railroad company have now carried the case to the Court of Appeals, so the final issue is not yet reached. This protracted contest has been caused by the technicalities of the law, which are often responsible for delay in justice, in spite of the efforts of statesmen and upright judges; and sometimes it has happened in this and other countries that a suitor has grown old and died, without ever getting his rights. Sceptics have often pointed to the prosperity of the wicked and the adversity of the religious as evidence that the same defect exists in God's government of the world, forgetting that a day is coming in which God will vindicate His own people and all wrongs will be set right (Rom. 2 : 5-11).

A Gold Watch worth Five Hundred Dollars was presented last week, to John L. Rooney, the heroic fireman, who rescued a young lady from the upper window of the Potter Building at the fire on January 31st. The story of the fireman's heroism is well known, for those who witnessed the act were impressed with the courage of the man, who mounting the ladder and standing on the highest step, clinging to the stone dressing of the window on which the young lady stood, and bearing her whole weight as she placed her foot in his hand, he passed her down in safety to the man below him, who bore her to the street. The watch was presented to Mr. Rooney at the Seventh Presbyterian Church, New York, which was crowded by the firemen and the friends of the young lady. When it was presented the fireman briefly tendered his thanks, saying he had only done his duty on the occasion, and seemed surprised that any one should have thought he had done anything extraordinary. There were not a few present who in that scene and in the fireman's self-depreciation saw a type of a great day yet to come when those will be rewarded who have been instrumental in saving souls from the burning (Matt. 25 : 31-40).

A Cigar-Smoker's Costly Undertaking is described in a New Haven journal: "Two lawyers were sitting together and smoking, when the tobacco habit became the subject of conversation and a proposal to stop for a stated time was made. They finally entered into an agreement whereby neither was to smoke for two weeks, with the understanding that should either fail to keep his bargain he was to forfeit to the other a certain number of cigars for every smoke, on the basis of geometrical progression—two for the first smoke, four for the second, eight for the third, etc. When the two weeks expired it was found that one of the parties to the bargain had smoked none, but the other had been unable to limit himself to less than 26 cigars. Calculating the cost of cigars at $58 per 1000, the cash forfeit is but a few cents short of $3,892.315. It is not likely that the smoker calculated the prodigious amount of the penalty he was piling up, or if he did, just smoked on in sheer hopelessness. When he discovered how much he owed as the result of his self-indulgence, he must have quailed at the situation. Those awakened sinners who, in stead of accepting Christ's redemption, freely offered, endeavour to work out their own salvation by trying to keep the law, find themselves confronted with an obligation to which this smoker's penalty affords a faint analogy (James 2 : 10).

A Corpse Twenty Years Unburied was finally interred at Palmyra, N. J., recently. It seems that in 1862 a child of a man named Henry Coy died, and the father, being unwilling to have the child buried, had the remains sealed up in a bronze casket, which he stored away in a room in his residence. A year later two more of his children died, and they were put in caskets and disposed of as the first one was. All attempts to induce the father to have the remains buried, failed. In all his travels through the country the bodies were taken with the family. He at one time lived at Camden, where he manufactured surgical instruments, and had been a resident of Philadelphia and other places. He finally settled one and a half miles from Palmyra, where he lately died at the age of 61 years. It is stated that he would sit for hours in the room with the caskets, and seemed to take pleasure in being with them. It is seldom that parents, however passionately they love their children, are not willing that they should be buried after death. Then they generally realize that it was the soul and not the body, after all, that they loved. If they realized that fact while their children lived, many of them would be more in earnest in seeking the good of those children's souls, and less anxious that their bodies should be fashionably attired (Eph. 6 : 4).

HEALED OR DELUDED? WHICH?

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, saying, Peace, peace; when there is no peace."—Jeremiah 8 : 11.

"Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed; save me and I shall be saved: for Thou art my praise."—Jeremiah 17 : 14.

A National Affliction—The Only True Remedy—Surface Cures—A Sterner Task—No Consciousness of Spiritual Sickness—No Desire for Cure—A Special Message from a Sick Bed—Beware of Counterfeits—I. Easy to be Falsely Healed—Many Deceived—False Trusts—In External Religion—In Orthodox Doctrines—Deception Self-Aided—Sure to be Fashionable—Does not Require Thought—Nor Self-Denial—Nor Spirituality—They End in Disappointment—II. Seek True Healing—A Healing that Stands the Test—Temptation and Labor—III. Go Where it May be Had—The Lord's Son a Physician—Christ's Patients do not Die.

THE people among whom Jeremiah dwelt had received a grievous hurt, and they felt it, for they were invaded by cruel enemies, their goods were plundered, their children were slain, and their cities burned. Jeremiah, with true love to his nation, warned them that the cause of all their trouble was that they had forsaken their God. They had turned aside from the living God, and had made gods of the idols of the nations round about them, and so had provoked Jehovah to jealousy. Therefore He chastened them sorely, and plagued them again and again, even as He had threatened them from of old. He took up the quarrel of His covenant, and he made them smart indeed.

Jeremiah tried to show them that the only way to be healed of their hurt was to be healed of their sin; that if they would give up their idolatry and all the infamous wickedness that grew out of it, and turn to the true God and obey His commandments, then brighter days would come. Their conscience must have told them that all this was true; but, alas! Jeremiah preached to them in vain. As the old classic prophetess Cassandra was doomed for ever to speak the truth and never to be believed, so was Jeremiah; the people heard him, but they regarded him not.

Meanwhile, certain pretenders to prophecy opposed Jeremiah, and sought to win the confidence of the nation. They came with "Thus saith the Lord" upon their lips, blasphemously pretending to be speaking in the name of Jehovah when Jehovah had not sent them, nor did they seek His glory. These suggested to the people easier remedies than repentance; they should make an alliance with Egypt, and in that way beat off the Assyrians; they should send a certain amount of tribute to the great king, and thus buy off his armies. They buoyed up the people's hopes with vain confidences, and took them off from repentance and return to God.

No good came of their teachings—they did but film the wound of the nation and left the deadly venom still within. The hopes which they excited lasted but for a little time, and then died out in blank despair. They had not touched the root which bore the wormwood. They had made light of the national sin. They had healed the hurt of Judah slightly, saying, "Peace, peace," when there is no peace.

To-day God's servants who are the true successors of the prophets have a task before them sterner even than that of the ancient seers. It is not ours to point to smoking ruins and the carcases of the unburied dead—plain evidences of a grievous hurt; but our work is to deal with and to come among a people who confess no hurt. Great multitudes of our hearers do not welcome the news of a heavenly remedy because they are not aware that they are sick. They are not only sound in wind and limb, but in head and heart. From the crown of their head to the sole of their foot they have scarce a blemish in them, or if they have some little spot here and there, yet they are much superior to the general run of mankind, and need no special spiritual surgery.

A physician who has to commence his practice by convincing his neighbors that they are sick has not a very hopeful sphere before him. Such is our work; we have first of all to declare in the name of the God of truth that man is fallen, that his heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, that he is a sinner doomed to die, and such a sinner that there is no reclaiming him unless the Ethiopian can change his skin and the leopard his spots.

Truths so humiliating to human pride are by no means popular; men prefer to hear the smooth periods of those who parade the dignity of human nature. The very phrase grates on my ear; talk of the dignity of a dunghill and you are as near the mark. Man, viewed as fallen, descends below the level of the beast which perisheth, for the beast hath not offended against its Creator. See how Adam's proud descendants rage against this truth; to persuade them of it is a work so hard as to be utterly hopeless unless the Spirit of God Himself shall undertake it. It is a divinely wise arrangement that He has undertaken it; as it is written, "When He, the Spirit of truth, is come, He shall convince the world of sin."

When that great labor is accomplished we have yet another remaining, namely, to excite in men a desire after healing. Many there are who confess their disease, but the disease of sin has wrought in them a spiritual lethargy, so that they find a horrible rest in their lost estate, and have no longing to rise to spiritual health, of which, indeed, they know nothing. They are guilty, and willing to remain guilty; inclined to evil, and content with the inclination. Hundreds live and die in this condition. They know that there is a wrath to come on account of sin, but they put far from them the evil day, and amuse themselves with the mirth of the present. Ah, me! but we must bring them out of this. They will perish unless they are quickened out of this indifference; they will sleep themselves into hell unless we can find an antidote to the opiates of sin.

After these things are done, we have but stormed the outworks of the castle, for there still remains another difficulty. Convinced that they want healing, and made in a measure anxious to find it, the danger with the awakened is lest they should rest content with an apparent cure, and miss the real work of grace. We are perilously likely to rest satisfied with a slight healing, and by this means to miss the great and complete salvation which comes from God alone. I wish to speak in deep earnestness to every one here present upon this subject, for I have felt the power of it in my own soul. To deliver this message I have made a desperate effort, quitting my sick bed without due permit, moved by a restless pining to warn you against the counterfeits of the day.

I have taken two texts; first, that I may show how easy it is for us to be deluded into a slight healing, and secondly, that I may plead with you to seek real healing, and, lastly, that I may plainly show where the true healing is to be had according to the teaching of our second text, "Heal me, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved."

DELUSION EASY.

I. First, then, we sorrowfully assert that it is very easy for us to be the subjects of a false healing. You will kindly understand that I am not going to talk about the inhabitants of the Island of Laputa; I am now speaking straight to every one of you, and I am setting myself in the middle pew that my keenest sentence may enter my own bosom as well as yours. I say, we are all of us in danger of being the subjects of a false healing; ministers, deacons, elders, church-members, aged professors, and young beginners—all alike.

We might infer this from the fact that no doubt a large number of persons are so deceived. If a large number of persons are so, then why should not we be? The tendency of other men is probably in us also. Why not? Are there not many persons who consider that all is well with them because they have been observant of church ordinances from their youth up, and their parents were observant for them before they actually came upon the stage of responsibility. They have been attentive to religion from their own point of view; they are never absent from their pew; they like to be at prayer meetings; they enjoy everything that has the stamp of Christianity upon it, and therefore they enquire no further, but take their safety for granted. They are afraid of digging too deep, and so they are satisfied with having a form of godliness. Though they have felt no change of heart, and no renewal of spirit, they nevertheless believe that all is well with them, at least they hope so, and therefore they are at ease in Zion. This is a poor, slovenly soul surgery which will end in eternal death. Beware of it, I pray you, while yet a work of grace may be wrought upon you.

I am afraid, too, that many who do not rely upon religious forms yet confide in doctrinal beliefs. They are sound in the faith—Orthodox, Evangelical, and Calvinistic. They heartily detest any doctrine that is not Scriptural. I am glad to find that it is so with them; but let them not rest in this. To cover a wound with a royal garment is not to heal it, and to conceal a sinful disposition beneath a sound creed is not salvation. Believe what you may, even though you should know the whole truth of God, yet if your faith never changes your heart nor affects your life you will be in no way superior to the devil who believes; nay, you may not be quite so good as he, for devils believe and tremble, and to believe without trembling is a stage lower down. Oh, my dear hearer, I implore you do not rest content with such a slight healing as this.

DRY DOCTRINE MAY KILL;

Depend upon this, that if there is a chance of our being deceived at all we are always ready to aid in the deception. As a rule, we are all inclined to think too well of ourselves. I dare say that if any cautious flatterer will assure me that I am a very wise person, I shall before long come to the conclusion that he is a remarkably sensible and far-seeing individual. If any one should accuse you of a virtue which you never possessed, if he would but persevere long enough with his pleasing insinuation, you will begin to smile inwardly, and hint to your conscience that there are latent excellencies about you which this man with prophetic glance has discovered. The devil, who knows the exact bait for poor human nature, finds it easy to pacify an anxious mind by presenting a false salvation and persuading the heart that all is well, while in fact nothing is well. A little feeling of natural regret flits over the mind, and the false fiend whispers, "It is repentance." "Oh, yes," says the ready dupe, "I am a penitent." A little presumptuous cozening of ourselves into comfort is indulged and the deceiver sings, "Hail, precious faith."

How pleased we are when we jump to the conclusion that we have passed from death unto life, and are, indeed, the servants of the living God. We do not look back to see whether there was any new birth, whether there was any change of heart, whether there was any giving up of sin, whether there was any laying hold on righteousness, whether there was any severance from self and union to Christ. Those inquiries may be troublesome, and therefore the irksome duty of self-examination is cried down as unbelief, and we are bidden to shut our eyes and make up our minds that all is right. "Believe that you are well and you are well," seems to be the Gospel of many, but it is not the Gospel of Jesus. But it is so easy thus to jump into fancied security that many take to it.

We are almost all of us on the side of that which is most easy and comfortable to ourselves; the exceptions to this rule are a few morbid spirits who habitually write bitter things against themselves, and a few gracious souls whom the Holy Spirit has convinced of sin who would comfort themselves if they could, but dare not do so. They are dying for want, and yet their soul abhorreth all manner of meat. I do not suppose I shall do any good this morning except to this last class, and they are few; but the word I shall speak will reach their ears I know, and I pray God it may drop into their hearts to comfort them. Take this, then, for granted, that there are many ways of being slightly healed, and we are most of us likely to be pleased with one or other of them.

Slight healing is sure to be fashionable among a great many, because it requires so little thought.

People will do anything but think according to the Word of God. They will both think and speak against the revealed will and truth of God, but to consider what the Lord hath said is not at all to their mind. They bring forward as philosophy notions which read like passages of a comedy. He seems to be most honored nowadays who will invent the most monstrous theory, and stand to it. O sirs, it is a grievous pity that men should be lost for want of thought. I would fain hold you by the sleeve and beg you to remember and consider. Because superficial religion only requires so much churchgoing, or attendance at sermon, or so many half-guineas, so much repeating of pious phrases, and listening to pious periods, it suits the thoughtless; but as to seeking after God by meditation, prayer, confession, faith, they cannot; away with it!

Superficial religion also will always be fashionable because it DOES NOT REQUIRE SELF-DENIAL.

A man may be outwardly religious and yet be a private tippler, but he cannot be a true Christian at that rate; such secret defilement he must abandon. That, however, is a blow too near the root for many, they like not so sharp an axe as that. Or perhaps he has enmity toward his brother. Now he can go to mass or attend early communion, and yet hate his brother, but he cannot go to heaven and do that. He cannot be a regenerate man and do that. He may be following all the while some secret lust, and yet be a great man in his church, so long as he can keep his wantonness hidden away from prying eyes. A superficial religion suits the unclean gentleman; but genuine godliness will not allow a darling lust to live.

Do you wonder that vital godliness is at a discount when it proclaims war to the knife against a lifelong indulgence. It is with Christ as it might be in surgery. Two eminent practitioners profess to deal with the disease called polyphus. The first declares that he can work an effectual cure, but it must be understood that he uses the knife freely. He believes no cure to be possible unless all the roots of the growth are taken away. He will not pretend to half measures; the whole thing must be eliminated, or he can work no cure. On the other side of the street another surgeon of great name depends upon an outward application which, in quite a painless manner, acts upon the diseased part, and according to his statement secures the desired result. He says, "My friend goes too deep and makes too much of the matter. Come in here; the disease is a mere bagatelle. I will end the mischief without cutting and hacking." You can readily guess how popular this last gentleman will be if he can gain public confidence. But what will be the end of it? That is the point. If the sharp and deep cut of the first surgeon ministers to ultimate health, and is absolutely needful to a cure, is it not best? If, in the second case, the end of all those honeyed words is but the covering up of a foul loathsomeness, which will breed corruption and hasten death, is it not a wicked deception? Yet the most of men are so foolish as to choose the worse of the two in the affairs of their souls.

Slight healing, also, is sought by men, because it does not require spirituality. There are multitudes of men who, if the kingdom of heaven were to be had by outward actions, no matter how difficult, would at once commence the task. Say, "You must save so many hundreds of pounds and buy heaven," and they would starve themselves until they had hoarded up the money. Anything that could be done by the body would be cheerfully attempted, but true religion is spiritual, and carnal men cannot get at it; it is high above, and out of their sight. Hence it is that the slight healing which comes of formalism and ceremonies, seeing it deals with outward manipulations, at once attracts them.

But, my dear hearers, let me warn you with all the energy I possess against ever being satisfied with any of the slight healings that are cried up nowadays, because they will all end in disappointment, as sure as you are living men. I could wish that they might speedily so end while yet you could begin again, and begin aright. Remember that if you pass through this life deceived there will await you an awful undeceiving in the next world. I will not try to depict the man who finds himself lost for ever, though he died in the odor of sanctity. What will be his horror when he finds himself cast out, and hears the Lord Jesus say, "I never knew you." Your minister knew you, the leacons knew you, the members knew you, but the Lord Jesus never did, for you had no heart-fellowship with Him and were not in heart a believer in Him. O brethren, if there be any error about your profession get it right now.

II. Be it ours to SEEK TRUE HEALING.

But then, as we have already said, this true healing must be radical. Oh, pray to have it so! The healing which we need must go to the root of the business, and work a thorough change. Such a work is described in Scripture as a creation—"created anew in Christ Jesus;" it must be a resurrection—"And you hath He quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." Now I ask you, my dear brethren, whether you can undertake this? Creation and resurrection, do these lie in your power? You can do nothing of the kind, and so you are driven to my second text, "O Lord, heal me, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved."

Now go a step further. The healing we want must be a healing from the guilt of sin. My anxious friend, you must be no longer guilty; you must be free from fault. Every offence you have ever committed must be washed right out, even the least stain of it must vanish, and it must be as though it had never been, and you must be as though you never had offended at all. "How can that be?" say you. It is clear it cannot be by anything that you can do; and this again drives you to the prayer of my text, "Heal me, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved." How can it be? Only by the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ our Saviour. He took the sin of His people upon Him; became their substitute and representative, bore their iniquity, and was made a curse for them, and in consequence they are set free, cleared, and justified.

But you must not only be free from sin, you must be freed from sinfulness; a work must be wrought in you, my dear brother, and in me, by which we shall be clean rid of every tendency to do evil. We cannot enter into heaven with sinful tendencies; corruption and depravity cannot be endured before the throne of the thrice holy Jehovah. The very roots and rootlets of sin must come out of the nature which is to share the abode of God. Does not this drive you to despair? Does not this make you cry, "Heal me, O God, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved?" It ought to do so, and in so doing it will work your safety.

In answer to your cry the eternal Spirit shall come upon you, creating you anew in Christ Jesus. He shall come and dwell in you, and shall break down the reigning power of sin, putting it beneath your feet. Though this defeated foe shall strive and struggle like a serpent with his back broken, yet it has its death wound, and cannot regain its former dominion. It will struggle so long as you are in this life, but it must ultimately die and you shall attain perfection.

"Sin, my worst enemy before,
Shall vex my eyes and ears no more;
My inward foes shall all be slain,
Nor Satan break my peace again."

No tendency to sin, no affection toward evil, no fear of relapse, nor danger of apostasy shall remain, but there shall be in us the living and incorruptible seed, and we shall be the members of Christ's body.

It is most desirable to be so healed in soul as to stand the test of this present life. I have known friends discharged from the hospital as healed of disease who were bitterly disappointed when they came into everyday life; a little exertion made them as ill as ever. A person had a piece of diseased bone in the wrist; it was taken out by the hospital surgeon, and the arm seemed perfectly healed, but when she began to work the old pain returned, and it was evident that the old mischief was there still, and that a part of the decayed bone remained. Thus some are saved, so they think, but it is only in seeming, for when they get into the world, and are tried with temptation, they are just the same as they used to be. They have not received a practical salvation; and nothing but practical salvation is worth having. A sham cure is worse than none. If a bone is ill set it is often necessary to break it again, and it sometimes seems to me that certain converts want their hearts to be broken again that they may be truly comforted. If any man here has been healed, but his arm will not work for Jesus and for righteousness, it needs breaking again; and I should not mind if my sermon should break it, so long as he was driven to Christ to get it set in the right fashion. If you cannot resist the temptations of this life, depend upon it your salvation is a mere myth.

We want to have a salvation that will bear the test of sickness, and the strain of death, so that a man may lie back in his bed and say, "I do not fear to die; Jesus Christ has made me perfectly whole, and among the healed ones before His throne I shall shortly stand and sing His praises world without end." Oh, my dear hearers, could you die so? Have you a hope which will bear the light of your last hours? If you have not, do not let this day close until you have found it. I beseech you at once cry to Jesus to save you in His own effectual way.

III. I close by saying, let us go

WHERE TRUE HEALING IS TO BE HAD.

It is quite certain that God is able to heal us of all our sins; for He who created can restore. Whatever our diseases, nothing can surpass the power of omnipotent love. The Lord is so fond of healing sin-sick souls, that He had but one Son, and He made a physician of Him that He might come and heal mankind of their deadly wound; and He being made a physician came down among us, and sought out for His patients, not the good and excellent, but the most guilty, for He said, "The whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Jesus, then, the beloved Physician, is able and willing to meet the case of every one of us.

As I turned over my text while coming here I was charmed with the encouragement which it offers to the very chief of sinners, for these may say to themselves, "Is it, after all, God's work to save? Well, then, He can save a great sinner as well as a little sinner." If salvation were of works or of merits then many persons would evidently be excluded from hope, but if it is entirely of grace then none are excluded; and if the power be found in God and not in us, then the same power which can save the most moral young man, can save the most dissolute and debauched person; and the same grace which can save the godly matron can save the impious harlot. The power of God is equal to any miracle. The mercy of God can go any length.

I know while I am preaching that certain of you say, "He does not mean me; I am too great a sinner." On the other hand, another class imagine that they are not sinful enough, so they also fancy that the discourse is not meant for them. Oh that you would give up this wicked perversity, and know that all truth that applies to you is meant for you. I have heard of Robert Burns that, on one occasion when at church, he sat in a pew with a young lady whom he observed to be much affected by certain terrible passages of Scripture which the minister quoted in his sermon. The wicked wag scribbled on a piece of paper a verse which he passed to her. I fear that the substance of that verse has been whispered into many of your ears full often:

"Fair maid, you need not take the hint,
Nor idle texts pursue;
'Twas only sinners that he meant,
Not angels such as you."

This sermon is meant for those who think themselves angels as well as for those who know themselves to be sinners. Cease from all dreamy confidences; arouse yourselves from proud self-content, and come to Jesus the Saviour, who alone can save from sin and death.

I love my text because it gives security for the future. "Heal me, and I shall be healed." Certain theologians appear to doubt the lasting nature of the divine cure, and fancy that Christ's patients may die after all. Would they have us pray, "Lord, heal me, and I shall not be healed?" Yet that would be the way to pray if we may fall from grace and perish. If you are saved by a priest or by yourself you may be lost, but if God saves you you never will be lost. That which God doth He doeth for ever. The Lord never puts His hand to a creation which He leaves unfinished. He that is born again cannot be unborn. We may unravel all that is of nature's weaving, but that which is defies the powers infernal. There stands the promise, sure forever—"I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of my hand."

Dear friends, if you are saved, pray the Lord that you may be saved indeed; and if you are not saved, get ye to Him and pray Him to begin His good work within your souls. I am often anxious about this congregation. I do not want to build up in this place a host of hopes that are ill founded. I felt that I must come and deliver this message at this time, though I am quite unfit to be among you. I have not delivered it as I hoped to do; still there it is, and unto God I commend it. If I preached this morning I was told I should suffer a month's relapse as the consequence of it, but I ran the risk, because I could not be quiet till I had delivered my soul.

Let us be true men, true to the core; sincere right through and through. Let us pray God that there may be a work of grace in us, and not the mere outgrowth of human will, and fancy, and self-flattery. If there be any who have not even felt the slight healing, I am glad they have not. May their wounds never be bound up till Jesus binds them. May none of us ever think of health except it come from beneath the wings of the Sun of righteousness. May we all stand together and gaze with tearful eyes upon the cross of our Lord. He is all my salvation, all my desire, and all my praise. If I perish, it shall be at His feet. If I live, it shall be in His service. Amen.

[PORTION OF SCRIPTURE READ BEFORE SERMON—
Psalm 51.]

The Tenacity with which Rum Holds its Victims was illustrated lately in the case of a man who, apparently dead, was borne by four men to one of the London hospitals on a recent Sunday afternoon. He had been drinking whiskey till bleeding from the stomach had come on. The doctors pronounced his condition to be precarious. Restlessly he tossed from side to side, and terrible was the fear and anxiety depicted on his face, till at last, raising himself up in bed, he said, in a voice of agony, "Dying! Oh, God, I can't die! I can't die!" "Lie down and keep quiet, or you certainly will die!" was the reply. "But why is death so terrible to you?" "Oh, I have sinned; sinned so that I cannot meet God. I have—" and then came the confession of a fearful sin. "Even that God can forgive," was the quiet rejoinder, "if you truly repent and evermore flee from that sin. Would you now continue in it, if you could?" "Oh, no, no!" was the eager response. Anxious that he should rest, the Sister permitted no further conversation, but that evening, as the men gathered round for prayers, "our brother now dangerously ill," was specially recommended. Weeks passed by, and contrary to expectation, the patient recovered, and some of his history was told. He was an organist, a beautiful musician, and after his convalescence his great delight was in playing on the piano. Alas! alas! the love of liquor was not overcome. With recovering health came the love of sin again. Many months after he called to see the Sister. Through liquor he had lost his place as organist, and now, broken down in health, nerve, and spirit, he had joined a party of wandering musicians. With shaking hand and trembling voice he said, "It is of no use, Sister. I cannot give up the liquor." Another victim of the many hundreds who yearly perish through rum.

Mr. Vaughan's Embassy.

MR. VAUGHAN'S EMBASSY.

A DELICATE mission was that undertaken by the Rev. Herbert Vaughan. He was waiting in the parlor of a city mansion to see the wife of the man who sent him as an emissary to plead for him. He waited but a few minutes, and then the lady entered. She was young and beautiful, but her face showed traces of tears and she looked inflexible.

"I come from your husband, Mrs. Temple," said the clergyman, "and I am anxious that you should reconsider your decision and give him another trial."

"Do you know the circumstances that led me to make my decision?" Mrs. Temple asked. The clergyman silently bowed his head in assent.

"Then," said Mrs. Temple, "you will not be surprised when I say that what you ask is impossible. I can say to you, as a clergyman, what I could not say to others. My husband has during the past two years led a life of uninterrupted dissipation; he has outraged my feelings as a wife, and he has not refrained from personal violence. I have forgiven him over and over again, and he knew perfectly well, a week ago, that the next occasion of his coming home intoxicated I should leave him and return to my father's house. Notwithstanding this he again drank to excess and returned here with two gentlemen in the same disgraceful condition as himself, who insulted me in his presence. I am therefore fully resolved on keeping my word, and you see I have had my trunks packed ready to depart to-morrow."

Mr. Vaughan knew all these facts before he started on his mission, and he was therefore fully prepared to hear such a decision. But he was not a man easily rebuffed, and he was determined if possible to prevent the separation of husband and wife. "Mrs. Temple," he said, "I am not here to blame you, or to say that you are taking an unmerciful step, but I beg you to consider some facts I have to tell you of. I know you love your husband, and I am sure he loves you. If this terrible curse were removed once for all I believe you would never leave him. Is it not so?"

"You are right," said Mrs. Temple; "but that news I never expect to hear. If I could be assured of that I would be the happiest woman in this city to-day."

Mr. Vaughan rose, and extending his hand, said, "I am going to produce to you a proof that what you wish is realized. Your husband is a saved man."

The look of painful, joyful intentness that came over the wife's face as she heard these words was impressive. Mr. Vaughan said no more, but went his way. In an hour he returned, bringing with him the man who had sinned against God, against his wife, and his home. He left husband and wife together, feeling that the interview would be too sacred for a third party to witness. Then the husband told how in his despair at finding his wife was about to leave him, he had gone out intending to drink himself into forgetfulness, but had been induced by Mr. Vaughan, whom he met, to attend a gospel temperance meeting. There he was brought to a sense of his condition, and he had given his heart to Jesus. With the strange joy that filled his heart had come a consciousness of deliverance from the power of the glass, and a conviction that Christ could and would keep him from falling. "Ethel," he said, "I am saved from the fire, my chains are broken, and if you can forgive me as God has forgiven me, for Christ's sake, I am sure He will hold me up and I shall never grieve you again." That confidence has been justified, and Mrs. Temple has never had cause to regret that she listened to Mr. Vaughan's appeal.

WEE WILLIE AND HIS MOTHER.

I HAVE looked on many interesting scenes and witnessed many thrilling spectacles in this and other lands, but looking back at near the close of an eventful life I find one scene imprinted more deeply on my memory than any other. I must leave the metaphysicians to account for the fact, I am not concerned with the cause, but I am sure of its existence.

That scene is not of mortal conflict between men fierce and desperate, thirsting for each other's blood; nor of horrible conflagrations grand in their terrible beauty in which lives were being sacrificed; nor of a noble ship driven by the waves on the rocks, and her crew battling with the billows for dear life. All these I have seen and shuddered at, and their memory I suppose will never be blotted out, but the scene that comes most frequently before my mental vision is one very different from those. It is that of a lady with a child in her arms. She was standing in a garden and the dark background of foliage cast the figures into strong relief. It is a quarter of a century now since my eyes rested on that picture, and the lady's head is now white with the snows of age and the child is a stalwart man with children of his own, but as I sit here in the dim twilight every detail of that scene is as distinct before me as on that day twenty-five years ago.

I will tell you how it was that I was so deeply moved. I was preparing for a long journey which would occupy me for three months. I had travelled over the ground on two previous occasions, my business requiring that I should visit the principal cities of all the Southern and Western States every three years. I had been married five years when the time for the tour I am now speaking of came due. I did not know how it was, but the prospect of the journey depressed me. It had not done so before, but as I made my arrangements a presentiment of coming ill which I could not shake off haunted me, and when the morning of my departure came I was almost broken-down with a foreboding of which I was not a little ashamed. I concealed it as well as I could, for I would not have the dear wife and little boy I was leaving, troubled by my imaginary woe. I kissed them tenderly, pressed them to my breast for a moment, and left them.

Two months of my journey were accomplished and nothing had occurred to justify my presentiment, and I was beginning to chide myself for my weakness in allowing myself to suffer needlessly. I worked hard and by unexpected facilities I had met with, was two weeks ahead of time. This was a distinct gain, but it had its disadvantages. I had left at home a list of places to which letters might be sent at specified dates, and by pushing forward I left several of these places before any letters from home could arrive. But I left with the postmasters addressed envelopes with instructions to send on to me any letters that came, and pressed on with my face homeward. I arrived at Philadelphia, intending to stay there one or two days, and then I hoped to start on the most delightful stage of the journey, the one that had home for its terminus. My first visit was to the post office, and there I got a package of letters—the first I had received in five weeks. They had followed me from place to place increasing in bulk until now I had them in my hands. Shall I ever forget the emotions of the next hour as I read them? It was mental agony. My wife and child were both ill—had been ill for weeks. There were letters in the well-known handwriting, and then letters from the doctor written at my wife's request. These last were brief, and the doctor could give me no hope of those dear lives. That was all. The latest date was two weeks back, and as I read the letters I realized that at that moment my wife and child might be lying in the cemetery.

I cannot describe my journey home. I dare not telegraph. I wanted to know the truth, but had not the courage to ask. I must go home. Would it be home or the mere husk from which the corn was gone. Half dazed, in dogged dull desperation I travelled on, and at last I laid my hand on the gate of my garden. My heart seemed to stand still with dread, and I leaned for a moment against the fence to brace up my nerves. Then I turned, and the scene I have spoken of met my gaze. There stood my wife with my boy in her arms. She saw my approach from an upper window, and disregarding the doctor's orders snatched up the child and came into the open air for the first time since her illness to give me welcome. You can understand now why that scene is indelibly impressed on my memory.

As I think now of my agony when I did not know but that my treasured ones were dead, and of my joy when I discovered that they lived, I see a deeper meaning than I ever did in the words in which the beloved disciple describes the love of God (John 3:16).

DARING RESCUE OF A CHILD FROM AN EAGLE'S NEST.

It was a brilliant autumn afternoon, and the reapers were busy in the fields of a fertile valley. Before their flashing scythes and old-fashioned reaping hooks the golden grain was quickly falling, for every man and woman there was making extra exertion to finish the work before sundown. There was the more need for this because the weather-wise among them recognized in the clouds around the summit of the mountains at the foot of which they were working, sure indications of an approaching storm. All were absorbed in their toil, while the children, who had been brought into the fields by their mothers, played among the sweet stubble, or, if too small for frolic, lay comfortably wrapped in shawls in a sheltered spot within easy reach. Not far away lowered the rugged mountains overlooking the sea, and on the frowning cliffs many a strong-winged eagle had its eyrie.

A Mother's Heroic Rescue.

While the reapers were thus busily engaged, an eagle flew over the field. It was one of the most powerful birds of the species, and though the people were too busy to look at it, the whirr of its wings was plainly heard. But an eagle in those parts was no uncommon sight, and its presence occasioned no remark. But in a moment loud shrieks of alarm were heard from the sheltered nook where the children were, and turning to ascertain the cause they were horror-stricken to see the monster eagle soaring aloft with a tiny babe in its talons.

It was a sight to appal any beholder. If the eagle proved strong enough to carry its burden to its nest a fearful death awaited the little creature; and if the weight were too great the eagle would probably drop it to be dashed to pieces on the ground. There was no need to inquire who was the mother of the babe. Her pallid face and her clenched hands, her eyes rivetted on the soaring bird, revealed her identity.

She stood a few moments speechless, but when she saw the eagle alight on a rock where a dark shadow indicated a crevasse in which its nest was doubtless built, she uttered a low cry, and seizing her reaping hook she started on her way up the mountain. Her course was watched from the valley below with bated breath. The first few yards up the mountain could easily be scaled, but above, the cliff was almost perpendicular, and more than one of her companions believed she would only add the sacrifice of her own life to that of the child. They gazed at her with straining eyes until they saw her reach the summit of the rock. The eagle saw her too, and rising above her head, as on hands and knees she approached the nest, it swooped upon her fiercely. But the woman had retained her reaping hook through her ascent, and now, with all the desperation of her heart and all the strength of her arm, she struck at her deadly foe, and the robber of her child. Those below saw that the blow had told, for the bird fell maimed and helpless down the mountain side.

Then the brave woman made her way trembling with anxiety to the nest, and to her inexpressible joy saw her darling alive and unhurt. She clasped it in her arms with a cry of thankfulness, and commenced her perilous descent. It was a dizzy task, but maternal love steadied her brain, and she was soon once again in the valley among her companions, who thronged around her congratulating her on the success of her perilous adventure.

She did no more reaping that day, her agitation and her exertion had been more than her woman's nature could easily bear, and beside she could not trust her rescued darling out of her arms lest some other evil might befall it. Hurrying to her home, she poured out her heart in thanks to God for His providential care.

Such a feat is an evidence of what maternal love will dare and do for its object, and it is only by such illustrations, feeble as their resemblance is, that we can grasp any conception of what must be the love of Christ for sinful men when He came to this world to suffer and die that they might be saved (Rom. 5:7, 8).

COBWEBS AND CABLES. A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Within and Without.

ROLAND'S was a scarred and wrinkled face, blistered and burnt by the summer's sun, and cut and frostbitten by the winter's cold; the hair was gray and ragged, and the eyes, far sunk in the head, met Phebe's with a despairing and uneasy glance, as if he shrank from her close scrutiny. His bowed shoulders and hands roughened by toil, and his worn-out mechanic's dress, made such a change, that perhaps she acknowledged reluctantly to herself, that if he had not spoken as he did she might have passed him by undiscovered.

"I am Jean Merle," he said, "not Roland Sefton."

"Jean Merle?" she repeated in a low, bewildered tone, "not Roland Sefton, but Jean Merle?"

But she could not be bewildered or in doubt much longer. This was Roland indeed, the hero of her life, come back to her a broken-down, desolate, and hopeless man. She knelt down on the hearth beside him, and laid her hand compassionately on his.

"But you are Roland himself to me!" she cried. "Oh! be quick, and tell me all about it. Why did we ever think you were dead?"

"It was best for them all," he answered. "God knows I believed it was best. But it was a second sin worse than the first, Phebe. I did the man who died no wrong, for he told me as he lay dying that he had no friends to grieve for him, and no property to leave. All he wanted was a decent grave; and he has it, and my name with it. The grave at Engelberg contains a stranger. And I, Jean Merle, have taken charge of it."

"Oh!" cried Phebe, with a pang of dread, "how will Felicita bear it?"

"Felicita has known it; she consented to it," said Jean Merle. "If she had uttered one word against my desperate plan, I should have recoiled from it. To be dead while you are yet in the body; to have eyes to see and ears to hear with, and a thinking brain and a hungry heart, while there is no sign, or sound, or memory, or love from your former life; you cannot conceive what that is, Phebe. I was dead, yet I was too keenly alive in Jean Merle, the poor wood-carver and miser. They thought I was imbecile; and I was almost a madman. I could not tear myself away from the grave where Roland Sefton was buried; but oh! what I have suffered!"

He ended with a long shuddering sigh, which pierced Phebe to the heart. The joy of seeing him again was vanishing in the sight of his suffering; but the thought uppermost in her mind was of Felicita.

"And she has known all along that you were not dead?" she said in a tone of awe.

"Yes, Felicita knew," he answered.

"And has she never seen you, never written to you?" she asked.

"She knows nothing of me," he replied. "I was to be dead to her, and to every one else. We parted for ever in Engelberg fourteen years ago this very month. Perhaps she believes me to be dead in reality. But I could live no longer without knowing something of you all; of Felix and Hilda; and I came over to England in August. I have seen all of you, except Felicita."

"Oh! it was wicked! it was cruel!" sobbed Phebe, shivering. "Your mother died believing she was going to rejoin you; and I, oh! how I have mourned for you!"

"Have you, Phebe?" he said sorrowfully; "but Felicita has been saved from shame, and has been successful. She is too famous now for me to retrace my steps, and get back into truthfulness. I can find no place for repentance, let me seek it ever so carefully and with tears."

"But you have repented?" she whispered.

"Before God? yes!" he answered, "and I believe He has forgiven me. But there is no way by which I can retrieve the past. I have forfeited everything, and I am now shut out even from the duties of life. What ought I to have done, Phebe? There was this way to save my mother, and my children, and Felicita; and I took it. It has prospered for all of them; they hold a different position in the world this day than they could have done if I had lived."

"In this world, yes!" answered Phebe, with a touch of scorn in her voice; "but cannot you see what you have done for Felicita? Oh! it would have been better for her to have endured the shame of your first sin, than bear such a burden of guilt. And you might have out-lived the disgrace. There are Christian people in the world who can forgive sin, even as Christ forgives it. Even my poor father forgave it; and Mr. Clifford, he is repenting now that he did not forgive you; it weighs him down in his old age. It would have been better for you and Felicita if you had borne the penalty of your crime."

"And our children, Phebe?" he said.

"Could not God have made it up to them?" she asked. "Did He make it necessary for you to sin again on their account? Oh! if you had only trusted Him! If you had only waited to see how Christ could turn even the sins of the father into blessings for his children! They have missed you; it may be, I cannot see clearly, they must miss you now all their lives. It would break their hearts to learn all this. Whether they must know it, I cannot tell."

"To what end should they know it?" he said.

"Don't you see, Phebe, that the distinction Felicita has won binds us to keep this secret? It cannot be disclosed either to her or to them. I came to tell it to the man who brought me here under a seal of secrecy."

"To Canon Pascal?" she exclaimed.

"Pascal?" he repeated, "ay, I remember him now. It would have been terrible to have told it to him."

"Let me think about it," said Phebe, "it has come too suddenly upon me. There must be something we ought to do, but I cannot see it yet. I must have time to recollect it all. And yet I am afraid to let you go, lest you should disappear again, and all this should seem like a dreadful dream."

"You care for me still, Phebe?" he answered mournfully. "No, I shall not disappear from you; I shall hold fast by you, now you have seen me again. If that poor wretch in hell who lifted up his eyes, being in torments, had caught sight of some pitying angel, who would now and then dip the tip of her finger in water and cool his tongue, would he have willingly disappeared from her sight? Wouldn't he rather have had a horrible dread lest she should disappear? But you will not forsake me, Phebe?"

"Never!" replied Phebe, with an intense and mournful earnestness.

"Then I will go," he said, rising reluctantly to his feet. The deep tones of the Abbey clock were striking for the second time since he had entered Canon Pascal's study, and they had been left in uninterrupted conversation. It was time for him to go; yet it seemed to him as if he had still so much to pour into Phebe's ear that many hours would not give him time enough. Unconstrained speech had proved a source of ineffable solace and strength to him. He had been dying of thirst, and he had found a spring of living waters. To Phebe, and to her alone, he was still a living man; unless sometimes Felicita thought of him.

"If you are still my friend, knowing all," he said, "I shall no longer despair. When will you see me again?"

"I will come to morning service in the Abbey to-morrow," she answered.

After speaking to Canon Pascal for a few minutes, with an agitation and reserve which he could not but notice, Phebe left the house to go home. In one of the darkest corners of the cloisters she caught sight of the figure of Jean Merle, watching for her to come out. For an instant Phebe paused, as if to speak to him once more; but her heart was over-fraught with conflicting emotions, while bewildering thoughts oppressed her brain. She longed for a solitary walk homeward, along the two or three miles of a crowded thoroughfare, where she could now feel as much alone as she had ever done on the solitary uplands about her birth-place. She had always delighted to ramble about the streets alone after nightfall, catching brief glimpses of the great out-door population, who were content if they could get a shelter for their heads during the few short hours they could give to sleep, without indulging in the luxury of a home. When talking to them she could return to the rustic and homely dialect of her childhood; and from her own early experience she could understand and look at their wants, from their standpoint, while feeling for them a sympathy and pity intensified by the education which had lifted her above them.

But to-night she passed along the busy streets both deaf and dumb, mechanically choosing the right way between the Abbey and her home, nearly three miles away. There was only one circumstance of which she was conscious—that Jean Merle was following her. Possibly he was afraid in the depths of his heart that she would fail him, when she came to deliberately consider all he had told her. He wronged her, she said to herself indignantly. Still, whenever she turned her head she caught sight of his tall, bent figure and gray head, stealing after her at some distance, and never losing her. So mournful was it to Phebe, to see her oldest and her dearest friend thus dogging her footsteps, that once or twice she paused at a street corner to give him time to overtake her; but he kept aloof. He wished only to see where she lived, for there also lived Felicita and Hilda.

She turned at last into the square where their house was. It was brilliantly lighted up, for Felicita was having one of her rare receptions that evening, and in another hour or two the rooms would be filled with guests. It was too early yet, and Hilda was playing on her piano in the drawing-room, the merry notes ringing out into the quiet night. There was a side door to Phebe's studio, by which she could go in and out at pleasure, and she stood at it trying to fit her latch-key into the lock with her trembling hands. Looking back she saw Jean Merle some little distance away, leaning against the railings that enclosed the Square garden.

"Oh! I must run back to him! I must speak to him again!" she cried to her own heart. In another instant she was at his side, with her hands clasping his.

"Oh!" she sobbed, "what can I do for you? This is too miserable for you; and for me as well. Tell me what I can do."

"Nothing," he answered. "Why, you make me feel almost as if I had sinned again in telling you all this. I ought not to have troubled your happy heart with my sorrow."

"It was not you," she said, "you did not ever come to tell me; God brought you. I can bear it. But oh! to see you shut out; and inside, yonder, Hilda is playing, and Felix, perhaps, is there. They will be singing by-and-by, and never know who is standing outside, in the foggy night, listening to them."

Her voice broke into sobs, but Jean Merle did not notice them.

"And Felicita?" he said.

Phebe could not answer him for weeping. Just yet she could hardly bring herself to think distinctly of Felicita; though in fact her thoughts were full of her. She ran back to her private door, and this time opened it readily. There was a low light in the studio from a shaded lamp standing on the chimney-piece, which made the hearth bright, but left all the rest of the room in shadow. Phebe threw off her bonnet and cloak with a very heavy and troubled sigh.

"What can make you sigh, Phebe?" asked a low-toned and plaintive voice. In the chair by the fire-place, pushed out of the circle of the light, she saw Felicita leaning back, and looking up at her. The beauty of her face had never struck harshly upon Phebe until now; at this moment it was absolutely painful to her. The rich folds of her velvet dress, and the soft and costly lace of her head-dress, distinct from though resembling a widow's cap, set off both her face and figure to the utmost advantage. Phebe's eyes seemed to behold her more distinctly and vividly than they had done for some years past; for she was looking through them with a dark background for what she saw in her own brain.

She was a strikingly beautiful woman; but the thought of what anguish and dread had been concealed under her reserved and stately air, so cold yet so gentle, filled Phebe's soul with a sudden terror. What an awful life of self-approved, stoical falsehood Felicita had been living! She could see the man, from whom she had just parted, standing without, homeless and friendless, on the verge of pennilessness; a dead man in a living world, cut off from all the ties and duties of the home and the society he loved. But to Phebe he did not appear so wretched as Felicita was.

She sank down on her seat near Felicita with such a feeling of heart-sickness and heart-faintness as she had never experienced before. The dreariness and perplexity of the present stretched before her into the coming years. For almost the first time in her life she felt worn out; physically weary and exhausted, as if her strength had been over-taxed. Her childhood on the fresh, breezy uplands, and her happy, tranquil temperament, had hitherto kept her in perfect health. But now she felt as if the sins of those whom she had loved so tenderly and loyally touched the very springs of her life. She could have shared any other burden with them, and borne it with an unbroken spirit and an uncrushed heart. But such a sin as this, so full of woe and bewilderment to them all, entangled her soul also in its poisonous web.

"Why did you sigh so bitterly?" asked Felicita again.

"The world is so full of misery," she answered, in a tremulous and troubled voice; "its happiness is such a mockery!"

"Have you found that out at last, dear Phebe?" said Felicitia. "I have been telling you so for years. The Son of Man fainting under the Cross—that is the true emblem of human life. Even He had not strength enough to bear His cross to the place called Golgotha. Whenever I think of what most truly represents our life here, I see Jesus, faltering along the rough road, with Simon behind Him, whom they compelled to bear His cross."

"He fainted under the sins of the world," murmured Phebe. "It is possible to bear the sorrows of others; but oh! it is hard to carry their sins."

"We all find that out," said Felicitia, her face growing wan and white even to the lips. "Can one man do evil without the whole world suffering for it? Does the effect of a sin ever die out? What is done cannot be undone, through all eternity. There is the wretchedness of it, Phebe."

"I never felt it as I do now," she answered.

"Because you have kept yourself free from earthly ties," said Felicitia mournfully; "you have neither husband nor child to increase your power of suffering a hundredfold. I am entering upon another term of tribulation in Felix and Hilda. If I had only been like you, dear Phebe, I could have passed through life as happily as you do; but my life has never belonged to myself; it has been forced to run in channels made by others."

Somewhere in the house behind them a door was left open accidentally, and the sound of Hilda's piano, and of voices singing, broke in upon the quiet studio. Phebe listened to them, and thought of the desolate, broken-hearted man without, who was listening too. The clear young voices of their children fell upon his ears as upon Felicitia's; so near they were to one another, yet so far apart. She shivered, and drew nearer to the fire.

"I feel as cold as if I was a poor outcast in the streets," she said.

"And I, too," responded Felicitia; "but oh! Phebe, do not you lose heart and courage, like me. You have always seemed in the sunshine, and I have looked up to you and felt cheered. Don't come down into the darkness to me."

(To be continued.)

THE AFFLICTED CHILD.

S.S. Lesson for June 11, Mark 9: 14-29. Golden Text, ver. 23. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHEN the Lord Jesus descended from the Mount of Transfiguration, and "came to His disciples, He saw a great multitude about them, and the scribes questioning with them. And straightway all the people, when they beheld Him, were greatly amazed, and running to Him saluted Him." What was the matter? The disciples had sought to do an act of power, a spiritual act, one which they were empowered and commissioned to do.

AND THEY HAD FAILED.

The scribes were not slow to avail themselves of the occasion, to question and criticise the power and the authority of these disciples. No doubt words of satirical contempt were being spoken, their influence with the people was being lessened, and the poor disciples were in sore trial. Jesus "asked the scribes, What question ye with them? And one of the multitude answered and said, Master, I have brought unto Thee my son, which hath a dumb spirit: and wheresoever he taketh him, he teareth him: and he foameth, and gnasheth with his teeth, and pineth away;" "and he suddenly crieth out; and it teareth him that he foameth again, and bruising him hardly departeth from him" (Luke 9: 39).

Who that is acquainted with epileptic patients can fail to recognize the symptoms in this vivid and painful description. In Matthew's Gospel the father says, "Lord have mercy on my son; for he is lunatic, and sore vexed: for oftentimes he fall-eth into the fire, and oft into the water" (Matt. 17: 15). Those who have heard that sudden crying out, who have witnessed the foaming at the mouth, the bruising and tearing of himself by an epileptic, the sudden fall and the constant danger to life in which such a poor afflicted one lives, cannot fail to see how closely this case resembles those which they have seen. O may God bring many such into real contact with the infallible, the great Physician!

Then came the sad disclosure, "And I spake to Thy disciples, that they should cast him out, and they could not." Jesus had sent these disciples "forth by two and two, and gave them power over unclean spirits" (Mark 6: 7); where was the power gone? What had happened to them? Alas! we shall find that these disciples had been occupied in their hearts as to which of them should be the greatest, and it was this which had drawn away their eyes from Jesus to themselves, and crippled their faith. The father, too, had made a mistake, he brought the child to Jesus, but instead of waiting for an opportunity of speaking with Him, he applied to the disciples. Let us never fall back upon a disciple because we cannot wait for Jesus. Jesus "answereth him, and saith, O faithless generation, how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Bring him unto me." Here was the remedy. In every sickness, whether of soul, or body, or spirit, is a certain cure. The Father hath "given to the Son to have life in Himself," and "the Son quickeneth whom He will" (John 5: 21, 26). "And they brought him unto Him: and when he saw Him, straightway the spirit tare him; and he fell on the ground, and wallowed foaming." The spirit which possessed the child knew that his time was short, and sought to do his worst.

CONTACT WITH JESUS

How often have we seen in cases of conversion, that a sinner has fallen into the lowest depths of sin just before the enemy was forced to loose his hold, and give him up to a conquering Redeemer! How often before a believer has been delivered from the power of inbred besetting sin, it has taken the worst and strongest forms! And just so have we seen in cases of epilepsy. Before being finally delivered through the power of the name of Jesus, the poor patient has had the most terrible fits, accompanied sometimes with pain, although previously when taken in the fit he was completely unconscious. Jesus "asked his father, How long is it ago since this came unto him? And he said, Of a child." It may be that in looking back to the commencement of his malady, a poor sick one might recognize some lesson unlearned, some message of God neglected, of which the sickness was meant to remind him; the teaching of Job 33: 14-28, seems to imply that this is the purpose of God in permitting sickness. The education of His children is so precious in the sight of God, that He is often obliged to make use of sickness and trials of other kinds, in order fully to subdue their stubborn wills. But if we understand the purpose of our God and submit ourselves fully to Him, He who doth not willingly grieve nor afflict the children of men (Lam. 3: 33), is more willing than we believe to heal the sickness, and to lead His child by a gentler method.

The father answered, "Of a child. And oftentimes it hath cast him into the fire, and into the waters to destroy him: but if Thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us and help us. Jesus said unto him, all things are possible to him that believeth." O how many come to Jesus saying in their hearts, "If thou canst." They look at past experience of failure, and think their chances to get any remedy is small, they have always been overcome by such and such a besetment, how can they expect entire deliverance? it would belie all their former experience. True; but this is what faith always does, it belies every bit of experience we have, it brings us a new order of things; the hand of the Almighty is at work, for faith connects human impotence with Almighty power; and then nothing is impossible.

IF THOU CANST BELIEVE,

While the father (who was in this case the responsible party) remained unbelieving, the child could not be healed, because the work which his soul needed was not accomplished. Straightway he cried out with tears, "Lord I believe; help Thou mine unbelief." While he said, "If Thou canst" he put it out of Jesus' power to help him; there was something of implied reproach for the failure of His disciples, and there was no humbling of himself; but when his heart was broken, and he took his place as one needing help, and as one believing in the present help of Jesus, the hindrance was gone. Then Jesus "rebuked the foul spirit, saying unto him, Thou dunest and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him." There was a last terrible struggle, the enemy did not easily let go his hold on the poor victim of his cruelty, "the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him: and he was as one dead; insomuch that many said He is dead." He was dead to all his past, to his sad humbling experience, but He who is the resurrection and the life was there, and He took the hand which He had delivered from the dominion of the evil spirit, "and lifted him up; and he arose." Until the spirit was cast out, Jesus dealt only with the father of the child, and with the evil spirit, but the Lord had something to do with the child as soon as he was delivered.

We have come across blessed instances of entire deliverance from epilepsy through the power of the name of Jesus. In the case of a young French girl, her soul had first to be saved, and immediately upon her finding peace with God, we told her of the power of Christ to deliver, prayed with her, and the fits, which had recurred every alternate day for a considerable period of time, and which were exceedingly violent, making it impossible for her to learn, ceased entirely from that moment. In another case a young man in the north of Germany, made use of the name of Jesus, beseeching deliverance from continually occurring fits of epilepsy. When, after praying a second time, the fit returned, he said to God, "Lord if these fits can glorify Thee, and if I can bear them in the name of Jesus, let them come; but I will bear nothing which I cannot bear in the name of Jesus." The next time a fit occurred, he was conscious of its approach, and cried out aloud, "Im Namen Jesu," i.e., "In the name of Jesus," whereupon the fit ceased; and since then he has always been conscious when a fit was coming on, and in every instance, the power of the name of Jesus, spoken in faith, has delivered him.

We know of another instance in Switzerland much of the same nature, except that the poor young man, an earnest Christian, had become apparently so weak mentally, that his recovery was the more marvellous; he had sometimes twenty-four fits in one day, but has been entirely delivered for the last twelve months, and is now in business, if he has not already entered a missionary college, his great desire being to tell among the heathen what the Lord has done for him in soul and body.

SPIRITUAL EPILEPSY.

There is a spiritual, as well as a physical epilepsy. How many there are who, believing in Christ to a certain extent, have nevertheless a dumb spirit, and cannot say a word for Jesus; the spirit of self which possesses them, leads them into all kinds of dangers, all kinds of falls; they are constantly deploring these falls and backslidings, and yet the fit of anger, or of pride, or of evil speaking, or of envy, or of impurity, comes again, until they are almost in despair. They need deliverance, the evil thing must be cast out, and then they will be free for the service of their God.

When Jesus "was come into the house, His disciples asked Him privately, Why could not we cast him out?" "And Jesus said unto them, Because of your unbelief: for verily I say unto you, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place; and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you. Howbeit this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting" (Matt. 17: 20, 21). There is a wider meaning in fasting than is sometimes imagined. Besides the absolute refraining from food, there is the denial of the will, the tastes, the predilections, all of which clears the channel for the grace of God, and leaves freer play for the movements of His Spirit. If we, who are His children, are not able to do works of spiritual power which He has commissioned us to do, He is not responsible, it lies at the door of our unbelief, our looking away from God, or of our fulness of self. Lord save us from ourselves. Amen.

The Discussion of Mr. Gladstone's Scheme to relieve Irish tenants of their burdens of debt shows that the measure is far more thorough and beneficial than was at first supposed. By its first provision the bill gives as a gift one year's rent to every tenant whose rent is valued at and under $150, who happens to be in arrears, and in consideration of the payment of one year's rent it wipes out all arrears of rent and allows him to start fresh in the world. To accomplish this the State will have to pay the land owners ten million dollars on account of the debt now owed by the tenants. This sum will be paid out of the public fund, which tenants will not be asked to pay back. It is calculated that the tenants of Ireland are now indebted to the landowners by arrears of rent to the amount of $40,000,000, which the owners will be required to forgive, so that the Irish peasant will profit to the extent of $50,000,000 as the result of Mr. Gladstone's bill. How wide-reaching and effective the arrears bill is may be judged from the fact that it will affect to a greater or less degree no less than 585,000 tenants, representing in round numbers 3,500,000 persons, who are now described by Mr. Gladstone as being at the mercy of the landlords. The landowners too do not appear to be so much opposed to the scheme as might have been expected. They will have to forgive the tenants a very large sum of money, but it is probable that they have regarded the debt as altogether lost, and the money to be paid jointly by the government and the tenant as a condition of the remission of the remainder, is more than they could reasonably have expected to recover.

Disunion has Appeared in the Ranks of the Irish politicians. Mr. Parnell's leadership was on Tuesday, May 23d, openly disowned in the House of Commons by fifteen Irish members who have hitherto acted implicitly under his instructions. Mr. Parnell was desirous of expediting the measure to relieve the tenants of their burden of debt, but, in order to do that, it was necessary that the bill for the suppression of crime which had precedence of it should advance a stage. Mr. Parnell, while determined to vote against the latter, wished that the hopeless struggle against it should not be maintained, fearing that if it were, the rent bill would be delayed; he therefore informed the House that although his party were firmly opposed to the Coercion bill and would vote against it at every stage they would not obstruct it. But Mr. O'Donnell, one of the released suspects, rose and stated that he would not hold himself bound by Mr. Parnell's promise, but would obstruct the bill by any and every means. Mr. Parnell then walked out of the House followed by a few of his friends. This split in the Irish party is believed to proceed from Mr. O'Donnell's ambition. He is reported as being jealous of Mr. Parnell, and being desirous of assuming the position of leader of the Irish party. Mr. Parnell's temporary unpopularity in Ireland proceeding from the suspicion that he has made a bargain with Mr. Gladstone, afforded an opportunity of which Mr. O'Donnell was prompt to avail himself. At this juncture it is most unfortunate for Ireland that there should be disunion among her representatives in Parliament.

An Ultimatum has been Presented to Egypt by the Representatives of England and France. It appears that although the ministry made their submission to the Khédive as mentioned last week, they still remained opposed to the foreign controllers, and as the Khédive was resolved on supporting the English and French ministers, the breach between him and his cabinet was not healed. The presence of the Anglo-French squadrons in Egyptian waters appears to have exasperated Arabi Bey and his colleagues, who have commenced warlike operations by laying a line of torpedoes along the coast. The situation having become so alarming, the English and French ministers on May 25th presented an ultimatum to the Khédive in which they say: "Whereas the President of the Chamber of Notables has proposed as the only means of ending the disturbance of the country, the temporary removal of Arabi Bey from Egypt, with retention of rank and pay, and the resignation of the Ministry; and whereas these conditions can prevent the misfortune menacing Egypt, we recommend them to the serious attention of the Ministry, and if necessary the two governments will exact their due fulfilment. In intervening in the affairs of Egypt, England and France have no other object than the maintenance of the status quo, and they will use their good offices with the Khédive to obtain general amnesty." The presentation of this document has brought the conflict to a crisis from which it is feared there will be no issue possible but war, which may lead to European complications.

The Postponement of the Coronation of the Czar of Russia for one year has been decided upon in consequence of the danger apprehended from Nihilistic plots. A despatch from Tilsit states that the decision was taken at a council of the Russian imperial family at the Peterhof Palace, and was caused by the receipt of alarming information touching the projects of the nihilists. The European Press confirms the report and states that the information of the projects of the nihilists which caused the postponement was received at St. Petersburg from foreign police. The German Embassy at St. Petersburg was also warned that the German Crown Prince Frederick William would incur great danger if he attended the coronation as there was a deep, undiscovered conspiracy against the Czar and his guests.

An Important Speech Delivered by Michael Davitt last week shows that the concessions Mr. Gladstone is now making to the Irish people, extensive as they are, will not diminish discontent or prevent the spread of the agitation. Michael Davitt, addressing a meeting of Irishmen at Manchester, said nobody lamented the recent murders more than he, and nobody was readier to prevent such crimes in future. He declared that without the presence of police and military the property of Irish landlords would not be worth a month's purchase. He said there could be no alliance between Irishmen and English Whigs until landlordism was completely abolished. The government could not grapple effectually with a secret movement when it was made to appear that such movement was only for the protection of a wronged people. He declared that if Mr. Gladstone was earnest in his efforts to suppress crime he must go to the source of all agrarian outrage and remove landlordism, sweep away Dublin Castle and show that he could repose the same confidence in Ireland as in Canada.

The Russian Jews are Alarmed by the Publication of an official order which they apprehend will lead to further outbreaks in spite of its ostensible friendliness. It is ordered by the Czar and his ministers that the Jews shall henceforth be prohibited from settling outside of towns and villages, except where Jewish settlements already exist. All contracts of purchase or tenancy with Jews are provisionally suspended. It is also announced that by order of the Emperor the government is firmly resolved to punish inexorably all outrages against the persons and property of Jews, seeing that the latter are under the protection of the laws, which are equally binding upon all subjects of the Czar. Governors and other authorities are therefore commanded on their personal responsibility to take timely measures to prevent or suppress outrages against Jews. The regulations in regard to the Jews are only temporary, in view of the final solution of the question.

An Alliance between Austria and Russia so far as their policy toward Turkey is concerned, has been concluded. The intelligence is ominous, because it shows that a policy of distrust affects the whole European Continent. It is stated in the cablegrams of the week that the motives which have led to the alliance were incited by the conviction that Germany was plotting to set Russia and Austria at variance, in the hope that war might break out between the two nations and both might be weakened. It is manifest to the careful student of prophecy who intelligently watches the course of events that the predicted general European war will not be much longer delayed.

Dr. Somerville, the World's Evangelist, who has just returned to England from an evangelistic tour in Germany, attended the noon meeting for prayer at Glasgow, on April 24th, and briefly expressed his thanks to Almighty God for His preservation and assistance during the four and a half months' of mission work in Germany. Illustrating the importance of sinners taking advantage of their opportunities, Dr. Somerville said, at a subsequent meeting in the Circus: "When I was lately in Germany, a person who had been in the West Indies told me that in the Island of Trinidad there is a harbor which is so much shut in that, unless the wind be blowing in a particular direction, the vessels there cannot get out to sea. It so happened that there had been a long continuance of wind in one direction, and there were three vessels that were shut up in the haven unable to get out. One night the wind changed, and one of the three vessels steered out to sea. The captains of the other two thought, 'Oh, there is a change come over the atmosphere, and we will still take a holiday, and we will sail to-morrow.' The vessel that sailed away reached home in Great Britain, unloaded her cargo, took on board another cargo, and then sailed back to Trinidad; and when she got there she found the two ships she had left three months before! The wind had again changed during that night, and they had not had another opportunity in all those three months of leaving their moorings."

An Italian Professor Converted.—A Protestant clergyman narrates the following incident, which occurred recently in Rome, Italy. One Sunday the text was Matt. 8:23: "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." In the church there was a professor of physical science in the university, Signor C., who came to me at the close of the service and with great emotion seized my hand and said, "I thank you for your discourse. That sermon was made for me. I am that poor leper of whom you spoke." After this we had many private conversations, and this unbeliever joyfully surrendered before the evidences of Christianity. More lately he has told me of the changes which have taken place in his home; and now three ladies of his family come with him to the house of God and truly relish the unfolding of Scripture. These successes point to a vast awakening in Italy before long, if not to the entire overthrow of the Papacy.

The Issue of Bibles, Testaments, and Portions of the Word of God by the British and Foreign Bible Society during the past year is thus summarized in the annual report of the society held in London on May 3d. Notwithstanding the intense eagerness with which the Revised New Testament in English was expected and welcomed, the home issues of Holy Scripture by the society have been 9200, and the foreign issues have been 83,300, more than last year. The Testaments called for at home have been only 38,000 fewer, those called for abroad have been 39,000 more this year than last. And the whole demand for Testaments in every tongue has again not fallen far short of a million. Understanding by copies Bibles, Testaments, and Portions taken together, the total issues at home have been 1,509,000, and those abroad 1,429,000, in all 2,938,000 copies, or nearly 10,000 a day for the working days of the year and these figures bring up the Bibles, Testaments and Portions supplied by the society since its formation to 93,953,000 copies.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 6, Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinion of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers of prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The Scene of the Assassination of Lord CAVENDISH and Mr. BURKE in Phoenix Park, Dublin.

THE DOUBLE ASSASSINATION IN IRELAND.

The Meaning of the Crime—Prophetic and Secular Warnings of an Impending Storm—America's Concern in the Tragedy—Responsibility for the Crime—The Victims—Lord Frederick Cavendish's Career—Mr. Thomas Burke's Devotion to his Country—Mr. W. E. Forster's Life—Details of the Horrible Deed—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Remarks.

THE most popular of living secular authors thus writes in one of his recently published works, of the present condition of society and its ominous warnings: "In secret and in the open alike, there is a vast power growing and growing, increasing in volume and bulk from hour to hour, from year to year; none can tell in what fashion it will reveal itself. But you may depend upon it that when the spark does spring out of the cloud—when the clearance of the atmosphere is due—people will look back on the revolutions of 1688, and 1798, and 1848 as mere playthings. The great revolution is still to come; it may be nearer than some imagine." Those words were written by a man who probably never devoted ten minutes of his whole life to the study of unfulfilled prophecy; yet he, regarding society from a purely secular standpoint, arrives at conclusions and utters warnings as to the future time of trouble, identical with those of the men whose views are based on the predictions of the Bible. The storm is surely coming and the penetrating gaze of the secular student observes its approach as clearly as does the reverent student of God's Word. Among the signs of the gathering tempest, not one has been witnessed of late years more significant than the murder on May 6th of the two government officials in Ireland.

We have more concern with this crime than America usually has with crimes committed on a foreign soil. Our sympathies are enlisted for the Irish people ground down by long centuries of poverty, hardship, and injustice. That sympathy has shown itself in practical form, for when the Irish people were hungry our hands fed them, and when they needed assistance to carry on a struggle against injustice, American gold was freely sent to them. There is consequently at this crisis a voice raised throughout England that America is largely responsible for the horrible crimes committed a few weeks ago. That such a charge is unjust we are well aware; no nation under the sun is more firmly opposed to cowardly assassination than are the citizens of this great republic. But unhappily we have in our midst men alien in instinct and in principle to ourselves, whose voices are raised above those of the ordinary citizens and who, we grieve to say, approve such crimes. They applauded the murder of the Czar of Russia and they rejoice with diabolical malignity in all such crimes. Within sight of the spot where these words are written lives a man whose voice is accepted as a law by thousands of his countrymen, and he—Jeremiah O'Donovan, better known as O'Donovan Rossa—had the shameless effrontery in speaking of these murders on behalf of his people to say: "We call upon all our brothers in America, particularly the Advanced Nationalists, to aid, by every means within their power, the men who have carried out this execution, and we hereby further declare that they deserve well of their country." At this juncture we owe it to ourselves and our principles to speak out boldly and unequivocally in repudiation of such a man and his utterances.

Nor can we consider this awful tragedy without taking into account the responsibility which must be shared by Mr. Parnell and his coadjutors of the Land League. It is true that Mr. Parnell has denounced the crimes, but he has not denounced them as crimes, but as blunders—blunders which interfered and threatened to thwart his projects. These are not the first murders by many that have been committed by his followers. Other less distinguished men, helpless women, and tender children, have been murdered and mutilated by these savages without evoking a word of protest, and now his regret is chiefly that the victims were so prominent and so universally respected that he fears the indignation excited by their fate may retard his schemes. Of their intrinsic wickedness he has no word to say, any more than he had of the previous outrages.

Miss Parnell, too, does not conceal, even so much as her brother is crafty enough to do, her opinion of the crimes. In a letter to the London Times she said that if there are any persons who are surprised that the assassin's arm is not idle, they must not forget that there is such a thing as human nature among Irishmen. Mr. Egan, another prominent Land Leaguer, is still more explicit in revealing the motives which have prompted the deed of blood. He said "Ireland is used to repression. It has kept the national spirit alive. Nothing would be more dangerous to Ireland than a long term of peace." It is with the object of preventing such "a long term of peace," which would terminate the occupation on which these miserable creatures thrive, that the murders were committed.

THE VICTIMS

were chosen with this end in view. Had Mr. Forster been murdered it might have been said that the personal share he had in imprisoning the Land Leaguers might have provoked personal malignity, of which his murder was the outcome. But Lord Frederick Cavendish was a man who had done Ireland no wrong, and he had gone over to that country as a special messenger of peace. The assassins and the men who directed them fired on a flag of truce, and have thus placed themselves on record as implacable enemies to reconciliation as well as the most cowardly villains of the age.

LORD FREDERICK C. CAVENDISH, whose portrait appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, was the second son of the Duke of Devonshire, the head of a family which has filled a conspicuous place in the history of England. The eldest son of the Duke of Devonshire is the Marquis of Hartington, who was chosen by the Liberal party to succeed Mr. Gladstone as leader of the party when that gentleman, in chagrin at his defeat in 1874, resigned his office and left the party he had led into disaster to make their way out of it as they best could. The Marquis of Hartington led the party out of its humiliating position, and when victory once more crowned its banners he nobly retired from his position and Mr. Gladstone was again placed at its head. The Marquis of Hartington is unmarried, and therefore it was not improbable that his brother, Lord Frederick Cavendish, might at some future day inherit the estates and the proud title of his father, the Duke of Devonshire.

Lord Frederick was born at Compton Place, Sussex, November 30th, 1836, and was therefore at the time of his tragical death in his forty-sixth year. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge—where his father had studied and had left an honorable record as second wrangler. Lord Frederick was intended for a diplomatic career. As a preliminary training for public life he became private secretary to Lord Granville, who has devoted his whole life to foreign affairs and who has twice been appointed Foreign Secretary of England. Afterward Lord Frederick became private secretary to Mr. Gladstone, who was warmly attached to the young man, and has always shown a kindly regard for him. It is reported that he never was enamored of departmental work. In 1864 he married the Honorable Lucy Caroline, the second daughter of Lord Lyttelton, thus becoming by marriage a nephew of Mr. Gladstone. He then settled down to a comparatively quiet life. He had no difficulty in securing from the Yorkshire electors a seat in Parliament as member for the North-west Riding, and he was hailed as a welcome acquisition by the statesmen there as an able and useful member. He was content to allow his brother, the Marquis, to monopolize all the Parliamentary honors, but he was a reliable party man, always voted straight, and his name was regularly recorded in all the important divisions. He was very popular with his party, and the Northwest Riding was very proud of him. He was more genial than his elder brother, the Marquis of Hartington, and was generally liked.

When Mr. Gladstone became Prime Minister again in 1880, Lord Frederick Cavendish was appointed Junior Lord of the Treasury, with a salary of $10,000 a year. He used to sit close to Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons, and filled the position admirably. Since his preferment he spoke more frequently in the House than before, and it was evident that he took a more active interest in affairs of the nation. He never, or very seldom, made a set speech, for he was afflicted with a defect in his speech and it was evident that his stammering tongue would prevent his ever becoming a brilliant orator, but when he had anything to say it had the advantage of being brief, terse, and to the point.

When Mr. Gladstone determined on releasing the suspects and reversing the coercion policy Mr. Forster resigned. In doing so he explicitly warned the government that the change would result in a fresh outbreak of crime and he would not be responsible for it. But Mr. Gladstone was determined in his resolve, and as he could not himself be Irish Secretary, as he already holds two offices in the government—those of Premier and Chancellor of the Exchequer, he selected Lord Frederick Cavendish for the post, as being a man who having once been his private secretary he could rely upon for carrying out his policy faithfully. After the tragedy he thus testified to the worth of Lord Cavendish: "I must say that one of the very noble hearts in England has ceased to beat, and he ceased at the very moment when it was just devoted to the service of Ireland, full of love for the country, full of hope for her future, full of capacity to render her service."

Lord Cavendish leaves no children. His widow is a truly noble woman, who even in the hour of her bitter anguish thus wrote to Lord Spencer: "I would never grudge the sacrifice of my darling's life if it only leads to putting down the frightful spirit of evil in Ireland. He himself would never have grudged it if thereby death could do more than life."

who was murdered at the same time as Lord Frederick Cavendish, was the permanent Under-Secretary for Ireland. He was born in 1829, and on the 29th of this month would have reached his 53rd year. He was the eldest son of the late Mr. William Burke, of Knocknagur, County Galway, his mother, Fanny Xaveria Tucker, having been a niece of the late Cardinal Wiseman. His father resided at Bruges, and he was educated in Belgium and Germany, and was a proficient linguist.

From the time he entered the Castle in 1865, to the hour of his death, with hardly any intervals for recreation, he was unremitting in his attention to his official duties. He was private secretary to Lord Carlingford, Sir Robert Peel, and Lord Hartington while they were Chief Secretaries for Ireland. Though he belonged to the Liberal party he strictly and with implicit fidelity carried out the views and directions of the government of the day. From the habits acquired during so many years of office he was extremely cautious and reserved; to some, indeed, he appeared haughty; but he was a cheerful companion and much beloved by his intimate friends, who deeply feel his loss. He was a Roman Catholic, and his presumptive heir was his cousin, Sir John Lionel Burke.

His personal merit and administrative ability were warmly eulogized by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Forster in the House of Commons on May 8th, the former of whom said: "In the death of Mr. Burke we are robbed of one of the ablest, the most upright, the most experienced, the most eminent members of that Civil Service to which we owe so much in the government of the country in the hands of its permanent officers."

Mr. Forster was even more lavish in his eulogy, saying: "There is no Member of Parliament present who knew Mr. Burke so well as I did. The country and the Queen have never had a more faithful, a more upright, and a more truly honorable and unselfish servant. His industry, his devotion to his duty, were something more than is scarcely ever known. For more than two years he never had a fortnight's holiday. Day after day, from morning till night, he plodded on with work which to him was most distasteful, with the silent dignified reticence that belonged to him, uncompromisingly and resignedly, without acknowledgment and without much praise; and we all thought he was safe from such a visitation as this which has happened to him. Not many months ago I wrote and told him that I thought I ought to press him to accept additional emolument. He said he was satisfied with the respect of those who worked with him and the confidence of those who were above him, and he entirely forbade me to ask him to accept any reward.

"I think I never met with a man so completely without prejudice, so completely and absolutely fair, and so determined to do justice to all classes, and that in a country where it is sometimes difficult to be done. The tenant-farmer never lost a former friend than in Mr. Burke, who treated his own tenants well, and who always stood up for tenants in a place (the Castle) where they sometimes think their interests are forgotten. Over and over again he has pointed out to me in the interests of the tenants cases of hardship on the part of the landlord, and of all men I have met in Ireland, or have heard or read of, he was the most ready to denounce injustice." That is the character of the murdered man, over whose death the professed friends of the tenant-farmers of Ireland are now rejoicing.

THE RT. HON. W. E. FORSTER, M.P., whose portrait also appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week, is a typical Englishman. He was born in the town of Bradpole, Dorsetshire, in 1818. His parents being of the Society of Friends, he was sent to school at one of their own institutions, known as the Friends' School, at Tottenham. Mr. Forster began while yet a young man to take an intelligent interest in all kinds of public matters, and soon put himself into contact with philanthropic aims and efforts. He is one of those quiet natures which are full of noble purpose, and incapable of knowing that misery is within his reach without making an effort to help and save the suffering ones.

Mr. Forster has travelled extensively in America, and has made many friends both in the Northern and Southern States. In 1846-47 he visited some of the Irish counties which had been devastated by the famine, and distributed a relief fund which had been raised by the Quakers. A vigorously written pamphlet which he penned on this occasion manifested the lively and sympathetic interest which he took in public affairs.

It was on the question of education that Mr. Forster gained so much celebrity; for he was Vice-President of the Council, and accepted the responsible task of introducing that famous Educational Bill providing free public schools, which will ever be associated with his name. He met with stern opposition, especially from the leading spirits of the Bible-ignoring Birmingham League, because the bill permits the reading of the Bible (without note or comment) in common schools. Nothing, however, shook his faith in the measure. He saw further into the matter than his opponents, and he was most anxious to establish a principle as nearly as possible such as the greatest number could accept, while it would benefit the whole nation. Mr. Forster adhered to the main principles of his bill, never vacating his place in the House until, in 1872, his measure had passed the third reading unimpaired by the opposition in Parliament.

It was only a few days before the assassinations that he resigned his office owing to a disagreement between himself and other members of the Cabinet on the question of coercive legislation for Ireland, which he insisted upon, as indispensable.

THE MURDERS.

Lord Frederick Cavendish on his appointment to office at once proceeded to Ireland and on Saturday, May 6th, he took part in the ceremonies attending the inauguration of Lord Spencer as the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. After taking the customary oath of office Earl Spencer and Lord Cavendish were for some time engaged in the Castle upon business relating to the release of eighty more of the imprisoned suspects and other matters. Desiring to enjoy a little of the refreshing air of a summer-like evening, Lord Cavendish walked from the Castle to the Lodge, appropriated to his use as Chief Secretary, a picture of which appears on page 364. His way lay through the Phoenix Park, and but a short distance from the Viceroy's residence where he had promised to dine with Earl Spencer after he had called at his own residence. Mr. Burke was also at the Castle, but being detained some time after Lord Cavendish left he took a car to the Phoenix Park gate, and there dismissing the driver, joined Lord Cavendish, and they walked off together toward the Lodge. They were unarmed, as they apprehended no danger, especially under what seemed the auspicious inauguration of a policy of conciliation. Suddenly they were set upon by four men, who, armed with knives, made a deadly onslaught upon them.

A boy named Jacobs states that, while bird-nesting in the park, he saw about 200 yards from where he was, near the road, a group of men who seemed to be wrestling. He thought they were roughs, and did not pay much attention to them. He then saw two men fall to the ground, and the others, four in number, jump on a car and drive rapidly off towards Chapelizod, which lies in the direction opposite to the city. A Mr. Maguire and a friend, riding on tricycles, had passed Mr. Burke and Lord F. Cavendish shortly before the murder. They were then on their way along the main road through the park. Returning only six minutes later, the tricyclists found the Chief Secretary lying on the main road in the centre of the carriage way, and Mr. Burke prostrate upon the pathway. Both were in large pools of blood.

Mr. Maguire immediately informed the police of what he had seen, and the police, proceeding to the scene of the murder, conveyed the bodies to Steeven's Hospital. On examination it was found that Mr. Burke had received several stabs near the region of the heart, and that his throat was cut almost completely across. His clothes were much torn, and his hands bore marks suggestive of a fierce encounter with his assailants. Lord Frederick had been stabbed in several places about the chest; one wound was through the right lung and was very deep. Both men were dead.

The murder must have been deliberately planned, and there is reason to believe that it was also intended to murder Earl Spencer had he not been mounted on horseback. The supposition that Lord F. Cavendish was not the intended victim, and that to the assassins he was unknown and not likely to be obnoxious is refuted by the fact that as the procession passed through Dame Street earlier in the day, near the Castle, a man stood near the carriage in which Lord F. Cavendish, Mr. Jeukinson, and the Hon. Mr. Spencer were seated, and asked whether Lord F. Cavendish was in the procession. He received no answer, and, moving on, repeated his question, without eliciting a reply. He asked a third time, and then Lord F. Cavendish, raising his hat, said, "I am Lord F. Cavendish." The man replied, "Thank you, that will do," and went away. A man similarly attired was observed in the park near the scene of the murder.

His Excellency the Lord-Lieutenant had ridden by the scene of the tragedy only a short time before, accompanied by his private secretary and an aide-de-camp, also on horseback. His Excellency was in the grounds to the south of the Viceregal Lodge, and saw a scuffle on the road, which he thought was a drunken brawl, and sent a constable to see what was the matter. But by that time the fatal deed was done.

THE NEWS IN LONDON

and the provinces, of the sanguinary deed, was one of unqualified horror and detestation. The Court Circular says:

"Her Majesty received with deep grief the horrible news of the assassination of Lord Frederick Cavendish, Chief Secretary, and of Mr. Burke, Under-Secretary, for Ireland."

The Queen, on receipt of the news from Mr. Gladstone, telegraphed to Lady Frederick Cavendish her great grief at the dreadful outrage that had filled her heart with sorrow. But on royal hearts the grief of others sits lightly, and on the very day when the poor mutilated body of the young man was being interred amid general sorrow in the vault at Chatsworth, Queen Victoria, with a glaring lack of decent regard for propriety, was holding a public reception with the usual festivities.

Mr. Gladstone, who received a telegram announcing the tragedy on Saturday night, is reported to have been almost paralyzed with astonishment. The Marquis of Hartington, the eldest brother of the deceased, was at a reception then being held by Lord Northbrook when he received the news. The Marquis was terribly affected. Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, accompanied by Lord Hartington and Lady Louisa Egerton (the deceased nobleman's sister), proceeded between eleven and twelve o'clock on Saturday night to where Lady Cavendish was staying and gently unfolded the news to her ladyship. The scene which took place was one of a most painful character. The bereaved lady, on hearing of the untimely death of her noble husband, told to her though it was without any revelation of the hideous details of the foul crime, swooned in the arms of the grief-stricken relatives and friends who stood around. She, however, with wonderful self-command, soon recovered from the wild outbursts of grief and became more composed, though her condition was distressing in the extreme. The Marquis of Hartington, although he entered the house, yet never saw Lady Frederick, fearing that the meeting would be of too painful a character.

The terrible news was alluded to in many of the London churches.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON, in his introductory prayer, said their hearts grew heavy in passing along the streets and observing the announcements of the dreadful news from the sister isle. He prayed that the bonds of social life might not be altogether severed, and that peace might yet rest on that distracted country. While the tyrant oftentimes fell at the hands of the oppressed, it could not be asserted that the latest victims were in any sense tyrants, or the representatives of despots; they were, on the contrary, men actuated by a desire to serve their fellow-men. In his prayer, Mr. Spurgeon devoutly remembered the Queen and Her Majesty's Ministers at the present critical time, supplicating that the former might enjoy many years of happiness and peace and that the latter might receive strength and guidance in their conduct of the nation's affairs.

PHOENIX PARK,

in which the terrible tragedy was enacted, is the glory of Dublin. It had its origin in a command of Queen Elizabeth, but was not completed until the reign of Charles II. Although it does not possess the tall and ancient trees which give so much beauty to Hyde Park, London, and the adjacent Kensington Gardens, the Phoenix Park is considered by many to be the fairest and grandest of all enclosures of the kind in the British Islands. It lies to the west of Dublin, and covers the enormous space of 1753 acres; of these 160 are occupied with the garden ground surrounding the Viceregal Lodge, the official summer residence of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It is a long, white, two storied building, and though insignificant in elevation and architectural adornment, contains apartments sufficiently numerous and capacious for the assemblage of a court. This building is shown on page 364.

Not many hundred yards from the Viceregal residence is that of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, which is also surrounded by a demesne. A picture of the building also appears on page 364. Dublin Castle and the Chapel Royal, a view of which appears on page 365, originated in the desire of John the "Landless," son of Henry II., to protect the city on the Liffey. To use his own words, "It was to be raised in a competent place, as well to curb the city as to defend it." It was commenced in 1205, and took fifteen years to complete it. From time to time Parliaments and courts of law were held within its walls. It was not until Queen Elizabeth's reign that it became a Viceregal residence. The building presents an unsymmetrical and gloomy aspect, though there are gorgeous apartments and magnificent chambers within. The Chapel Royal is the front portion of the Castle. On the same page is a picture of Kilmainham Jail, where Mr. Parnell and the other suspects were confined.

WHAT ARE OUR DEPARTED CHRISTIAN FRIENDS DOING NOW?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
June 4, 1882.

"Now it came to pass in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, that the heavens were opened."—EZEKIEL 1:1.

Heavenly Visions for the Desolate—A Question Often Asked—An Inferential Answer—Temperaments that Survive Death—I. Celestial Happiness of the Artistic Soul—Genius in a Heavenly Studio—II. The Delight of Heavenly Music—Haydn's Acknowledgment of the Source of all Light—III. Work for Christian Soldiers—The Cohorts in the Air Fighting for the Right—IV. EZEKIEL, with others, had been expatriated, and while in foreign slavery was standing on the banks of the royal canal which he and other serfs had been condemned to dig by the order of Nebuchadnezzar—this royal canal, in the text, called the river of Chebar; the illustrious exile had visions of Heaven. Indeed, it is almost always so that the brightest visions of Heaven come not to those who are on mountain top of prosperity, but to some John on desolate Patmos, or to some Paul in Mamertine dungeon, or to some Ezekiel standing on the banks of a ditch he had been compelled to dig—yea, to the weary, to the heart-broken, to those whom sorrow has banished.

The text is very particular to give us the exact time of the vision. It was in the thirtieth year, and in the fourth month, and in the fifth day of the month. So you have had visions of earth you shall never forget. You remember the year, you remember the month, you remember the day, you remember the hour. Why may not we have some such vision this morning, and it be in the sixth month and in the fourth day of the month?

The question is often silently asked, though perhaps never audibly propounded, "What are our departed Christian friends doing now?" The question is more easily answered than you might perhaps suppose. Though there has come no recent intelligence from the Heavenly city, and we seem dependent upon the story of eighteen centuries ago, still I think we may from strongest inference decide what are the present occupations of our transferred kinsfolk.

After God has made a nature He never eradicates the chief characteristics of its temperament. You never knew a man phlegmatic in temperament to become sanguine in temperament. You never knew a man sanguine in temperament to become phlegmatic in temperament. Conversion plants new principles in the soul, but Paul and John are just as different from each other after conversion as they were different from each other before conversion. If conversion does not eradicate the prominent characteristics of the temperament neither will death eradicate them.

You have, then, only by a sum in subtraction and a sum in addition to decide what are the employments of your departed friends in the better world. You are to subtract from them all earthly grossness and add all earthly goodness, and then you are to come to the conclusion that they are doing now in Heaven what in their best moments they did on earth. The reason that so many people never start for Heaven is because they could not stand it if they got there if it should turn out to be the rigid and formal place some people photograph it.

We like to come to church, but we would not want to stay here to next Christmas. We like to hear the Hallelujah chorus, but we would not want to hear it all the time for fifty centuries. It might be on some great occasion it would be possibly comfortable to wear a crown of gold weighing several pounds, but it would be an affliction to wear such a crown forever. In other words, we run the descriptions of Heaven into the ground while we make that which was intended as especial and celebrative to be the exclusive employment of the Heaven. You might as well, if asked to describe the habits of American society, describe a Decoration Day, or a Fourth of July, or an autumnal Thanksgiving as though it were all the time that way.

I am not going to speculate in regard to the future world, but I must by inevitable laws of inference and deduction and common sense conclude that in Heaven we will be just as different from each other as we are now different, and hence that there will be at least as many in the celestial world as there are employments here. Christ is to be the great love, the great joy, the great rapture, the great worship of Heaven; but will that abolish employments? No more than loves on earth—paternal, filial, fraternal, conjugal love, abolishes earthly occupation.

I. In the first place, I remark that all those of our departed Christian friends who on earth found great joy in the fine arts are now indulging their tastes in the same direction. On earth they had their gladdest pleasures amid pictures and statuary, and in the study of the laws of light and shade and perspective. Have you any idea that that affluence of faculty at death collapsed and perished? Why so, when there is more for them to look at, and they have keener appreciation of the beautiful, and they stand amid the very looms where the sunsets and the rainbows and the spring mornings are woven?

Are you so obtuse as to suppose that because the painter drops his easel and the sculptor his chisel and the engraver his knife, that therefore that taste, which he was enlarging and intensifying for forty or fifty years is entirely obliterated? These artists, or these friends of art, on earth worked in coarse material and with imperfect brain and with frail hand. Now they have carried their art into larger liberties and into wider circumference. They are at but without the fatigues, without the limitations, without the hindrances of the terrestrial studio.

Raphael could now improve upon his masterpiece of Michael the archangel now that he has seen him, and could improve upon his masterpiece of the Holy Family now that he has visited them. Michael Angelo could better present the Last Judgment after he has seen its flash and heard the rumbling battering rams of its thunder. Exquisite colors here, graceful lines here, powerful chiaroscuro here; but I am persuaded that the grander studios and the brighter galleries are higher up by the winding marble stairs of the sepulchre, and that Turner and Holman Hunt and Rembrandt and Titian and Paul Veronese, if they exercised saving faith in the Christ whom they portrayed upon the canvas, are painters yet, but their strength of faculty multiplied ten-thousand fold. The reason that God took away their eye and their hand and their brain was that He might give them something more limber, more wieldy, more skilful, more multipliant.

Do not, therefore, be melancholy among the tapestries and the bric-à-brac and the embroideries and the water colors and the works of art which your departed friends used to admire. Do not say: "I am so sorry they had to leave all these things." Rather say: "I am glad they have gone up to higher artistic opportunity and appreciation." Our friends who found so much joy in the fine arts on earth are now luxuriating in Louvres and Luxembourgs celestial.

II. I remark again that all our departed Christian friends who in this world were passionately fond of music are still regaling that taste in the world celestial. The Bible says so much about the music of Heaven that it cannot all be figurative. The Bible over and over again speaks of

THE SONGS OF HEAVEN.

If Heaven had no songs of its own a vast number of those of earth would have been taken up by the earthly emigrants. Surely the Christian at death does not lose his memory. Then there must be millions of souls in Heaven who know "Coronation" and "Antioch" and "Mount Pisgah" and "Old Hundred." The leader of the eternal orchestra need only once tap his baton and all Heaven will be ready for the hallelujah.

CANNOT THE SOUL SING?

How often we compliment some exquisite singer by saying "There was so much soul in her music." In Heaven it will be all soul until the body after a while comes up in the resurrection and then there will be an additional Heaven. Cannot the soul hear? If it can hear then it can hear music. Do not, therefore, let it be in your household when some member leaves for Heaven as it is in some households, that you close the piano and unstring the harp for two years, because the fingers that used to play on them are still. You must remember that they have better instruments of music where they are.

You ask me, "Do they have real harps and real trumpets and real organs?" I do not know. Some wisecracks say positively there are no such things in Heaven. I do not know, but I should not be surprised if the God who made all the mountains and all the hills and all the forests and all the metals of the earth and all the growths of the universe—I should not be surprised if He could, if He had a mind to, make a few harps and trumpets and organs.

Grand old Haydn, sick and worn out, was carried for the last time into the music hall and there he heard his own oratorio of the "Creation." History says that as the orchestra came to that famous passage, "Let there be light!" the whole audience rose and cheered, and Haydn waved his hand toward Heaven and said, "It comes from there!" Overwhelmed with his own music, he was carried out in his chair, and as he came to the door he spread his hand toward the orchestra as in benediction.

Haydn was right when he waved his hand toward Heaven and said, "It comes from there." Music was born in Heaven and it will ever have its highest throne in Heaven; and I want you to understand that our departed friends who were passionately fond of music here are now at the headquarters of harmony. I think that the grand old church tunes that died when your grandfathers died have gone with them to Heaven.

III. Again, I remark that those of our departed Christian friends who in this world had very strong military spirit are now in and out on bloodless battle. There are hundreds of people born soldiers. They cannot help it. They belong to regiments in time of peace. They cannot hear a drum or a fife without trying to keep step to the music. They are Christians, and when they fight they fight on the right side. Now when these, our Christian friends who had natural and powerful military spirit, entered Heaven they entered the celestial army.

The door of Heaven hardly opens but you hear a military demonstration. David cried out: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand." Elisha saw the mountains filled with celestial cavalry. St. John said, "The armies which are in Heaven followed him on white horses." Now, when those who had the military spirit on earth sanctified entered glory, I suppose they right away enlisted in some Heavenly campaign, they volunteered right away. There must needs be in Heaven soldiers with a soldierly spirit. There are grand parade days when the King reviews the troops. There must be armed escort sent out to bring up from earth to Heaven those who were more than conquerors. There must be crusades ever being fitted out for some part of God's dominion—battles, bloodless, groanless, painless. Angels of evil to be fought down and fought back. Other rebellious worlds to be conquered. Worlds to be put to the torch. Worlds to be saved. Worlds to be demolished. Worlds to be sunk. Worlds to be hoisted.

Beside that, in our own world there are battles for the right and against the wrong where we must have the Heavenly military. That is what keeps us Christian reformers so buoyant. So few good men against so many bad men, so few churches against so many grog-shops, so few pure printing-presses against so many polluted printing-presses; and yet we are buoyant and courageous, because while we know that the armies of evil in the world are larger in numbers than the army of the truth, there are celestial cohorts in the air fighting on our side.

I have not so much faith in the army on the ground as I have in the army in the air. O! God, open our eyes that we may see them. The military spirits that went up from earth to join the military spirits before the throne—Joshua, and Caleb, and Gideon, and David, and Samson, and the hundreds of Christian warriors who on earth fought with fleshly arm, and now having gone up on high are coming down the hills of Heaven ready to fight among the invisibles. Yonder they are—coming, coming. Did you not hear them as they swept by?

GLORIFIED MATHEMATICIANS.

IV. But what are our mathematical friends to do in the next world? They found their joy and their delight in mathematics. There was more poetry for them in Euclid than in John Milton. They were as passionately fond of mathematics as Plato, who wrote over his door: "Let no one enter here who is not acquainted with geometry." What are they doing now? They are busy with figures yet. No place in all the universe like Heaven for figures. Numbers infinite, distances infinite, calculations infinite. The didactic Dr. Dick said he really thought that the redeemed in Heaven spent some of their time with the higher branches of mathematics.

So of our transferred and transported metaphysicians. What they doing now? Studying the human mind, only under better circumstances than they used to study it. They used to study the mind sheathed in the dull human body. Now the spirit unsheathed—now they are studying the sword outside the scabbard. Have you any doubt about what Sir William Hamilton is doing in Heaven, or what Jonathan Edwards is doing in Heaven, or the multitudes on earth who had a passion for metaphysics sanctified by the grace of God? No difficulty in guessing. Metaphysics, glorious metaphysics, everlasting metaphysics.

V. What are our departed Christian friends who are explorers doing now?

EXPLORING YET,

but with lightning locomotion, with vision microscopic and telescopic at the same time. A continent at a glance. A world in a second. A planetary system in a day. Christian John Franklin no more in disabled "Erebus" pushing toward the North Pole, Christian De Long no more trying to free blockaded "Jeannette" from the ice, Christian Livingstone no more amid African malarial trying to make revelation of a dark continent; but all of them in the twinkling of an eye taking in that which was unapproachable. Mont Blanc scaled without Alpenstock. The coral depths of the ocean explored without a diving bell. The mountains unbarred and opened without Sir Humphrey Davy's safety lamp.

VI. What are our departed friends who found their chief joy in study doing now? Studying yet, but instead of a few thousand volumes on a few shelves, all the volumes of the universe open before them—geologic, ornithologic, conchologic, botanic, astronomic, philosophic. No more need of Leyden-jars, or voltaic piles, or electric batteries, standing as they do face to face with the facts of the universe.

What are the historians doing now? Studying history yet, but not the history of a few centuries of our planet only, but the history of the eternities—whole milleniums before Xenophon, or Herodotus, or Moses, or Adam was born. History of one world, history of all worlds.

What are our departed astronomers doing? Studying astronomy yet, but not through the dull lens of earthly observatory, but with one stroke of wing going right out to Jupiter and Mars and Mercury and Saturn and Orion and the Pleiades—overtaking and passing swiftest comet in their flight. Herschel died a Christian. Have you any doubt about what Herschel is doing? Isaac Newton died a Christian. Have you any doubt about what Isaac Newton is doing? Joseph Henry died a Christian. Have you any doubt about what Joseph Henry is doing? They were in discussion, all these astronomers of earth, about what the aurora borealis was, and none of them could guess. They know now; they have been out there to see for themselves.

What are our departed

doing? Following out their own science, following out and following out forever. Since they died they have solved ten thousand questions which once puzzled the earthly laboratory. They stand on the other side of the thin wall of electricity, the wall that seems to divide the physical from the spiritual world, the thin wall of electricity, so thin the wall that ever and anon it seems to be almost broken through—broken through from our side by telephonic and telegraphic apparatus, broken through from the other side by strange influences which men in their ignorance call spiritualistic manifestations. All that matter cleared up. Agassiz standing amid his student explorers down in Brazil coming across some great novelty in the rocks, taking off his hat and saying, "Gentlemen, let us pray; we must have divine illumination; we want wisdom from the Creator to study these rocks; He made them; let us pray"—Agassiz going right on with his studies forever and forever.

But what are the men of the law, who in this world found their chief joy in the legal profession—what are they doing now? Studying law in a universe where everything is controlled by law from flight of humming bird to flight of world—law, not dry and hard and drudging, but righteous and magnificent law, before which man and cherub and seraph and archangel and God Himself bow. The chain of law long enough to wind around the immensities and infinity and eternity. Chain of law. What a place to study law, where all the links of the chain are in the hand!

DEPARTED CHRISTIAN PHYSICIANS.

What are our departed Christian friends who in this world had their joy in the healing art, doing now? Busy at their old business. No sickness in Heaven, but plenty of sickness on earth, plenty of wounds in the different parts of God's dominion to be healed and to be medicated. You cannot understand why that patient got well after all the skilful doctors of New York and Brooklyn had said he must die. Perhaps Abercrombie touched him—Abercrombie, who, after many years' doctoring the bodies and the souls of people in Scotland went up to God in 1844. Perhaps Abercrombie touched him.

I should not wonder if my old friend Dr. John Brown, who died last month in Edinburgh—John Brown, the author of "Rab and His Friends"—John Brown, who was as humble a Christian as he was skilful a physician and world-renowned author—I should not wonder if he had been back again and again to see some of his old patients. Those who had their joy in healing the sickness and the woes of earth, gone up to Heaven, are come forth again for benignant medicament.

VII. But what are our friends who found their chief joy in conversation and in sociality doing now? In brighter conversation there and in grander sociality.

WHAT A PLACE TO VISIT IN, where your next-door neighbors are kings and queens. You yourselves kingly and queenly. If they want to know more particularly about the first Paradise, they have only to go over and ask Adam. If they want to know how the sun and the moon halted, they have only to go over and ask Joshua. If they want to know how the storm pelted Sodom, they have only to go over and ask Lot. If they want to know more about the arrogance of Haman, they have only to go over and ask Mordecai. If they want to know how the Red Sea boiled when it was cloven, they have only to go over and ask Moses. If they want to know the particulars about the Bethlehem advent, they have only to go over and ask the serenading angels who stood that Christmas night in the balconies of crystal. If they want to know more of the particulars of the crucifixion, they have only to go over and ask those who were personal spectators while the mountains crouched and the Heavens got black in the face at the spectacle. If they want to know more about the sufferings of the Scotch covenant-ers, they have only to go over and ask Andrew Melville. If they want to know more about the old time revivals, they have only to go over and ask Whitefield and Wesley and Livingston and Fletcher and Nettleton and Finney. O! what a place to visit in.

If eternity were one minute shorter it would not be long enough for such sociality. Think of our friends who in this world were passionately fond of flowers turned into Paradise! Think of our friends who were very fond of raising superb fruit turned into the orchard where each tree has twelve kinds of fruit at once, and bearing the fruit all the year round!

VIII. What are our departed Christian friends doing in Heaven, those who on earth found their chief joy in the Gospel ministry? They are VISITING THEIR OLD CONGREGATIONS.

Most of those old ministers have got their people around them already. When I get to Heaven—as by the grace of God I am destined to go to that place—I will come and see you all. Yea, I will come to all the people to whom I have administered in the Gospel, and to the millions of souls to whom through the kindness of the printing-press, I am permitted to preach every week in this land and in other lands—letters coming from New Zealand and Australia and uttermost parts of the earth, as well as from nearer nations, telling me of the souls I have helped—I will visit them all. I give them fair notice. Our departed friends of the ministry engaged in that delectable entertainment, undertaking now.

But what are our departed Christian friends who in all were busy, finding their chief joy in doing good—what are they doing now? Going right on with the work. John Howard visiting dungeons; the dead women of Northern and Southern battlefields still abroad looking for the wounded; George Peabody still watching the poor; Thomas Clarkson still looking after the enslaved—all of those who did good on earth busier since death than before.

DEPARTMENTS OF USEFULNESS

THE TOMBSTONE NOT THE TERMINUS

but the starting post. What are our departed Christian friends who found their chief joy in studying God, doing now? Studying God yet. No need of revelation now, for unblanched they are face to face. Now, they can handle the omnipotent thunder bolts just as a child handles the sword of a father come back from victorious battle. They have no sin; no fear consequently. Studying Christ, not through a revelation, save the revelation of the scars, that deep lettering which brings it all up quick enough. Studying the Christ of the Bethlehem caravansary, the Christ of the awful massacre with its hæmorrhage of head and hand and foot and side—the Christ of the shattered mausoleum—Christ the sacrifice, the star, the Son, the man, the God, the God-man, the man-God.

But hark! the bell of the cathedral rings—

THE CATHEDRAL BELL OF HEAVEN.

What is the matter now? There is going to be a great meeting in the temple. Worshippers all coming through the aisle. Make room for the conqueror. Christ standing in the temple. All Heaven gathering around Him. Those who loved the beautiful come to look at the Rose of Sharon. Those who loved music come to listen to His voice. Those who were mathematicians come to count the years of His reign. Those who were explorers come to discover the height and the depth, and the length and the breadth of His love. Those who had the military spirit on earth sanctified, and the military spirit in Heaven, come to look at the Captain of their salvation. The astronomers come to look at the morning star. The men of the law come to look at Him who is the Judge of quick and dead. The men who healed the sick come to look at Him who was wounded for our transgressions.

All different and different forever in many respects, yet all alike in admiration for Christ, in worship for Christ, and all alike in joining in the doxology: "Unto Him who washed us from our sins in His own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God, to Him be glory in the church throughout all ages, world without end!" Amen.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Power for the Pulpit.—Mr. Galloway, in speaking of the power of prayer, said: "We are told that Livingstone before he preached the great sermon at Shotts, when five hundred sinners were converted to Christ, spent the whole previous night in prayer. William Burns, who was perhaps one of the most successful ministers Scotland has ever seen, never entered the pulpit without wrestling for an hour on his knees with the Lord. The saintly Robert Murray McCheyne's experience was the same; he waited at the Throne of Grace before he ascended the pulpit, and there was shed upon him the invincible power of God."

Two Hundred Victims a Day.—Sir William Collins said: "A few years ago, at the time of the Blantyre explosion, when about two hundred men were suddenly swept into eternity, that circumstance awakened the whole country from one end to the other, from the Queen down to the most humble of her subjects. But is it not a terrible thing that every day, from January to December, there are two hundred immortal souls falling into a drunkard's grave and an eternal hell, and the Church is not uttering a sufficiently vigorous warning to those who are in the grasp of strong drink!"

Purging the Roll.—Mr. Jack Related the circumstances that led to his adopting the principle of total abstinence: "I was going home with my minister one night after we had been engaged in 'purging the Church roll'—and a good many names were struck off monthly through intemperance—when we were accosted by a drunken man who had been a matter of prayerful solicitude to us, and producing a whiskey bottle from his pocket, he desired the minister to take a dram. I shall never forget the agonized look on the minister's face, as he stood under the gas lamp. That night when I got home I found the kettle boiling, and the usual preparation made for taking my glass of toddy, but the remembrance of the scene I had just witnessed was too much for me. I said to the servant, 'No, thank you, not to-night.' That sad spectacle below the lamp-post was the means of my becoming an out-and-out teetotaler."

An Atheist's Death-Bed.—A Young Man from India said: "I was brought to the Lord on the 3rd of February last. Up to that time I was an atheist. When I was converted I wrote a letter to a friend informing him of my conversion, and I received one in reply, in which he told me that he, too, had been brought to the knowledge of Christ. In the letter he said, 'My conversion took place at the death-bed of my uncle. It was from him I received my atheistical views, and when I went to his bedside he was apparently in a state of torture, both of body and mind. A few hours before his death he called me to his bedside and said, "Charles, I am a lost soul. I see the misery of spending my days without God. I am condemned forever. Yes, my dear boy, there is a God and there is also a hell. The latter is for me. Take my mother's Bible and seek the truth for yourself. It is lying in my trunk, it has not been opened by me for nine years." He died shortly afterward. I could bear it no longer. I fell on my knees and prayed to the God of my father and mother, and, thank God, I found peace.' I have written to all my friends about my conversion, particularly those to whom I spoke about atheism."

A Reclaimed Drunkard's Story.—At the Circus on April 21st, a well-dressed artisan gave the following testimony: "It gives me great pleasure to stand here to-night and testify what the Lord has done for me. I took to drinking when I first got my journeyman's pay, and I went on from that until I was forty years of age, drinking all I could beg or borrow. I had often joined temperance societies, and slipped, and rejoined, and again slipped. One time I had been drinking for a fortnight. I was in a 'fearful' state. I was going to join another Good Templar's Lodge when a friend met me and said 'Bob, you should go to the Bethany Hall and sign the pledge there; it won't cost you anything.' I said, 'That will suit me, as my wife generally had to pawn something to raise the shilling when I entered a Good Templar's Lodge.' So drunk as I was, I went and signed the pledge. The next night I went to the Gospel Temperance Tent. I was afraid any one should see me and I took a run in. Some nights afterwards I was induced to stay to the after-meeting. A gentleman pointed me out the 53d chapter of Isaiah and the 5th verse, and I received the Lord Jesus there and then, and from that day to this strong drink has never passed my lips. I was once tempted. There was something did not please me at home, and I was standing near a public house, when a Christian woman came up and tapped me on the shoulder, and asked me 'What is amiss?' I told her, and she prayed with me in the street. The craving for drink has never come back. It will be four years next August since I joined the Gospel Temperance Union."

Nearly a Suicide.—The Rev. F. von Schulembach, German Secretary International Committee, Y.M.C.A., New York, said on May 2d: "A year ago I was invited to visit Dubuque, a city on the Mississippi River, and I was requested to give my experience. The next morning the Secretary of the Y.M.C.A. brought to me a gentleman and said he wished to speak to me. We went into a private room, and then he asked, looking earnestly into my face, 'Have you been a drunkard?' 'Yes,' I replied, 'for many years, and was near coming to the gallows.' He said, 'You are my man, then. Last night I was on the brink of jumping into the Mississippi River, when a friend passed me and said, 'Let us go and hear that Dutchman.' I said, 'I have no time to hear anybody. You go, but never mind me.' He said, 'But where are you going?' I said, 'I don't care to say.' However, he made a joke about you and got me to accompany him. Now, I want you to be honest, and tell me it is true that Jesus remembers the prayers of a man?' I said, 'It is true.' 'Now,' he said, 'I will give you my history in a nutshell, and then if you are a liar it costs you your life.' I said, 'You are in earnest—so am I.' Then he told me that he had been a wealthy man three times in his life, but he had spent all his money in strong drink, and ruined not only himself but his family and everybody connected with him. Then he said, 'I can live no more unless there is a rescue from strong drink.' I said, 'We will pray together,' but he said, 'I cannot pray.' I said 'All right, I will pray and then you follow suit,' and I had not been long praying before he began. When we rose from our knees he said, 'My good man, now I know what you know—that Jesus saves me.' That man is now a noble merchant in the Mississippi Valley, and he testifies to-day that Jesus Christ is able to save to the uttermost."

A Fishwife's Prayer.—Mr. Gallocher said in the Glasgow Circus: "When I was in the north, a woman came to the meetings, who had been forbidden by her husband to do so. He was a fisherman, away at sea, and he threatened terrible things to her if she attended the meetings. However, she came, and was led to give herself to Christ. She expected her husband home on the following Saturday, and she knew what a miserable life to expect from him if he became aware that she had been at the meetings. On the morning after her conversion she called where I was staying and inquired, 'Is there not a passage in Scripture which says, "If two of you agree as touching anything"—where is it?' I found the passage, and she asked, 'Have you faith?' I said, 'What for?' 'To believe that before John comes home Jesus will save his soul?' My faith was never put to such a test before. She reminded me that God holds the waters in the hollow of His hand, and said 'God can move his heart there as well as on land.' So we prayed. John came home from the voyage quite sober and serious—a thing that was very unusual with him. She told him his dinner was ready; but he said he was not ready. Then she burst out, 'Thank God; do you know I have got saved since you left?' He opened his eyes with astonishment, and his wife locked the door and said, 'I will tell you how He did it.' Then she rehearsed all that had taken place, and she said, 'John, if you want Him to save you just ask Him to do it.' He got down on his knees, but said he could not pray. She said to him, 'Jesus says "If two of us agree about anything He will do it." If you want to be saved ask Him.' Then the man cried out to God to save him. It turned out that among the fishermen were some men who had recently been converted, and they had been quoting verses of Scripture and singing hymns, which had much impressed him. On the Saturday night the woman came and told me that she had not only now got a Saviour, but converted husband."

THE CHILD-LIKE BELIEVER.

S.S. Lesson for June 18, Mark 9: 30-50. Golden Text, Isa. 57: 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE unclean spirit, having been cast out of the child, as we saw in last week's lesson, Jesus and His disciples "departed thence, and passed through Galilee." This had been the scene of many of His mighty works, but He kept His presence there secret. Something else was occupying Him than the healing of the sick, the casting out of devils or even the preaching of the Gospel.

HE TAUGHT HIS DISCIPLES.

O that all disciples knew their need of teaching! Our work for God will soon become threadbare and superficial, if we do not get the teaching and the testing of Jesus. He taught them the unwelcome lesson of the cross; it was the third time He had brought it before them. They heard the words, that "the Son of man is delivered into the hands of men, and they shall kill Him; and after that He is killed, He shall rise the third day." But no amount of repetition sufficed to prepare them for the trial of their faith which was at hand; "they understood not that saying and were afraid to ask Him." O how often has Jesus sought to impart some lesson to us, and we have been distracted or filled with preconceptions, and thus have heard as though we heard not, and the lesson has been lost, and we have thus driven Him to lay His hand upon our bodies or upon our children or circumstances, that by some means He might gain our ear.

He came to Capernaum; no multitude thronged Him, He had other work to do. Being in the house He turned on His disciples with the question, "What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?" They could not get away from the eye which was reading their souls; they knew that Jesus could detect the very thoughts of men, for they had heard Him answer them. They were confused: "They held their peace, for by the way they had disputed among themselves who should be the greatest." Here was the secret of their want of power with the possessed child. Was it not the most natural thing that each should vie with the other for power and influence? Is not this human nature? Yes, truly, but this is exactly opposed to the divine nature of the Lord Jesus. What made them so ashamed? There was something in the presence of their Lord which put to shame any such thoughts. He who had emptied Himself, and taken upon Him the form of a servant (Phil. 2: 7), was there with them, and every thought of self-exaltation was unbecoming in His presence.

He sat down quietly and called the twelve. He did not get out of patience with them, or turn away with a sigh of despair; He waited to put them right when they were so wrong, and said, "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all and servant of all." There is a greatness in being nothing which marks real superiority, in rejoicing more in the blessing on the labors of others than on one's own. There is an ignoble littleness and meanness about jealousy, strife, envy, and all those passions which the considering of others in relation to ourselves, produces; and nothing gives us such real power over others as to be dead to ourselves. Others always try to reach us and overpower us through our self-love; if that is absent we are impregnable, and thus it is that the least becomes the greatest and the last first. "And He took a child, and set him in the midst of them; and when He had taken him in His arms, He said unto them, Whosoever shall receive one of such children in my name receiveth me: and whosoever shall receive me, receiveth not me, but Him that sent me."

The conscience of one of His disciples was aroused under this

NEW LIGHT :

And John answered Him, saying, Master, we saw thee casting out devils in Thy name, and he followeth not us : and we forbid him, because he followeth not us." John had acted according to his light ; but O how little he knew the depth of selfishness there was in that plea for forbidding a work of power, "He followeth not us." What, then, must the poor possessed ones wait for these disciples, who had been proved incapable in at least one instance, and on whom therefore they could not place full dependence, when a man was at hand who had enough of God's power to cast out devils successfully? Yet so speaks sacerdotalism, speaks sectarianism, so speaks self ; but, blessed be God, so speaks not Jesus. He said, "Forbid him not ; for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me." Here is

THE TRUE TEST

Whether a man or a woman is to be allowed, what is he doing? and in whose name? Is he really winning souls? and is he winning them in the name of Jesus, and in the power of the Holy Ghost? Is she bringing men in body, soul, and spirit into their true and natural relation to their unoffended and justly offended God? Then Jesus says, Forbid him not, forbid her not, "for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is on our part."

O how many men have set themselves above God the Holy Ghost, and while they would not deny a work to be spiritual, and wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, have yet condemned it, because the worker followed not with them. But does the virtue in the miracle or in the name by which it is wrought? The following verse is sufficient answer: "For whosoever shall give you a cup of water to drink in my name, because ye belong to Christ, verily I say unto you, he shall not lose his reward."

THE NAME OF CHRIST SANCTIFIES

The giving of a cup of cold water as much as the working of a miracle, and this little service shall obtain a reward while the same is not said of that which man would hold the greater. The aim of our Lord in all His teaching was to lead His followers to self-emptiness and self-abnegation, to "hide pride from man" (Job 33 : 17). Still speaking with reference to the little child whom He had set in their midst and afterwards taken in His arms, He said, "And whosoever shall offend" (or cause to stumble) "one of these little ones that believe in me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea."

Let us take care how we cause to offend, or offend in the way of, one of Christ's little ones. If they learn a spurious, superficial, theoretical Christianity from seeing it in our lives, we are responsible for doing them an eternal injury. Every inconsistency of an older Christian has the tendency to sow unbelief in the heart of a child, and many a child has a sore struggle between the respect due to parents as such, and the painful conviction that father's and mother's Christianity does not come up to the Bible standard, and that either that standard is unattainable and God's demands are impossibilities, or else there is something wrong about the parents' religion, and confidence in one or the other must give way.

He went on to show how to measure advantages, temporal and eternal ; "If thy hand cause thee to offend (see marg.) cut it off : it is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than, having two hands to go into hell, into the fire which never can be quenched ; where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." The hand is the man's chief member, for work, defence, etc., the hand one, a man becomes helpless ; but better helpless, far than lost. Let a hand go, let an eye go, let a foot go, but let the immortal soul be saved, let God be glorified.

Some say, "Well, I cannot say that my business glorifies God, but I have a large family, they must be fed and cared for, and in point of fact I cannot afford to renounce that which brings me in so large a profit." Brother, does that business cause thee to offend? then Jesus says, "Cut it off and cast it from thee." You may leave the consequences to that God for whose sake you make the sacrifice, He will be responsible. "I would dress plainly, or speak in a meeting, but people would think it so strange they would think I demeaned myself." Let them think it, they will never think so little of you as God calls you to think of yourself. God teach us to live a life which we live at a cost, knowing that it is worth the while.

"For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt." Salt preserves from corruption ; God has promised to make us "partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust" (2 Pet. 1 : 4). God's nature, this is the salt, the preserving element. Christ in us, the life which we now live in the flesh lived by the faith of the Son of God, this is true salt, no sparing of the hand, or eye, or foot, all crucified with Christ. Salt is good ; but if the salt have lost his saltiness, wherewith will ye season it? If the man who possesses Christ turns again to the beggarly elements of the world, places himself again under the dominion of self, and the salt becomes savorless, wherewith will ye season it? God looks for reality, demands reality, child-like simplicity and dependence, and child-like transparency. Self is the principle of corruption, Christ of conservation, therefore, "Have salt in yourselves and have peace one with another."

DR. BOARDMAN'S NEW HOUSE IN LONDON FOR FAITH HEALING.

Dr. Boardman's Letter—An Extraordinary Cure—Joseph Moody's Affliction—His First Visit—He Walks with Assistance—His Complete Cure—Another Application—Opening of Bethshan—Mrs. Baxter's Narrative.

LETTER FROM DR. BOARDMAN.

THE increasing inquiry on every hand with regard to healing through faith is constantly bringing us into contact with cases in which a short visit, or a few letters, will not suffice for removing the difficulties and doubts about it, and securing the full, unreserved faith that accepts healing at the hands of the Great Physician. This has pressed upon us the need of having a house opened as a home for the time for such as require it, where they can, at as little expense for living as may be, have necessary comforts. This has resulted in the opening of such a home under the name of "Bethshan," at Stoke Newington, a London suburb, in which those desiring it will be received to board, at prices varying according to the accommodation required. God has of late given many tokens of His response to our faith.

THE CASE OF JOSEPH MOODY, of Grimsby, Yorkshire, has already been before the public in a partial form, and has excited much interest, especially in his own town. After correspondence, he came up to London, and entered our house while a meeting was in progress, walking on crutches, with his right leg stretched out straight before him, and sat down with his leg resting on top of one of his crutches. When the opportunity was given for requests, he told us that he had been lame as we saw him six years, that he had not put his foot to the floor during the last three years, and could not do it without agonizing pain ; that his case had baffled the surgeons, his great toe had been cut off, but it did no good, and all remedies had failed, and now he had come up to London to see if the prayer of faith would avail.

We prayed for him unitedly in the meeting, and anointed him with oil in the name of the Lord, in obedience to the Word in the Epistle of James 5 : 14, 15, claiming the promise that the prayer of faith should save the sick and the Lord would raise him up, and if he had sinned, his sins should be forgiven him.

HE THEN AROSE, and, without his crutches, walked about the room supported in part by us. At the end of a week he came again, having meanwhile received much light, and again was prayed for and anointed, and again walked with less support and with greater ease many times more round the room and down the steps into the hack. At the end of another week he was again prayed over and anointed, and rose and walked ten, or perhaps twenty, times round the room without support and down to the hack stand—no inconsiderable distance—accompanied, but not supported, by a Christian friend, and the next day returned by train to Grimsby.

Several weeks have since passed, and through interest excited there, two prayer-meetings a week have been held, attended with wonderful blessing ; twelve or more have asked prayer in them for healing, and six have opened correspondence with us on the subject.

A few days since a citizen of Grimsby wrote saying his little son had some time since dislocated his elbow, and it had been set, but the joint was immovable, and asked if we could do anything for it, and said he was led to write by seeing the man who used to go about on crutches, with his leg out before him, walking on his foot in the street without crutches or cane, and upon inquiry was told by him that it came through us. Could we do as much for his son, and what would be the fee? Evidently he was thinking of surgical skill, and did not understand that the healing was not by human power, but by the power of the Lord ; and that His fee now, as of old, is not money from the one healed, but the healed one himself, spirit, soul, and body, freely given up to Him.

THE OPENING OF THE HOME

on Wednesday, May 10th, was a very interesting and impressive scene. Mrs. M. Baxter thus writes of the services :

The Lord Himself was with us, and drew out the hearts of many in believing prayer, that the primitive holiness and power of Christ's church as in Apostolic times might be revived. Addresses were given by Drs. Boardman, McKillian, and others. Some precious testimonies were also given to healing, both spiritual and physical, which had been already experienced at Bethshan and elsewhere.

A sister from Tunbridge Wells said that she had been a sufferer from spine, heart, and other diseases, but had been enabled during a few days residence at Bethshan to accept Jesus as Healer of spirit, soul, and body, and she could say she was healed.

A brother from Dorking said, that just a fortnight ago he arrived at the house, so ill with consumption that the doctors could do no more for him ; he could hardly climb up the steps. But at the tea-table that same evening he felt the power of God in the house. His soul was greatly blest, and in a few days he was well. I may add that this brother, being a carpenter by trade, has been hard at work for us several days past, having recovered his strength. A gentleman, who was acquainted with him at Dorking, rose and testified to the state of extreme illness and weakness in which he had left Dorking a fortnight ago.

A sister from Germany testified to restoration, after seven years' complete powerlessness from severe spinal disease, during which time she could endure neither sound, light, nor movement. God first brought her soul into liberty, gave her consciousness of the power of the cleansing blood of Jesus, and then in one moment healed her body.

A brother named Brown, who had been a confirmed drunkard for twenty-five years, said that he first received hope of salvation from a Christian man accosting him and calling him brother. He came to Jesus for salvation from sin, and God healed him of his past. But the appetite was not overcome, and he went again to God, saying, "Thou has saved my soul, deliver me from this desire for liquor," and God did it. Meeting a Christian man one day while he had a pipe in his own mouth he felt ashamed, went to God and asked deliverance also from this desire, and God healed him of his love of tobacco. But his body had been injured by drinking and smoking ; he suffered from constant hæmorrhage, alternating with rush of blood to the head. Coming to Dr. Boardman's meetings God discovered to him how fully he was still under the power of self, and he felt ashamed and crushed. Then God healed him, and in answer also to prayer delivered him from an irritable temper. This man can say, "Behold, God is my salvation."

CURRENT EVENTS.

In the Senate a Much Needed Bill was Introduced on May 29th by Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, to establish a uniform system of proceedings in cases of bankruptcy. Senator Hoar explained that it was based upon the Lowell bill, but that, while containing many of the provisions of that measure, it reserved all the exemptions under State laws and varied from it in some material particulars. Those who have had opportunities of examining this bill aver that the particulars in which it differs from the Lowell bill are, as the senator said, very material. If the published accounts of it are correct it in no way resembles that bill except in unimportant details. The subject is a very important one, and there is no nation on earth that has yet succeeded in dealing with it in an intelligent manner. It may be hoped that Congress will not allow any bill to pass which will increase the confusion and wrong already existing, but will insist on a fair and impartially just law being enacted.

An Important Amendment to the Bank Charters Extension Bill appears to find favor in the Senate. The Finance Committee, which now has the bill under consideration, proposes to strike out of the bill as sent up by the House the requirement of ninety days' notice for the retirement of national bank circulation, and insert a new provision in lieu of it. The new provision on this subject is to allow deposits of currency for the purpose of releasing security bonds and retiring circulation, to a maximum amount not exceeding $3,000,000 per month, the release of the bonds to be made in all cases in the exact order of the reception of the deposits by the respective banks.

The House of Representatives Awarded the seat in Congress for the second district of South Carolina to Col. E. W. Mackey on Wednesday, May 31st, by a vote of 150 to 3. The contest was one of a very exciting character, and many violent speeches were made during the continuance of the deadlock, which the Speaker failed to control. An angry debate arose on the subject of a new rule which was adopted by the House to prevent obstruction in contested election cases. The obstructive tactics which led to the adoption of the rule were prompted by the opinion held by the Democrats that the Committee on Elections had not thoroughly investigated the charges of fraud on which the claim of Colonel Mackey in the South Carolina case was based. After Colonel Mackey had taken his seat the House proceeded to adjudicate the contested election for the second congressional district of Florida. In this case the seat was held by Mr. Finley by virtue of a certificate alleging that he received a majority of 1152 votes. It was contested by Colonel Bisbee on the ground of fraud and intimidation. This is the fourth time that this particular seat has been contested. After a short debate Colonel Bisbee was seated by a vote of 141 to 9. A third election case was decided on Saturday in which Colonel William M. Lowe was seated for the Eighth Alabama District in place of General Joseph Wheeler. Other cases are still to be adjudicated, but it is stated that they will not be considered at present.

The Trial of the Star Route Gang was Commenced on Friday, June 2d, when Colonel George Bliss, as counsel for the Government, presented the case against the defendants in an exhaustive speech of four and a half hours' duration. Colonel Bliss described the star route service, the functions and powers of the officers of the department, and the ways in which service has been increased and expedited for the benefit of those interested. He then explained the laws and regulations of the department relating to this particular branch of the postal service, and from the tabulated statements and other results of the investigation, presented facts and figures which showed the magnitude of the alleged frauds. Finally, Colonel Bliss took up the routes on which the indictment is based, and showed how much of the pay had gone to the men who did the work, and how much to the nominal contractors in Washington. The selection of the jury has been the subject of some remark, and the fact that Judge Wylie allowed to the government only three challenges while the defence was allowed twenty-eight, occasions apprehension that the trial will not result in a verdict in which the country will have confidence.

Prohibition will be a Prominent Issue in Michigan during the forthcoming Electoral campaign. The temperance party is advocating the repeal of the law taxing saloons, and proposes to substitute for it a prohibitory statute. The moderate party prefer the tax system, and claim that it operates to the discouragement of the traffic. They state that since it has been in operation it has reduced the number of saloons in the State from 6444 to 4000, notwithstanding there has been a large increase in population. The prohibitionists say that though the present system has reduced the number of saloons it has not diminished the consumption of liquor. They say that there is as much whiskey sold in the 4000 saloons to-day as there was in 6444 a few years ago.

The Establishment of Temperance Restaurants in Washington is, it is gratifying to learn, a marked financial success. A visitor to Washington thus writes to a contemporary of his observations: "I was very glad to find a temperance restaurant, called the Temple Café, on Ninth Street, opposite the Patent Office, very well patronized. At meal-hours there was a constant run of customers of both sexes." At this restaurant rooms are to let, which are usually full, and many applicants for lodgings are sent to respectable private houses near by. It has been found necessary to enlarge the accommodations for another year. "The meals at this establishment are excellent, the attendance good, and the prices moderate. There is another temperance restaurant a few doors down, on the same street, with the attractive title of Holly Tree, of which I heard favorable accounts. The great number of female clerks employed in the Patent Office and Post-Office render such establishments in their vicinity specially useful."

Lieutenant Danenhower and his Three Companions of the Jeannette Expedition arrived in New York on Sunday, May 28th, in the Steamer Celtic, of the White Star Line. The lieutenant was welcomed by his parents and brother and several relatives, who went down the bay in a tug to meet the steamer. A reporter who went on board says: Those who had met Danenhower before he sailed on the unfortunate expedition, saw many marks of suffering in his appearance. His figure was thin and wasted, his cheeks were fallen away and covered with a pallor that showed through the bronze of former years. He wore a full beard, and black goggles. His carriage was erect and firm, his demeanor, during the first moments of excitement, perfectly quiet and calm, his voice low and filled with soft modulations. His address to all was frank and cordial. He manifested great concern at the unfavorable impression of Assistant Engineer Melville, which Danenhower's narrative, published a few weeks ago, has induced. He expressed fear lest Engineer Melville should be too hastily criticised and misjudged the delay of forty days before pushing on in sea of the first and second cutters. He said: "About the details of his conduct I do not wish to say anything until he arrives; but this I will add, that great injustice has been done him by the critics that have been passed upon him. It's very easy here to sit in judgment, but it's very unfair. I want to say that I never intended to reflect upon him in the least in my published statement. Respecting the Jeannette, about the seaworthiness of which many false statements have been made, Lieutenant Danenhower said: "The impression that the Jeannette was unseaworthy is all wrong. Her model was described as peculiarly fitted for Arctic exploration, and I don't believe that a better ship or a stronger hull ever entered the Arctic Ocean."

The Great Strike in the Iron Districts Commenced on June 1st. At Pittsburgh, Pa., 25,000 men are out of employment. At Milwaukee, W. 3000 men left work. In Cincinnati 1500, and Chicago 1200 are on strike, and in several towns in Ohio, West Virginia, and Kentucky, smaller detachments are out. It is roughly estimated that the aggregate number of men who will strike, will be locked out, will not be far short of 150,000. Every one will deplore that the contest should have resulted in a strike. Such an issue involves both capitalists and operatives in a loss, and excites feeling between the classes which is not easily allayed. Between the statements of employers on the one hand, and employed on the other, it is difficult to arrive at a sound and just judgment but it does seem that the points involved might have been submitted safely to a board of arbitration with advantage. The best use of trade unions is that they constitute a representative body with which employers can deal, but in this case the union seems to have been unable to avert the conflict. It may be yet that the dispute will be submitted to arbitration. This mode of settlement has been tried with beneficial results in England and other countries.

A Cowardly Attack on a Tract Distributor was made by Roman Catholics in New York on Sunday, May 28th. He is a young Frenchman who came to this city to study for the Roman Catholic priesthood, but was converted, and is now assisting Pastor Seguin in his mission to French Roman Catholics. The tracts were distributed on Sunday, May 21st, and two of them, entitled respectively "My reasons for leaving the Church of Rome," and "Do you need a Friend?" excited the wrath of the priests. An appeal to the people was made in one of the Romanist churches from the altar on the following Sunday, and the priest told them to burn the tracts, adding that "they would know how to treat the impostor." That hint was sufficient, and immediately after the service the young man was found, and set upon by a band of ruffians, men and women, beaten on the head and body and thrown into the gutter in a bleeding state. We are often told that the Church of Rome has abandoned her old methods of riot and violence, but this incident occurred only a few days ago in the metropolis of America.

The Directors of the English Colony at Rugby, Tenn., have made an application that may eventually result in rescuing the colony from complete collapse. They have applied to the Emigration Commissioners of New York for the settlement of two or three hundred families of industrious working people. The commissioners will have no difficulty in supplying the colonists from the enormous influx of immigrants with just the men who are needed, and who will be glad to go there. A responsible journalist says: "The beauty of the site is great, the climate is fine, and the soil is excellent. As the immigrants who will be selected will not be lazy or afraid to work, Rugby may yet be a source of satisfaction to Thomas Hughes, although it will differ from what he hoped for. It must be remembered, however, that Mr. Hughes always said Rugby was not meant exclusively for the English, but that any industrious farmers or mechanics would be welcome."

A Daring Feat was Performed at Scranton, Pa., on May 26th. A man was driving a high-spirited horse at a furious speed, when the bridle-bit broke. The horse thus freed from restraint dashed ahead, and it seemed inevitable that not only the driver, but the people who were in its way, would be killed. The driver, however, saw the danger and promptly devised a way of averting it. Jumping on to the horse's back he leaned forward and grasping the horse by the nostrils he brought it to a dead stop, thus saving his own life as well as those of other people. A situation so desperate could only be dealt with by an expedient equally desperate, and in this case, happily, it was successful. When we see men who have cast aside the restraints of morality and religion, rushing headlong to destruction we can but wish that there were some such way of arresting them before it is too late (Isa. 37 : 29).

Self-Reproach led to a Suicide in Memphis, Tenn., recently. A quiet, peaceable young man residing at Georgetown, Ohio, was attacked some months ago by a band of ruffians armed with knives and pistols. He knew his life was in danger, and drawing his revolver he fired twice, killing one of the desperadoes at each shot. He was tried for the murders and was honorably acquitted, it being clearly proved that he fired in self-defence. But he could not acquit himself, and the consciousness that he had slain two men preyed on his mind. Three or four weeks ago he removed to Memphis, hoping that change of scene might have the effect of obliterating the haunting memory. But it was useless; he grew increasingly miserable, and finally his reason became impaired and in his despair he committed suicide. Those people who are flattering themselves that there is no such thing as endless punishment would do well to consider this event. It shows how insupportable is the torture of an awakened and accusing conscience (Isa. 66 : 24).

A Remarkable Accident Occurred in a Delaware City recently. A young lady sat in her home cleaning a pair of kid gloves with gasoline. She put the gloves on so that they might not lose their shape in the process of cleaning, and the soiled creases might be thoroughly renovated. When they were clean, she kept the gloves, on waiting for them to dry, but the spirit was a long time evaporating and the lady grew impatient. At last she went to the fire and opening the stove door held her hands before the glowing coals. In a moment the evaporating spirit formed a connection between the fire and her hands, and the gloves burned like lighted gas. Her hands and arms were severely burned, and but for the arrival of assistance, in reply to her screams, she would have been burned to death. The incident is a type of some cases of moral disasters. Minds steeped in immoral and sensational literature or corrupted by the conversation of bad companions, when suddenly brought in contact with the fierce fire of temptation find in themselves inflammable material which renders their fall inevitable without divine help (1 Cor. 15 : 33).

A Death-Bed Marriage was Solemnized in New York last week. On Tuesday, May 30th, a group of sorrowing friends surrounded the bed of a lady to witness her marriage to the husband of her choice. More than twenty years ago the lady had accepted this offer of marriage, but insuperable obstacles intervened to prevent the union. The two lovers were separated and for many years never met. About a year ago they came together in New York, and the old love was renewed. No obstacles existed then, and their marriage was arranged to take place on May 30th. Wedding dresses were purchased and all details settled; but, two weeks before the appointed day, the lady caught a severe cold, and pneumonia set in. Under this attack she rapidly sank, and on the morning of the day fixed for the wedding the physicians pronounced her case hopeless. Her mind, however, was dwelling on the union, and it was decided to gratify her wish that it should still take place. Accordingly the clergyman attended, and the marriage ceremony was performed. It was clearly a relief to the bride's mind, but she only lingered a few hours and then died in her husband's arms. There must have been a strange conflict of emotions in the minds of the two people in being united in face of the immediate separation. It has sometimes been given to dying Christians to realize very vividly their relation to Jesus of which marriage, as the Apostle Paul shows (Ephesians 5), is a mystical type; but with the espoused Christian the joy of union is unmingled with the sorrow of dreaded separation. In dying he goes to its fuller realization, for that union is eternal (Hosea 2 : 19, 20).

A Curious Characteristic of Spiders was Described at the last meeting of the Academy of Natural Sciences by Dr. Henry McCook, who has devoted considerable time to the study of the habits of those animals. Dr. McCook has taken care of a brood of young spiders, whose webs form a decoration for his library window. He has observed that the spiders have a remarkable love of light, and that they occupied the lines of the webs on which the beams of his study lamp fell with most effect. He was curious to ascertain whether that fact was only a coincidence, and he therefore moved his lamp so that its light fell on another portion of the web, leaving the part the spiders occupied in the shade. They all quickly moved from the dark to the light part, where they remained until the lamp was again moved, when they went back to the former position. It would be well if the same characteristic could be observed in men in relation to spiritual light, but it often happens that they are opposed to the light, which reveals to them their own depravity, and prefer their natural darkness. (John 3 : 19).

A Boy Refused three Dollars Last Week Offered him as a reward for a deed of heroism. A little girl, seven years old, the daughter of Captain Vickery, of Tonawanda, slipped while stepping on board a yawl in the dock on May 30th and fell into the water. A brave lad, named Alfred Moran, witnessed the accident and instantly jumped into the water and swimming to the spot brought the child safe ashore. When Captain Vickery received his little daughter and heard of the affair, he offered the boy all the money he had with him, which happened to be three dollars. Moran thanked the Captain, but declined accepting the reward, saying simply enough that he "did not do it for money." The refusal was not due to the smallness of the sum offered, but to the consciousness that a service of that nature was not one for which money could be a compensation. We can readily understand the boy's refusal, but when the salvation of the soul is in question there are not a few people who think that God will accept their gifts to charitable purposes and their bequests, as compensation, forgetting that He requires the consecration of themselves as well as their money to His service (Rom. 12 : 1).

A Fatal Advertisement appeared in a New York journal not long ago. The advertiser stated that he desired the acquaintance of an intellectual young lady friend. Two young ladies at a boarding-school, one of whom belonged to a wealthy Cincinnati family, read the advertisement, and it was agreed that one of them should answer it as a joke. It was done and the girl's letter received a prompt reply. Then, still in fun, a regular correspondence was commenced, in which the girl's vanity and other weaknesses were cleverly stimulated. At last a clandestine meeting at a restaurant was arranged, and the fascinating man soon induced the girl to believe herself in love with him. After a few more meetings she was persuaded to consent to a secret marriage, attracted to the scheme chiefly by its romantic aspect. Only a few days after the ceremony she heard that she had been cruelly deceived. The marriage was a fraud, one of the man's dissolute companions having dressed himself up to represent a clergyman. The poor victim of the sham marriage was almost beside herself with shame and grief. Afraid to meet her parents, she fled to a poor-house, where sorrow completed the fatal effects of a disease contracted in her escapade and she died heartbroken. This is only one of many cases constantly occurring in which vanity and a foolish love of romance have led to ruin and death (Prov. 13 : 20).

A FEAST FOR THE UPRIGHT.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"For the Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory: no good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly. O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in Thee."—Psalm 84 : 11, 12.

David's Love for God's House—Without Superstition—Who the Blessing is for—A Word for the Gloomy—For the Humble—For the Weary—For the Poor—For the Foreboding—I. God Provides Blessings in their Fulness—II. Blessings in their Counterpoise—Two Golden Scales—The Sun of Prosperity—Dangers of Sunstroke—Danger in being Conspicuous—III. Blessings in their Order—Light before Salvation—Grace before Glory—IV. Blessings in Preparation and in Maturity—The Infant Class in God's School—Those who Boast of Perfect Sanctification—Where they Mistake—What is Glory?—V. Blessings in Universality—The Comprehensive Clause of the Deed.

IN this Sabbath Psalm the writer rejoices in the house of God. He evidently loves the place of godly assembly, the place where prayer and praise were offered by the united tribes of his people. But brethren, there was no superstition in this love. He loved the house of God because he loved the God of the house. His heart and flesh cried out, not for the altar and the candlestick, but for his God. True, his soul fainted for the courts of the Lord, but the reason was that he cried out for the living God, saying, "When shall I come and appear before God?"

Brethren, it is well to take an interest in the place where you gather for worship. I am always glad when brethren are moved to contribute toward the necessary maintenance of the building and the provision for its cleanliness and propriety. I hate that God should be served in a slovenly way. Even the place where we meet to worship should show some sign of reverence for His name. But still our respect for our place of assembly must never degenerate into a superstitious reverence for the mere structure, as though there were some peculiar sanctity about the spot, and prayer offered there would be more acceptable than elsewhere.

The great object of our desire must be to meet with God Himself. In hearing, the point is to hear the voice of God. In singing, the charm is truly to praise the Most High. In prayer, the main object is to plead with God, and so to speak that our cry comes up before Him, even into His ears. Let us always recollect this, and never rest content with merely going to a set place. Let us reckon that we have failed if we have not met with God. Let us come up hither with strong desire for communion with the Lord in spirit and in truth.

The Psalmist also knew right well that the spiritual law runs through everything; he perceived that not only to acceptable worship, but to all real blessedness. In our text he speaks not of those who visit the temple, but of those who walk uprightly, and trust in God. There is no necessary blessedness in visiting tabernacles and temples. In all assemblies for worship the question is, Who are they that gather? Are their hearts in God's ways? Are their souls thirsting after God? The promises are very rich; but to whom are the promises made? What if they are not made to us? Then, the richer they are the more sorrowful will be our loss of them.

Before I unfold the inexhaustible treasures of this marvellous portion of Scripture, I want to dwell upon this fact, that these things are for a special people. The blessing is to the man that walks uprightly; the true-hearted man, whose course is sincere, righteous, honest, and just. He stands firmly, and he walks erect; he does not bend and lean toward the right or to the left; he has no sinister motives or crooked policies; he is straight as a line, and is not to be swayed by any side winds. It is a very suggestive figure; an upright man is not twisted, or doubled up, or wrongly inclined, or tortuous in his ways and thoughts; he stands on the square, and is distinctly perpendicular. This is the man who will enjoy the blessing from the God of Israel. Sin is a twist, and it is a twist that robs us of the blessing in our text.

I would say to every child of God who can claim the character I have been describing, come you to the text and freely enjoy it. What, does no star of hope shine in your midnight sky? Do clouds surround you and thicken into an impenetrable gloom? Come you to the text, for "the Lord God is a sun." Here is an end to all your darkness. When He appears the night vanishes, and your light has come. Are you in great danger? Do perils surround you?—temptations from the world, assaults of Satan, uprisings of your own corruption? Do you feel as if you moved in the centre of a fierce fight? Is it as much as you can do even to hope that you will escape the fiery dart? Come you to the text, then, and behold how He that keepeth Israel has provided for your safety. Read the blessed words, "The Lord God is a shield." He is a broad shield that shall cover you from head to foot, and quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one. Here is perfect safety for all who take Jehovah to be their helper. "The Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand. The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night. The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil: He shall preserve thy soul."

But peradventure you tell me that of all good, and dry of all joy. Spiritual life is at a very low ebb with you. You can scarce believe, much less reach to full assurance. You scarcely feel enough life to exhibit the tenderness you sigh for, and you cannot reach to the faith you desire. I hear your groaning, but come along with you. Here is the exact word for you: "The Lord will give grace." His rich free favor waits to bless the undeserving, and it is so strong and influential that those who have nothing in themselves may at once receive every precious thing. The God of all grace will give grace.

"Ay," say you, "I have grace, but I find that the gracious life is a very struggling one. I am contending from day to day with my inward corruptions; and, besides, the infirmities of old age have been creeping upon me for years, and I feel them so bitterly that I wish for the wings of a dove that I might fly away and be at rest." Friend, you need not fly far. The text promises you the best possible rest. The Lord who says that He will give grace now tells you that He will give glory. Wait a little longer. The sun which shineth more and more will come to perfect day. "It is better on before." Glory will soon be in your actual possession—much sooner than you think. Between you and heaven there may be but a step. Perhaps ere another sun has risen on the earth you may behold the face "of the King in His beauty in the land that is very far off." At any rate, here is comfort for you; the same Lord who will give grace will also give glory.

Do I hear another brother sighing because he is in the depths of poverty? And is that poverty not only of bread and of water, but a poverty of soul? Do you feel straitened in spirit, and so weak that you can hardly call a promise your own? Yet, dear brother, if you are trusting in the Lord, and He has helped you to walk uprightly, do not hesitate, but come to the text and dip your bucket into this deep and overflowing well, and fill it up to the brim; for what does the text say? "No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly." Here is everything for nothing; everything for you; everything to be had at once according as you shall require it. It is God's word, not mine, God's own sure word which gives you all this blessing. Come, then, quit the dust and the darkness. Mount into brightness, and rejoice in the Lord your God, who bids you shout for joy.

Have you fears about the future? I need not stay to tell you how sweetly the text will lull them all to sleep. Yet suffer me these few sentences. Do you fear the darkness of future trial? The Lord God is your sun. Do you fear dangers which lie before you in some new sphere upon which you are just entering? The Lord will be your shield. Are there difficulties in your way? Will you need great wisdom and strength? God's grace will be sufficient for you, and His strength will be glorified in your weakness. Do you fear failure? Do you dread final apostasy? It shall not be. He who gives you grace will, without fail, give you glory.

Is not this a glorious text? It overpowers me. It is a gem of priceless value. I feel as if I could not place it in a proper setting, but must needs hold it up just as it is, and turn it this way and that, and bid you mark how each facet flashes forth the light of heaven. It is a true Koh-i-noor among the gems of promise. It is so many-sided, so transparent, so brilliant; it belongs to the King of kings and He bids us wear it this day. What shall I hope to say which will be worthy of this supreme Scripture? How can my words set forth fitly this word of the Lord?

I. First, then, out of five particulars, here are, for God's people,

BLESSINGS IN THEIR FULLNESS,

for "the Lord God is a sun."

The blaze of my text almost blinds me. It does not say, "God is light," though that is true, for He is light, and in Him is no darkness at all; but the words are, "The Lord God is a sun." Then, if God is mine, I have not only light, but I have the source of light. I have for my possession the central sun from whom all light comes to this world. We have heard of one who received apples from a friend and was grateful; another was more highly favored, for his friend planted his garden with fruit trees. You and I have fruits from God; and therein we are favored. Ay; but we have the Lord Himself, and thus we have the tree of life, and a perpetual supply most fresh, sweet, and constant.

God is a sun; that is infinity of blessing. No man among us can conceive the measure of the light and heat of the sun. I suppose that calculations have been made by which the heat of the sun has been thought to be estimated; but the calculations must be beyond all ordinary numeration. Concerning the sun, his light, heat, and influence are beyond conception great. His light and heat have been continually streaming forth throughout many ages, and yet they are unabated to this hour; all that has come forth of it is far less than that which still remains. For all practical purposes the light and heat of the sun are infinite; and certainly in God all blessedness is absolutely infinite.

Further, if God be called a sun it is to let us know that we have obtained an immutability of blessedness, for He is "the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." God is not love to-day and hate to-morrow; He saith, "I am God, I change not." There are said to be spots in the sun which diminish the light and heat which we receive; but there are no such spots in God; He shines on with the boundless fullness of His infinite love toward His people in Christ Jesus. Had ever man such a task as I have in trying to speak of what is altogether unspeakable? Who shall fully extol this sun? Stand you out in the open and look the sun full in the face for a little; and when blindness threatens you learn how little we can know of the greater sun, the Sun of righteousness. And if thought fails, what shall speech do? How can it be possible for men to speak aright on such a text as this—"The Lord God is a sun."

II. Now, secondly—and this is a deeply interesting point—this glorious word of God gives us

BLESSINGS IN THEIR COUNTERPOISE.

Let me explain myself. One blessing alone might scarcely be a blessing; for in being too great a blessing it might crush us. We may have too much of a good thing. We want some other boon to balance the single benediction. So notice here, "The Lord God is a sun and shield." "Sun and shield" hang before my eyes like two golden scales. Each one adds value to the other.

When God is a sun to His people it may be He warms them into temporal prosperity with His bright beams, so that their goods increase, their body is in health, their trade succeeds, and their children are spared to them; they are grateful to God, and joyful because of the blessings which He has bestowed upon them. He gives them their heart's desire. He permits them to enjoy the blessing of this life as well as the promise of the life that is to come.

Yet danger lurks herein. You have heard of sunstroke, and prosperous persons are very apt to feel it. Our poor heads cannot bear the full beams of the sun of prosperity; we are smitten down with pride, or carelessness, or worldliness, or some other ill. It is trying for the soul to bask in the unclouded sun. Temporal gains are blessings in themselves, but such is our poor nature that we do not make blessings of them, but we often make idols of them, and then they become curses. What a sweet mercy it is that when God prospers His own children, and is a sun to them, He comes in at the same time and acts as their shield. The same God who is the pillar of fire to the hosts of Israel is also their pillar of cloud.

When everything is bright with us the Lord knows how to sober His children's spirits so that they use, but do not abuse, the things of this life. Even when they most abound with worldly joys He makes His people feel that these are not their heart joy. He shades us from the noxious effect of wealth and content. He maketh rich and addeth no sorrow therewith. He suffers not the sun to smite us by day. Is not this a gracious style of counterpoise?

"The Lord God is a sun and shield," too, when He shines upon us spiritually. Oh, how I do rejoice in the sunny side of spiritual life; I do not always get it; but when I do reach it how happy I am. The Lord has ways and means of letting His people be as happy as they can be; but yet not happier than they ought to be. He gives them grace so that they can be full of assurance, and yet full of holy fear; always rejoicing and yet never presuming; lifted up and yet lying low before the Lord. He gives them a well-mixed experience, and so forms an all-round character. While He is to them a sun producing rapid growth, he is also a shield forbidding their being burned up; He is their great Benefactor, but also their wise Chastener, and in both alike He blesses them.

Look at the text another way. When the sun shines upon a man he is made the more conspicuous by it. Suppose a hostile army to be down in the plain, and a soldier in our ranks is sent upon some errand by his captain. He must pass along the hill-side. The sun shines upon him as he tries to make his way among the rocks and trees. Had it been night he could have moved safely, but now we fear that the enemy will surely pick him off; for the sunshine has made him conspicuous. He will have need to be shielded from the many cruel eyes.

Christian men are made conspicuous by the very fact of their possessing God's grace. Ye are the light of the world, and a light must be seen. A city set on a hill cannot be hid. If God gives you light, He means that light to be seen; and the more light He gives you the more conspicuous you will be. He is your sun, and He shines upon you; you reflect His light, and so become yourself a light; and in doing so you run necessary risks. The more brightly you shine the more will Satan and the world try to quench your light. This, then, is your comfort. The Lord God who is a sun to you will also be a shield to you.

Consider the text yet again, still keeping to this idea of counterpoise. "The Lord God is a sun," and a sun manifests a thing, and this manifestation is not always a joy to us, but we need a defence with it. When the Lord shines in upon the heart of His people they begin to see their sin, their guilt, their fall, their corruption; and then the Lord is a shield, and they are not overcome by the discovery. When they see the danger at the same time they see the defence, and when they see the disease they see the remedy. It is a blessed thing not to see sin except at the same time we see the Saviour. If a man could see all his past sin, and all his present danger, and all the trials of his future life, he might lie down in despair, unless at the same time he was made to perceive that, if the Lord be a sun to reveal our danger, He is also a shield to secure our safety.

III. Very briefly let me submit to you the third idea, namely, for there is a due and meet succession in my text: "The Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory."

The Lord is to us first a sun and then a shield. Remember how David puts it elsewhere—"The Lord is my light and my salvation." Light first, salvation next. He does not save us in the dark, neither does He shield us in the dark. He gives enough sunlight to let us see the danger that we may appreciate the defence. We are not to shut our eyes and so find safety, but we are to see the evil and hide ourselves. Ought we not to be very grateful to God that He so orders our affairs?

Then notice the order of the next two things—grace and glory; not glory first; that could not be. We are not fit for it. Neither in body nor in soul are we fit for glory before grace. We could not possibly receive glory while we are sinners, for a glorified sinner would be a strange sight. Grace must first blot out our sin. To take the rebel from the prison and put him among the children would be dangerous work unless his crime were pardoned and himself reconciled to his king. Grace must come in to change the nature. Grace must change, regenerate, sanctify, or we cannot take our places among the perfected ones. Glory without grace would be mockery.

Blessings in their order. Treasure this up, for it may be a ground of comfort to you. When you get clamoring for number seven, it may, perhaps, calm you a little if you remember that you must first have number six. Plod on step by step. Walk without fainting from one stage to another, and you shall surely come unto the Mount of God.

IV. Fourthly, and again briefly,

BLESSINGS IN PREPARATION

and blessings in maturity. "The Lord will give grace and glory." Grace is glory in the bud; you shall see the rod of Aaron full of blooming graces; but this is not all—glory is grace in ripe fruit; the rod shall bear ripe almonds. The Lord will give you both the dawn and the noon, the Alpha and the Omega, grace and glory.

Let us be very grateful that God does deal in preparatory mercies. If He had provided heaven, and we were to make ourselves fit for it, we should never get there. Ay, and there are many stages of spiritual experience which are not to be attained unless God gives us preliminary educating grace to come at them. The blessing is that all that is needful to reach any gracious attainment is as much promised as the blessing itself.

Is it so, my poor friend, that you cannot this morning lay hold of a promise? You are such a babe in grace. Well, our heavenly Father has an infant class in His school, and a nursery in His house; He will teach you as a child, and give you a child's portion upon which you shall feed, and by which you shall grow. Do not be afraid to ask of God the beginnings of things. Suppose we need to be helped to overcome an irritable temper, let us not be ashamed to own the need, but confess it and pray for help. Do we need grace to bear our little daily trials? Then let us seek everyday grace. "The Lord will give grace and glory."

Brethren, we shall need much training to fit us to sing among the choristers above. Discords and false notes abound, and we must be tutored out of them into a richness of sweet tones and ordered harmonies. If we look into ourselves carefully we shall be shocked with the sight of our own unworthiness to mingle with perfect beings. I do not know how you feel about yourselves, but I grow worse and worse in my own judgment. I hope that I am more sanctified in many respects, but I am also more conscious of my need of fuller sanctification. The fact is that the more light a soul obtains the more it perceives its darkness and lamentations.

The more God makes you holy the more unholy you will judge yourself to be. No man groans so deeply, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" as the man who is nearest to complete deliverance from all evil. The last relics of sin are more horrible to the godly man than the full empire of sin to the newly awakened. Even the very thought of sin, the fitting of it through his soul like a bird across the sky, becomes a calamity to the full-grown saint, and he cries out against it. "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us."

He who glories that he is

must either have lowered the standard of holiness or else he has an overweening conceit of his own excellence. He who does not daily struggle against sin is in darkness and error, and I fear the life of God is not in his soul. In proportion as God has dealt with a man he will cry out for a something yet beyond him, and press forward to that which is before. Oh, how I long to be perfectly rid of sin and of every liability to fall into it. And here is the mercy—that the Lord will give grace. All the grace that is wanted to make you absolutely perfect God will bestow. He will reveal His righteousness from faith to faith, and we shall go from grace to grace. Faith shall lead on to full assurance, hope shall brighten into expectancy, love shall flame into burning zeal, and so we shall rise on eagle's wings from grace to glory. Not only the light of the lamp in its full brilliance, but the wick and the oil and the trimming, the Lord will give.

BLESSINGS IN MATURITY.

Now, here I am altogether beaten. What shall I say of glory? What do I know of it? Matthew Wilks once said, "Man is the glory of the world; the soul is the glory of man; grace is the glory of the soul; and heaven is the glory of grace." This is true; but still what know any of us of glory in its heavenly sense? The Lord will give us nothing less than glory. We deserve shame; he will give us glory. We deserve misery, but He will give us glory. We deserve condemnation, but He will give us glory. We deserve death and hell, but He will give us glory.

What is glory? He that has been in heaven five minutes can tell you better than the sagest divine that lives; and yet he could not tell you. Nay, the angels could not tell you, you could not understand them. What is glory? You must enjoy it to know it. Glory is not merely rest, happiness, wealth, safety; it is honor, victory, immortality, triumph. You know what men call "glory" here below. The people climb to the house-tops and throng the streets, and sound the clariens because a conqueror has returned from war and brings with him huge spoils. See how he stands erect, drawn in his chariot by milk-white steeds. Follow him up the Via Sacra to the Capitol at Rome. Men count him happy because he is surrounded with glory. What is this glory? Smoke, noise, dust, and oblivion, that is all.

But glory as the Lord uses the term, what is it? It is that which surrounds himself, for He is the King of glory. It is that which crowns every attribute, for we read of the glory of His power and the glory of His grace. It is the outcome of all His plans and thoughts and works, for in all things He is glorified. It is that which His dear Son inherits, for He has entered into His glory. We shall be with Him where He is, and shall behold His glory. Yes, it is of this unutterable thing that we shall partake, and that so soon! "Wherefore comfort one another with these words."

V. Now, fifthly and finally,

BLESSINGS IN THEIR UNIVERSALITY.

I have noticed that the lawyers, who will always go into particulars as much as ever they can in their deeds—an excellent method of adding to their fees—yet usually are obliged to sum up with a general clause which includes all they have said and all they ought to have said; they use some sweeping final sentence to comprehend all the mentionable and unmentionable, all that can be recollected and all that might be forgotten. Now, the last part of my text is of that character—"No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly."

Is there some good thing which does not come to us by the Lord's being our sun? We shall not lose on that account. Is there another good thing which cannot be included in God's being our shield? We shall not be deprived of that. Is there some good thing that cannot be comprehended in grace? I cannot imagine what it can be, but if there be such a thing we shall not miss even that. Is there some good thing that is not comprehended even in glory? Well, it does not matter, we shall have it; for here stands the boundless promise—"No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly."

"Well," says some one, "but God has denied me many good things!" Ay, then they would not be good things to you. What has God done to you, then? "He has made me to be sickly in body. He has caused me to be poor, and I am tried in many ways." In this He has fulfilled His word, that no good thing should be withheld from you. I have known a father who boasted that he never laid a hand on his children by way of chastising them. I sometimes wished that he had done so, for his children were a sad plague to all who called at the house. Now, that father was withholding a good thing from his children—a touch of the birch would have been most wholesome. Our heavenly Father never says of any of His elect, "I never laid a hand upon them;" but it is written, "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten."

God had one Son without sin, but He never had a son without chastisement. O thou who art tried and afflicted, the Lord has not withheld from you the blessing of His rod. Accept trials from God, and believe that they are tokens of His love. If there is anything you wish for, and cannot get it from God, then, depend upon it, it would not be a good thing for you. If there is any apparently evil thing which comes to you plenteously, and you would gladly avoid it, depend upon it, it really is a good thing or else the Lord would not have sent it to you.

"Alas," cries one, "there are many good things which I have not received."

WHOSE FAULT IS THAT?

What does the text say? It does not say, "I will force all my children to enjoy every good thing." No, but, "No good thing will He withhold." There are thousands of mercies that we do not enjoy, not because they are withheld, but because we do not take them. We are not straitened in God, but in ourselves. We are empty because we do not accept the fulness of Christ. If we were to be introduced into some of the depots in London that are full of articles most rich and rare, and the owners were to say, "Now take whatever you please," we should help ourselves with a degree of liberality; but when the Lord takes us into the storehouses of His grace we have not faith enough to ask large things.

We might have ten times as much—ten thousand times as much—if we would. Many of God's people are pining on a pittance when they might feast in plenty. They are eating the coarsest meal, and wearing the roughest garment—I mean spiritually—and going about sighing and crying, and doubting and fearing, and all the while there is the bread of heaven on the table for them, and the robe of Christ's righteousness is prepared for them to wear. They might dwell at heaven's gate, but they condemn themselves to the dunghill.

Come, brothers, let us change all this, and if the Lord has said, "No good thing will I withhold," let us put Him to the test. Among other things, let us ask Him to give us more joy in the Lord—a fuller assurance and confidence in Him; and He will give it to us. Do not let us be poor by self-inflicted poverty, but let us rise to the riches which are presented to us in this blessed text. May the Lord feed you upon this choice portion, for Christ's sake. Amen.

DR. TALMAGE ON THE GREAT STRIKES.

THE labor troubles which have issued in the stoppage of the iron works of Pittsburg, Pa., at Milwaukee, Wis., at Detroit, Mich., and other places in all parts of the country, causing thereby serious loss to the capitalists and much privation for the operatives formed the subject of Dr. Talmage's lecture last Friday evening. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is extensively read in all the places now agitated by these conflicts; it therefore publishes Dr. Talmage's advice to capitalists and operatives in the hope that it may tend to the healing of a breach which must have a disastrous effect on both parties to the struggle.

Dr. Talmage said: Unless there is sudden compromise, all kinds of business will feel the shock of the strikes. This causes a great sadness in every intelligent mind, first, because a compromise might have avoided it. The workmen, April 1st, laid down the scale of prices at which they would work. The manufacturers flatly refused the proposition. Both fall back and propose to tire each other out. Perhaps the workmen asked too much. Perhaps the manufacturers were paying too little. If a few mediators had gone out from each side the difference could have been adjusted and the smoke above Pittsburg and Cincinnati would have been as thick to-day as ever. The trouble will be ended by a compromise. Why not end it at the start with a compromise? To every intelligent man, whether capitalist or laborer, this state of things is deplorable. First, whole communities and large classes are made sour, irritable, and wrathful. Maledictions meet each other half way between the manufacturer's office and the home of the laborer. They wish each other ill.

Another sadness is in the fact that

who has a little money in the savings bank or out on bond and mortgage very soon takes it out, or takes it up, to meet present requirements. There must be bread on the table, the children must have shoes, there must be more than the usual appearance of thrift lest there be a prospect of giving in and a necessity of ending the strike. A strike always means suffering. The blow comes hard both upon capital and labor, but heaviest upon labor. In all the labor strikes since the world stood the workman gets the worst of it. Capitalists have money ahead if they never made another dollar in all their lives they could live on a past surplus; but the vast majority of toilers, though they may have laid up something for a rainy day, must not have the rainy day too prolonged.

Another sadness is in the fact that political demagogues take advantage of such things and ferment the disturbance and block up the way of adjustment. We are told that many of the manufacturers are willing to raise the wages and that many of the employes are willing to moderate their demands; but there are those who are ready to frustrate all amicable arrangements. The trouble is that all classes of men have among them those who want to be bosses. The most of the capitalists do not think for themselves; the most of the laborers do not think for themselves. There are boss capitalists and boss laborers who want their way. Indeed, the human family is divided into two classes—those who boss and those who get bossed.

FIVE THOUSAND MILLIONAIRES.

I warrant you I could pick out ten representative capitalists and ten representative workmen who, in one afternoon's session would settle this industrial grief, save millions of dollars and suffering indescribable and illimitable. I cry out in behalf of the imperilled financial interests of the whole country for arbitration. Capital will never help itself by fighting labor, and labor will never get any advantage from combating capital. They go up together or they go down together. Show me any year in the history of the country when capital was prosperous and I will show you a year when labor was prosperous and vice versa. Let either interest be stricken between the eyes and all interests of the land stagger and reel and fall.

But there is no doubt that in all parts of the land capitalists are imposing upon labor. They own the New York Legislature and Pennsylvania Legislature, with a few notable exceptions; they own Congress for the most part; they ride over the necks of the people. We have over five thousand millionaires in this country. It is a bad sign of the times when one man dies worth forty millions and another worth eighty millions, and our richest men are not dead yet. It wants no very great wisdom to see that there are people in this land who have more than their share. I do not wonder that sometimes men lose their equilibrium and strike, although it is unwise to strike, since a strike means less bread, less fuel, less good clothes and less honor.

I expect before labor gets its rights fully established in this country it will have to drive back the encroachments of capital on the one hand, and the outrageous despotism of trades unions on the other.

LET ALL MEN BE FREE.

I suppose that many of our trade unions are wielding a despotism, and that workmen are driven and stopped and imposed upon as much by people of their own craft as by the capitalists. If a man has a mind to stop work let him stop, but he has no right to stop me. If a man prefer to go to the poorhouse let him go, but he has no right to compel me to go along with him. I would have this country so free that when a man wants to quit work he can quit work, and when he wants to go ahead no trades union shall hold him back. Free hammer! Free trowel! Free yardstick! Free spindle! Free furnace! Free dockyard! Free men!

THE CONVERSION OF A BUDDHIST PRIEST.

THE bright island of Ceylon lies set in "dark purple spheres of sea," and fanned by the "spicy breezes" it seems a favored spot indeed. In sharp contrast to the Red Indian's simple creed of a Great Spirit creating and superintending all things, of a happy hunting-ground where the spirits of departed chiefs enjoy very substantial felicity, are the strange refinements of Buddhism. No personal God; no individual future; nay, no individual present; such are some of the strange negations of Buddhism. Meanwhile, do the followers of "the light of Asia" find it a satisfactory light of life? One, at least, did not.

Charles Edward D'Alrew, was educated as a Buddhist priest, but put off his priestly robes that he might support his mother and family as a native doctor. He came in contact with a missionary (Rev. R. T. Dowbiggin), and in the course of conversation they frequently spoke of Christianity. The Buddhist listened, as might be expected, chiefly that he might find arguments against the new system thus obtruded on his notice. He made no objection, however, to reading the Epistle to the Romans in Shinghalese. The 1st chapter astonished him, as holding up to his view sins common among his countrymen, and even, alas! among his Buddhist priests. "The light of Asia" indeed warned its followers that they had evil passions, and must by all means get rid of them if they would enjoy peace, but being only a light shining calmly over the heads of the multitude, it could never reach those who loved darkness.

But the words in the 2d chapter, about that law which is written in the heart, came home to the Buddhist presently. "Do you ever," inquired his friend, "feel anything make you unhappy when you have done what you know to be wrong?" "Yes, I do; it makes me very miserable." "Do you find that you have any power over this which troubles you, that you can drive it away?" "No, I have tried, but I can't drive it away." "Do you think this witness of the heart is a bad thing, or a good one?" "Bad it can't be; it tells me when I do wrong." "Do you think it comes from yourself?" "No, else I would put it away." "Then do you think that what St. Paul says may be true, and it may come from God, whose very existence you deny?" "It may be so," he answered, and quitted the room in deep thought.

At different times he renewed the subject of the law written in the heart. The missionary, very wisely, did not press him on the subject, but left his own convictions to work. At last he exclaimed one day, "Is there any peace to the conscience, and pardon of sin, in the Christian religion? I have been trying and trying according to Buddhism, but there is no pardon and no peace." Then God's messenger delivered God's message. "Emmanuel—God with us," was the substance of that message. The glad tidings reached the listener's soul: "From this day I am a Christian," he said.

His resolve caused bitter grief and anger to his family. They taunted him with interested motives; they wanted to be a paid agent of the society; they said. But no, he continued to earn his bread by his former calling, only preaching the gospel whenever he could. He could appeal to the Christian's strongest testimony—a changed heart and a changed life. Once, he had defrauded the people about his medicines, and practised deceit; now, he had put away all lying, practical or verbal. Once, he had given way to anger whenever he happened to feel it, and had abused and ill-treated his wife; now, as became the "servant of the Lord," he was "slow to wrath." He appealed to his family, above all to his wife. Were not these things so? Was he not a changed man? "Yes," his wife admitted, "that was true; he had acted differently of late. But anything," she added, "was better than your becoming a Christian." She had not yet learned to know the tree by its fruits.

He continued to do all in his power to lead his family to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He had sent, and also to speak to others of the pardon and peace which Buddha knew not of. About four or five years after his conversion he fell into a consumption, and presently it became clear that he was dying. Mr. Dowbiggin came to see and to speak with him of the love of Christ, and the immortal life which death and disease cannot reach. The dying man had no doubt of the pardon he had sought years ago; in him was the promise fulfilled: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on Thee."

The Christian's hope in death seemed to impress those who had been apparently callous to his life. "We are satisfied that he was happy, we believe he is happy now," said his relatives. "I was troubled when he renounced Buddhism and became a Christian. I am not sorry now," said his mother. Thus was Christ glorified in His servant's death, and thus did Charles Edward D'Alrew enter the higher service, which is wrought out in joy and rest, in place of weariness and sorrow.

VISIT OF MISSIONARIES TO A KING.

AT the noon prayer-meeting in Glasgow, on May 9th, Mr. Soltan, who has lately returned from the mission field in China, gave an account of the opening up of the mission in western China. He said: "Brother Stephenson and I resolved to go down to Burmah. We desired to reach a spot near where the English Consul had shortly before been murdered. When we reached Rangoon the people looked upon our enterprise as perfectly impossible, and even some of the missionaries tried to persuade us not to go. We got as far as Mandalay, the capital of Burmah, and the Lord inclined the heart of one of the missionaries who could speak the language to go with us. We went before the King of Burmah (father of the present monarch), the head of the idolatrous system, and who was opposed to any other religion being taught in his dominions. We were admitted into his presence, and taking off our shoes we went before him.

Knowing that it is almost futile to obtain from an Oriental all you ask from him, we asked just three times as much land as we required for our mission station, saying there were three of us, an Englishman, a Scotchman, and an American. He said the people would kill us, but we told him that we had a Gospel that would make bad subjects good subjects, and if he could not govern them we would try and by our preaching make them obedient to him. He was amused at this, but God inclined his heart to grant our request, and notwithstanding his repulsion to any other religion besides his own, he granted us all we asked; and not only that, but he gave us as a gift about £10 each, contained in a bag, and a little silver box each, in which to keep our present.

We planted our mission station, and remained there not a fortnight, as had been foretold by our friends, but for seven years, and now a district is opened to the Gospel which had been closed for hundreds of years."

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

In his Father's House.

PHEBE could not answer Felicity, for the darkness was round her. Until now there had happened no perplexity in her life, which made it difficult to decide upon the right or the wrong. But here was come a coil. The long years had reconciled her to Roland's death, and made the memory of him sacred and sorrowfully sweet, to be brooded over in solitary hours in the silent depths of her loyal heart. But he was alive again, with no right to be alive, having no explanation to give which could reinstate him in his old position. And Felicity! Oh! what a cruel unwomanly wrong Felicity had been guilty of! She could not command her voice to speak again.

"I must go," said Felicity, at last. "I wish I had not invited visitors for to-night."

"I cannot come in this evening," Phebe answered; "but Felix is there, and Canon Pascal is coming. You will do very well without me."

She breathed more freely when Felicity was gone. The dimly-lighted studio, with the canvases she was at work upon, and the pictures she had painted hanging on the walls, and her easels standing as she had left them three or four hours ago, when the early dusk came on, soothed her agitated spirits now she was alone. She moved slowly about, putting everything into its place, and feeling as if her thoughts grew more orderly as she did so. When all was done she opened the outer door stealthily, and peeped out. Yes; he was there, leaning against the railings, and looking up at the brilliantly-lighted windows. Carriages were driving up and setting down Felicity's guests. Phebe's heart cried out against the contrast between the lives of these two. She longed to run out and stand beside him in the darkness and dampness of the November night. But what good could she do? she asked bitterly. She did not dare even to ask him in to sit beside her studio fire. The same roof could not cover him and Felicity, without unspeakable pain to him.

It was late before the house was quiet; and long after midnight when the last light was put out. That was in Phebe's bedroom, and once again she looked out, and saw the motionless figure, looking black amidst the general darkness as if it had never stirred since she had seen it first. But while she was gazing, with quivering lips and tear-dimmed eyes, a policeman came up and spoke to Jean Merle, giving him an authoritative shake, which seemed to arouse him. He moved gently away, closely followed by the policeman, till he passed out of her sight.

There was no sleep for Phebe; she did not want to sleep. All night long her brain was awake and busy; but it found no way out of the coil. Who can make a crooked thing straight? or undo that which has been done?

When Phebe entered Westminster Abbey the next day the morning service was already begun. Upon the bench nearest the door sat a working man, in worn-out clothes, whose gray hair was long and ragged, and whose whole appearance was one of poverty and suffering. She was passing by, when a gleam of recognition in the dark and sunk-in eyes of this poor man arrested her. Could he possibly be Roland Sefton?

The night before she had seen him only in a friendly obscurity, which concealed the ravages time, and sorrow, and labor had effected; but now the daylight, in revealing them, cast a chill shadow of doubt into her heart. It was his voice she had known and acknowledged the night before; but now he was silent, and revealed only by the daylight she felt troubled and distrustful. Such a man she might have met a thousand times without once recalling to her memory the handsome, manly presence, and prosperous bearing of Roland Sefton.

Yet she sat down beside him in answer to that appealing gleam in his eyes, and as his well-known voice joined hers in the responses to the prayers, she acknowledged him again in her heart of hearts. And now all thought of the sacred place, and of the worship she was engaged in, fled from her mind. She was a girl at home again, dwelling in the silent society of her dumb father, with this voice of Roland Sefton's coming to break the stillness from time to time, and to fill it with that sweetest music, the sound of human speech. If he had lost every vestige of resemblance to his former self, his voice only, calling "Phebe" as he had done the evening before, must have betrayed him to her. Not an accent of it had been forgotten.

To Jean Merle, Phebe Marlowe was little altered, save that she had grown from a simple rustic maiden into a cultivated and refined woman. The sweet and gentle face beside him, with the deep peaceful blue of her eyes, and the sensitive mouth so ready to break into a smile, was the same he had seen when, on that terrible evening so many years ago, he had craved her help to escape from his dreaded punishment. "I will help you, even to dying for you and yours," she had said. He remembered vividly how mournfully the girlish fervor of her manner had impressed him. Even now he had no one else to help him; this woman's little hand alone could reach him in the gulf where he lay; only the simple, pitiful wisdom of her faithful heart could find a way for him out of this misery of his into some place of safety and peace. He was willing to follow wherever she might guide him.

"I can see only one duty before us," she said, when the service was over, and they stood together before one of the monuments in the Abbey, "I think Mr. Clifford ought to know."

"What will he do, Phebe?" asked Jean Merle. "God knows if I had only myself to think of I would go into a convict-prison as thankfully as if it was the gate of heaven. It would be as the gate of heaven to me if I could pay the penalty of my crime. But there are Felicity and my children; and the greater shock and shame to them of my conviction now."

"Yet if Mr. Clifford demanded the penalty it must even now be paid," answered Phebe; "but he will not. One reason why he ought to know is that he mourns over you still, day and night, as if he had been the chief cause of your death. He reproaches himself with his implacability both toward you and his son. But even if the old resentment should awaken, it is right you should run the risk. Why need it be known to any one but us two that Felicity knew you were still alive?"

"If we could save her and the children I should be satisfied," said Jean Merle.

"It would kill her to know you were here," answered Phebe, looking round her with a terrified glance, as if she expected to see Felicity; "she is not strong, and a sudden agitation and distress might cause her death instantly. No, she must never know. And I am not afraid of Mr. Clifford; he will forgive you with all his heart; and he will be made glad in his old age. I will go down with you this evening. There is a train at four o'clock, and we shall reach Riversborough at eight. Be at the station to meet me."

"You know," said Jean Merle, "that the lapse of years does not free one from trial and conviction? Mr. Clifford can give me into the hands of the police at once; and to-night may see me lodged in Riversborough jail, as if I had been arrested fourteen years ago. You know this, Phebe?"

"Yes, I know it, but I am not afraid of it," she answered.

She had not the slightest fear of old Mr. Clifford's vindictiveness. As she travelled down to Riversborough, with Jean Merle in a third-class carriage of the same train, her mind was very busy with troubled thoughts. There was an unquiet joy stirring in the secret depths of her heart, but she was too full of anxiety and bewilderment to be altogether aware of it. Though it was not more than twenty-four hours since she had known otherwise, it seemed to her as if she had never believed that Roland Sefton was dead, and it appeared incredible that the report of his death should have received such full acceptance as it had everywhere done.

Yet though he had come back, there could be no welcome for him. To her and to old Mr. Clifford only could this return from the grave contain any gladness. And was she glad? she asked herself, after a long deliberation over the difficulties surrounding this strange reappearance. She had sorrowed for him and comforted his mother in her mourning, and talked of him as one talks fondly of the dead to his children; and all the sacred healing of time had softened the grief she once felt into a tranquil and grateful memory of him, as of the friend she had loved most, and whose care for her had most widely influenced her life. She could not own yet that she was glad.

Old Mr. Clifford was sitting in the wainscoted dining-room, his favorite room, when Phebe opened the door silently, and looked in with a pale and anxious face. His sight was dim, and a blaze of light fell upon the dark, old panels, and the old-fashioned silver tankards and bright brass salvers on the carved sideboard. Two or three of Phebe's sunniest pictures hung against the oaken panels. There was a blazing fire on the hearth, and the old man, with his elbows resting on the arms of his chair, and his hands clasped lightly, was watching the play and dance of the flames as they shot up the chimney.

Some new books lay on a table beside him, but he was not reading. He was sitting there in utter loneliness, with no companionship except that of his own fading memories. Phebe's tenderness for the old was very great; and she paused on the threshold gazing at him pitifully; while Jean Merle, standing in the hall behind her, caught a glimpse of the hearth so crowded with memories for him, but occupied now by one desolate old man, before the door was closed, and he was left without.

"Why, it's little Phebe Marlowe!" cried Mr. Clifford gladly, looking round at the light sound of a footstep, very different from Mrs. Nixey's heavy tread; "my dear child, you can't tell what a pleasure this is to me."

He had risen up, and stood holding both her hands and looking fondly into her face.

"This moment I was thinking of you, my dear," he said. "I was inditing a long letter to you in my head, which these lazy old fingers of mind would have refused to write. Sandon, the bookseller, has been in here, bringing these books; and he told me a queer story enough. He says that in August last a relation of Madame Sefton's was here, in Riversborough; and told him who he was in his shop, where he bought one of Felicity's books. Why didn't Sandon come here at once and tell us then, so that you could have found him out, Phebe? You and Felix and Hilda were here. He was a poor man, and seemed badly off; and I guess he came to inquire after Madame. Sandon says he reminded him of Roland—poor Roland! Why! I'd have given the poor fellow a welcome for the sake of that resemblance; and I was just thinking how Phebe's tender heart would have been touched by even so faint a likeness."

"Yes," she murmured.

"And we could have lifted him up a little; quite a poor man, Sandon says," continued Mr. Clifford; "but sit down, my dear. There is no one in the wide world would be so welcome to me as little Phebe Marlowe, who refused to be my adopted daughter."

He had drawn a chair close beside his own, for he would not loose her hand, but kept it closely grasped by his thin and crooked fingers.

"You have altogether forgiven Roland?" she said tremulously.

"Altogether, my dear," he answered.

"As Christ forgives us, bearing away our sins Himself?" she said.

"As Christ forgave us," he replied, bowing his head solemnly.

"And if it was possible—think it possible," she went on, "that he could come back again, that the grave in Engelberg could give up its dead, he would be welcome to you?"

"If my old friend, Sefton's son, could come back again," he said, "he would be more welcome to me than you are, Phebe. How often do I fancy him sitting yonder in Sefton's chair, watching me with his dear eyes!"

"But suppose he had deceived us all," she continued, "if he had escaped from your anger by another fraud; a worse fraud! If he had managed so as to bury some one else in his name, and go on living under a false one! Could you forgive that?"

"If Roland could come back a repentant man, I would forgive him every sin," answered Mr. Clifford, "and rejoice that I had not driven him to seek death. But what do you mean, Phebe? why do you ask?"

"Because," she answered, speaking almost in a whisper, with her face close to his, "Roland did not die. That man, who was here in August, and called himself Jean Merle, is Roland himself. He saw you, and all of us, and did not dare to make himself known. I can tell you all about it. But, oh! though he has bitterly repented, there is no way for him to atone for his sin. He cannot come back among us, and be Ronald Sefton again."

"Where is he?" asked the old man, trembling.

"He is here; he came with me. I will go and fetch him," she answered.

Mr. Clifford leaned back in his arm-chair, and gazed toward the half-open door. His memory had gone back twenty years, to the last time he had seen Roland Sefton, in the prime of his youth, handsome, erect, and happy, who had made his heart ache as he thought of his own abandoned son, lying buried in a common grave in Paris. The man whom he saw entering slowly and reluctantly into the room behind Phebe, was gray-headed, bent, and abject. This man paused just within the doorway, looking not at him but round the room, with a glance full of grief and remembrance. The eager, questioning eyes of old Mr. Clifford did not arrest his attention, or divert it from the aspect of the old familiar place.

"No, no, Phebe!" exclaimed Mr. Clifford, "he's an impostor, my dear. That's not my old friend's son Roland."

"Would to God I were not!" cried Jean Merle bitterly, "would to God I stood in this room as a stranger! Phebe Marlowe, this is very hard; my punishment is greater than I can bear. All my life comes back to me here. This place, of all other places in the world, brings my sin and folly to remembrance."

He sank down on a chair, and buried his face in his hands, to shut out the hateful sight of the old home. He was inside his Paradise again! and behold, it was a place of torment. There was no room in his thoughts for Mr. Clifford; it was nothing to him that he should be called an impostor. He came to claim nothing, not even his own name. But the avenging memories of the past claimed him, and held him fast bound.

Even last night, when in the chill darkness of the November fog he had watched the house which held Felicity and their children, his pain had been less poignant than now, within these walls, where all his happy life had been passed. He was unconscious of everything but his pain. He could not hear Phebe's voice speaking for him to Mr. Clifford. He saw and felt nothing, until a gentle and trembling hand pressing on his shoulder as feebly and as tenderly as his mother's, made him look up into the gray and agitated face of Mr. Clifford bending over him.

"Roland! Roland!" he said, in a voice broken by sobs, "my old friend's son, forgive me as I forgive you. God be thanked, you have come back again in time for me to see you, and bid you welcome. I bless God with all my heart. It is your own home, Roland, your own home."

With his feeble but eager old hands he drew him to the hearth, and placed him in the chair close beside his own, where Phebe had been sitting, and kept his hand upon his arm, lest he should vanish out of his sight.

"You shall tell me nothing more to-night," he said, "I am old, and this is enough for me. It is enough that to-night you and I have pardoned one another from 'the low depths of our hearts.' Tell me nothing else to-night."

Phebe had slipped away from them to help Mrs. Nixey to prepare a room for Jean Merle. It was the one that had been Roland Sefton's nursery, and the nursery of his children, and it was still occupied by Felix, when he visited his old home. The homely hospitable occupation was a relief to her; but in the room that she had left the two men sat side by side in unbroken silence.

BUT what of

EGYPT'S PREDICTED FUTURE?

For light on this point we must of course turn to the Prophetic Word, and the portion thereof from which we specially derive instruction is the eleventh chapter of the book of Daniel. The authenticity and inspiration of this chapter, from the fifth to the thirty-fifth verse, has, we are aware, been called in question; doubts being entertained even by so cautious and evangelical a writer as Dr. Seiss. But these doubts are not shared either by Dr. Tregelles or Dr. Pusey, and we shall here assume that the whole of this chapter forms an authentic portion of the later prophecies of Daniel. Still it must be admitted that the narrative is extremely intricate, and that a clear and consistent interpretation of it is by no means easy. Nevertheless the main points can, I think, be satisfactorily indicated. They may conveniently be put thus interrogatively:

1. How is the chapter to be divided? Assuming with the best expositors that it is from our present standpoint, partly historical and partly still prophetic, and that between these two portions a break of indefinite duration must be supposed, the question arises, Where does this break occur? On this point three different opinions are entertained.

(a.) By some all the predictions of the chapter, down to the 20th verse, are applied to the Seleucidæ and Ptolemies; the transition to the closing days of this dispensation and the reign of Antichrist being supposed to be made at the commencement of the 21st verse.

(b.) By others the history of Alexander's successors, as here given, including the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, is held to extend to verse 32; the break occurring in verse 33 and verse 36 bringing in the Antichrist.

(c.) Lastly, a third class of expositors, with whom I am disposed to identify myself, are of opinion that from verse 21 to the end is the history of one and the same person, and that verses 5-20 relate to the condition and conflicts of the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt prior to his rise: consequently, that the long break or interval occurs between verses 4 and 5. The grounds upon which this conclusion is based are the following:

First. In the parallel vision in chapter 8, the point at which the division occurs between that which is past to us and that which is still future, manifestly is at the statement of the fourfold division of Alexander's kingdom between his four generals (verse 32); all that follows referring to "the latter time of their kingdom" and the rise of the great persecuting power, which must be future. This exactly corresponds with the 4th verse of the eleventh chapter and with that alone.

Secondly. The language of the 20th verse, "Then shall stand up in his place" (margin), seems to imply immediate succession. The king of the north, whose destruction is recorded in the 19th verse, would seem to be at once succeeded by the "raiser of taxes" spoken of in verse 20; which is inconsistent with the idea of the break finding place at the end of the former verse. The same expression, "in his place shall stand up," occurs, it will be observed, again in the 21st verse.

Thirdly. The planting of "the abomination of desolation" is mentioned in the 31st verse, and as it is unquestionably to this passage that our Lord refers in Matthew 24, when speaking of events yet future, the supposition that the break occurs at the end of verse 33, is put altogether out of court. It remains, therefore, that the line of demarcation must be drawn between verses 4 and 5, and that at no other point in the chapter is a long interval admissible.

2. What power is indicated under the title of the King of the North? There need be no hesitation in answering, Syria. "The two kingdoms of Syria and Egypt," says Dr. Tregelles, "have an importance which the other two parts of Alexander's empire have not, because of their bounding the Holy Land on two sides, and the only communication by land between them passing through that country. The names of 'north' and 'south' appear to be taken from their relative situation with regard to Jerusalem." The titles "king of the north" and "king of the south" are, therefore, to be understood geographically.

But we have another means of identifying the king of the north. From Daniel 8:9, it is clear that when the tenfold division of Cæsar's Roman Empire shall take place, four out of these ten will be the revival of the four kingdoms into which Alexander's vast dominions were divided, viz., Egypt, Greece, Thrace with Bithynia, and Syria, and inasmuch as it is simply impossible to suppose that either the king of Greece or the king who shall rule over the country anciently known as Thrace can be called "the king of the north," both these kingdoms lying rather to the west of Palestine, that title must be applied to the future ruler of Syria.

3. How can we explain the enormous resources predicated of Egypt and Syria as represented by the kings of the south and the north? Already, as is well known, the tie which unites Egypt to Turkey is of the slightest, and when the final collapse of the latter takes place, if not before, that tie will be severed. On the other hand, nothing is more probable than that Armenia should achieve its independence, and with some adjacent territories reconstitute the ancient kingdom of Syria. But even so, though nominally independent, both Egypt and Syria would necessarily be, comparatively speaking, relatively weak and minor states, nor would either of them possess the latent capacity of development into such great powers as the kings of the south and the north are represented as being in the vision we are considering. For both these sovereigns evidently have the command of vast riches, and are able to place mighty armies in the field.

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.

If we suppose, however—what the political circumstances of the present time render all but certain and what the indirect evidence of prophecy tends not a little to confirm—that though both possessing a quasi independence and autonomy, Egypt will actually be under the protectorate of Russia, then the difficulty is at once removed, for it will appear that, in the great game of war described, Egypt and Syria are but, as it were, the pawns moving under cover of more powerful pieces. In this case England and Russia become practically the king of the south and the king of the north respectively, and thus not only is a national, and, if I may so express myself, a living interest infused into the prophecy, but the intervention of "the ships of Chittim" (Cyprus being now a British possession) on behalf of the king of the south is explained (Daniel 11:30).

4. What part is Antichrist to play in relation to the future of Egypt? Assuming that the "vile person" introduced into the vision at the 21st verse is the last personal Antichrist, who is also designated in the following verse "the prince of the covenant," i.e., the prince who makes the covenant with many for one week in chap. 9:27, it appears from the following part of the vision that he will make no less than three separate attacks upon Egypt (Daniel 11:25, 29, and 42). In the first two of these he will be unsuccessful, being defeated on the second occasion by "the ships of Chittim," but the third time he is victorious, for we read in the 42d verse: "He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries; and the land of Egypt shall not escape. But he shall have power over the treasures of gold and of silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt: and the Libyans and Ethiopians shall be at his feet."

Thus, so far as this prophecy of Daniel is concerned, the curtain falls upon Egypt at the very nadir of her strange, eventful history; defeated, impoverished, overthrown, prostrate at the feet of the last Antichrist. But, happily, this is not the last word which inspired prophecy has to say concerning her. Egypt is once more to arise from the dust, take her place among the nations, and to be associated in Millennial blessedness with Israel and Assyria; for in Isaiah 19:22-25 we read, "The Lord shall smite Egypt; He shall smite and heal it: and they shall return even to the Lord, and He shall be entreated of them, and shall heal them. In that day shall there be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians. In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the earth: whom the Lord shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt My people, and Assyria the work of My hands, and Israel Mine inheritance."

EGYPT'S PREDICTED DESTINY AT HAND.

It appears, then, from the statements of Daniel and Isaiah that a great destiny is still in reserve for Egypt, with which it would seem that England is to be in measure associated; and that the time for the evolution of that destiny is even now at hand many converging signs serve to convince us. Ten miles from the ancient city of Thebes, in Egypt, certain Arabs discovered the other day a receptacle of the dead, never before opened from a very remote period. Between thirty and forty well-preserved mummies were found in this subterranean chamber, and when examined by experts they proved to be those of kings, queens, princes, princesses, and hierophants, removed, doubtless, to this place of safety from their splendid tombs or pyramids on the occasion of some foreign invasion.

Among them was the veritable body of the Rameses, who has been identified with the Pharaoh of the Exodus. The inscriptions and cartouches of the case forbade any doubt, the ceremonies, as they were one after the other unrolled, revealed further proofs of identity, and when the last linen bandage was at length removed, there was the face which had fixed its frowning gaze upon Moses, and borne with iron impenitency the ten plagues of Egypt. And almost simultaneously with this and other strange and startling revelations of Egypt's past, the not less strange and startling political movements of our day, viewed in connection with the intimations of the more sure word of prophecy, are tracing out for us with almost stereoscopic distinctness the outlines of Egypt's future. Even now the predicted ten kingdoms are on the very eve of their formation, and then there remains only the revelation of the Lawless One to bring on that last unparalleled crisis, whose deepest darkness is to be irradiated and dispersed by the uprising of the eternal Sun of Righteousness.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Death of General Garibaldi is the most prominent event cabled from Europe during the past week. The distinguished soldier patriot died on Friday evening, June 2d. He had been suffering for some time from bronchitis, which at his advanced age and in his enfeebled condition rendered a fatal termination probable. It was not, however, expected that his death would have occurred so soon. Early on Friday morning the members of his family residing in Genoa and Rome, were summoned to the veteran's home at Caprera, indications being observed that the end of his eventful life was at hand. He grew worse during the day, and at a few minutes after six o'clock in the evening he expired. He was nearly seventy-five years of age, and the best part of that long life had been passed in the service of his country. His name will live in the hearts of his countrymen as a symbol of disinterested patriotism and self-sacrifice, and the whole world admired him for his devotion and his heroism. A portrait of Garibaldi and a sketch of his eventful life will appear in an early number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Party now Engaged in a Search for Lieutenant Chipp of the Jeannette and the crew of his boat was heard from on May 31st. Count Ahlefeldt telegraphed from Irkutsk that Lieutenant Harber and Master Schuetze arrived at Wyitini April 28th. They had a most horrible journey, most of the time travelling on horseback up and down the mountains. The post road along the river was spoiled by water, and the river ice was too weak for any kind of communication. It is calculated that the Lena will be free from drift ice in the beginning of June. They are busy building two boats and a dory on the American system. They have bought a large barge, making it seaworthy, to be used in case the steamer of Sibiriakoff proves useless. The party are all well.

An Effort to Induce the British Government to ask aid from the Executive of the United States in combating the Irish difficulty is being made. Mr. Forwood, late Mayor of Liverpool, in a letter to the London Times says that his experience during the recent Fenian activities convinces him that the outrages in Ireland are perpetrated by the hirelings of a small knot of Fenians in America. To suppress these, he says, American co-operation is indispensable. This can only be secured by showing that the American conspirators are a distinct organization from the Irish nationalists and can be dealt with without interfering with the Irish vote. "England has a right to ask America to strangle Fenianism in the place of its birth."

"The Revolution" is the Title of an Editorial in a leading British journal in which the situation in Ireland is discussed. The writer says: "A considerable section of society is just now suffering from real panic. The scare created by the Phoenix Park assassinations has not yet passed. It has been revived by the suspicion of assassins in England. A dread, the like of which has not within the memory of many been experienced before, has fallen upon the polite world. Cabinet ministers and subordinate members of the government are attended by escorts of police. Dynamite is suspected to lurk in every sack and basket." The article then goes on to speak of the land question in Ireland and England, and the great increase of idle men in London, its explanation being that there is no market for superfluous labor in the agricultural districts while in the towns the supply is deplorably excessive. While the presence of these idle classes in London may be thus accounted for it is obvious that fears are entertained of a rising there, having connection with the Fenian troubles.

The Liberation of the Last of the Irish Suspects is the hope held out by Earl Spencer, the present Governor of Ireland. He said to a deputation of the Corporation of Limerick which waited upon him recently, that he trusted shortly to be able to release every prisoner held under the Coercion act. It is nevertheless evident that this lenity does not proceed from any concession on the part of the Irish leaders nor because there is any diminution in the list of crimes committed under the auspices of the Land League. The attitude of the Irish leaders may be inferred from a speech delivered on May 30th by Mr. Sexton, Member of Parliament for Sligo, who, addressing his constituents, said that the land movement wrung the land act from a reluctant and ignorant legislature. He violently condemned the repression bill. In reference to the alien clauses he expressed doubt whether the relations of England and the United States are so friendly that it is advisable for the former to try and embitter them still further. The Irish party, he said, felt it to be their duty to meet every proposal of the bill with stern and resolute opposition. There were no splits in that party. The triumph of the land movement in a year or two he believed was certain. The repression bill, to which Mr. Sexton is so violently opposed, does not, it must be remembered, press on the law abiding classes, but is devised to render the arrest and conviction of murderers more simple and efficacious.

Reforms are Promised to the Russian People by the Czar. An announcement has been published that "Alexander III., anxious to appease the people, has decided to grant reforms." Two commissions will be constituted to consider the question of central institutions and the share in the administration to be given to the people. A committee to examine local institutions is already in session. General Loris Melikoff, whose liberal opinions have hitherto made him unpopular with the court party, is the supreme head of all the commissions. A manifesto is to be issued informing the people that the Czar, being desirous of giving effect to these reforms at the same time as his coronation takes place, has postponed the latter ceremony for a year. This statement will doubtless be understood by the Russians.

The Persecution of Jews in Russia Continues with severity. Jewish houses are set on fire in some of the smaller towns of Southern Russia almost daily. In Kieff the position of the Jews is reported as desperate. There is some talk of expelling them from the town altogether. But a deputation of Christians has waited upon the governor urging him not to perpetrate such a cruel deed, as, if he does, it will be sure to be followed by numberless bankruptcies. His only reply was, that he must abide by and carry out the instructions he receives from St. Petersburg. A very significant sign of the times is the appearance of a circular urging the Jews to make common cause with the Nihilists. The fact of such an appeal having been made shows the possibility there is of the present circle of revolution being widened by the sufferings inflicted upon the Jews. There is no knowing to what a people maddened by despair may not consent for the purpose of retaliating upon their persecutors.

Mr. John Bright, the Eminent English Statesman, paid a high compliment to America in a speech delivered on June 1st at the opening of the Birmingham Central Library. He dwelt particularly upon the growth of literature in America. He recommended the study of the American poets, especially Whittier, the best gifts of whose genius were on the side of freedom. He also recommended the study of Bancroft's history of the United States as conveying knowledge of some of the most important events of the last century and showing how the colonies grew to what will soon be the greatest nation on the face of the globe.

The Egyptian Difficulty is now Almost as Important a subject of discussion across the Atlantic as the state of Ireland. It became known on Thursday, June 1st, that Araby Bey had rejected the ultimatum presented by England and France, and that he had been reinstated in office by the Khédive. It was fully expected that this step would have led to armed interference by the two European powers, but instead of that an international conference has been proposed and invitations have been despatched to all the European powers to participate in it. The Conference will be held at Constantinople. It is believed that mutual jealousy, combined with pressure from Germany, Austria, and Russia, prevented the occupation of Egypt by English and French troops.

It is predicted by diplomatists that Turkey will be deputed by the Conference to temporarily occupy Egypt and restore order. England and France have hitherto been solicitous that Turkish intervention should be avoided, but intimations have now been given by both governments that they would consent to it in the present emergency. The British Under-Secretary of Foreign Affairs stated in the House of Commons that it had been deemed advisable to consult the other European governments as to the settlement of Egyptian affairs. He said it might be objected that the Conference would cause delay, but the government believed, on the contrary, that it would expedite a settlement. It had been suggested to the Sultan that it was desirable that the Turkish flag be displayed in Egyptian waters and that the Turkish Commissioners be conveyed to Egypt thereunder. Admiral Seymour, he said, had been instructed to take steps to protect the Suez Canal.

A Disastrous Fire has Occurred in Switzerland. The village called the "Raux de St. Veran," in the High Alps, formerly the scene of Felix Neff's labors, has been totally destroyed by fire. Owing to the peculiar construction of the houses, which are partly built of wood, and the lack of water, in less than three hours thirty-two houses, comprising the whole of the village, were burned to the ground. The wretched inhabitants have had to take refuge, for the time being, in the neighboring villages, where they have found a temporary shelter in the stables and outhouses of their neighbors. The total loss is estimated at over $40,000, and nothing was insured. Half the inhabitants are Protestants and descendants of the ancient Vaudois. The pastors appeal, on behalf of their parishioners, to their fellow-Christians to come to their help, in order that they may rebuild their hovels before the return of next winter.

An Important Legal Decision has been Rendered by the law courts of Austria. It is thus described by the secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance: "Without entering into details we may say that the question to be decided was whether parents, who had for conscience sake left the Romish Church, should be allowed to bring up their children according to their own religious convictions or not. The government had decided in the negative, and ordered, under pain of compulsion, that such children were to be taken to the Romish priest for baptism and for instruction. In the case which has just been tried Dr. Joseph Kopp, the lawyer, kindly volunteered his services on behalf of the aggrieved parents. He spoke most energetically and warmly, laying particular stress on the fact that his clients, though but poor and simple persons, were actuated by earnest religious principles. The Supreme Court of Law has now cancelled the government order, and decided that, according to Austrian law, parents have the responsibility and the privilege of determining the religious status of their children. This final verdict is of inestimable value to numerous Protestant Christians throughout the country."

Vol. IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1881, with complete index. Price, $3 including postage: ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE aphorism that "Truth is stranger than Fiction," has had no more conspicuous illustration in modern times than in the life of the noble old patriot who breathed his last two weeks ago. Such a life in its simple grandeur, its heroic daring, and its rare disinterestedness stands without complete parallel in the annals of the world. Were the exploits of Garibaldi set down in the pages of romance, unvarnished though they might be, the author would be charged with gross exaggeration. They would be incredible did we not see in actual existence their practical results. United Italy standing to-day strong in its own strength and growing stronger day by day, where thirty-five years ago a host of petty grand dukes, despotic kings, an alien emperor, and a cruel cowardly pope held sway, is a monument to the genius and courage of the hero of Caprera such as never before was reared to mortal man. The world has cheered and glorified many great generals in ancient and modern times, but it has never had cause for such enthusiastic applause as it had when this simple patriot soldier with a handful of brave men behind him, having driven the tyrants out of Italy and liberated the people, retired to his little rocky island, to lead his quiet unassuming life.

Such a man, however numerous his blunders and his faults, we cannot do otherwise than honor. The unselfish character is all too rare in the world, and it is not meet that he who gave his whole life to hardship, privation, and danger, that others might be free and happy, should lose the world's gratitude as well as the world's titled honors. Let his name live enshrined in the hearts of all lovers of freedom, and let his example prompt us in our lower spheres to be ready for acts of kindness and disinterested service. We, too, though we may not lead armies and emancipate enslaved nations, may give up our rest, our ease, our property, that our fellow-men living under the bondage of Satan, the worst of all tyrants, may be delivered through our great Captain from their chains and enter into that liberty to which truth is the only entrance gate.

Giuseppe Garibaldi was born on July 22d, 1807, at Nice, on the shores of the Mediterranean Sea. His father was a sea captain and his grandfather had been a shipowner, and the boy as he grew up had the restless, roving disposition to which seems the only satisfactory outcome. But his mother was a rigid Roman Catholic, and her great ambition was to see her boy a priest of that Church. She planned his studies with that end in view, hoping that a careful training might eradicate his restlessness and dislike of the quiet paths of life. Giuseppe, however, had little love for theological study and loved better to wander over the mountains enjoying the bracing air, or to plunge into the bay and disport himself in the wild waves. But that he could not have wholly neglected books is evident from the fact that he was an accomplished linguist, and was thoroughly acquainted with the history of his own and other countries.

Even in early boyhood his love of adventure was apparent. When only thirteen years of age, he and one or two companions seized a small boat lying in the bay and set sail for Genoa, a hundred miles away, but the little party did not reach their destination, for Garibaldi's tutor, a priest of his mother's selection, saw them start and went promptly to the Garibaldi home and gave warning. Giuseppe's father started after the boys and brought them back. Not long afterward another instance of his intrepidity occurred, for seeing a companion struggling in the water, the boat in which he was, having been upset in a storm, young Garibaldi swam out after him and brought him safely ashore (see illustration).

By this time his mother was convinced that she must abandon her cherished hopes, and Garibaldi was permitted to indulge his desire for a seafaring life. He made several short voyages, and at last at the age of twenty-one, he found himself second in command on board the brig Cortese, bound for the Black Sea. During this voyage they were overhauled three times by Greek pirates, and when they reached Constantinople, they had been stripped of everything, even the clothes from their backs, and were obliged to land clad in pieces of matting which happened to have been in the hold of the ship, and were overlooked by the pirates. He made several voyages to the East, and on one occasion having been attacked by serious illness in Constantinople, he was nursed and cared for there by an Italian physician, Garibaldi with characteristic independence spending the period of his convalescence as tutor to the physician's sons.

The young sailor was soon at sea again, sailing sometimes under his father and at others under other sea captains, but wherever he went his leisure time was given to the study of his country's history and to dwelling mournfully on her humiliation and degradation. With such a nature as his sorrow was not likely to remain untranslated into action, and Garibaldi ardently longed for the opportunity of doing something toward the deliverance of Italy from her corrupt rulers, clerical and lay. He heard of Mazzini, the great Italian patriot, whose dreams and theories, impracticable though they were, became the seed from which the harvest of Italian unity eventually grew. God in His government of the world has repeatedly used such instrumentality for the deliverance of the peoples. First the visionary with his noble theories, his wild but beautiful dreams finding sympathy in other breasts; then those men moved by the vision do the necessary rough fighting, and afterward the shrewd, cool, calculating diplomatist gathers in the fruit of their labors, and the man who dreamed the dream and was called a fanatic sees his vision fulfilled and his hopes realized.

Mazzini welcomed the daring young sailor and enrolled him in the ranks of those pledged to fight when the time came for the freedom of Italy. Before Mazzini's plot was ripe for execution it was revealed to the government of Piedmont by a traitorous colleague of Mazzini, and the conspirators, among whom was Garibaldi, barely escaped with their lives. Garibaldi escaped to Marseilles, in France, and there for the first time saw his name in print. It was in 1834 and at that time the printed notice of the young enthusiast, who lived to the age of seventy-five and then died calmly in his bed, was that he was condemned to death for conspiring against the government. He managed to get on board an outward bound ship and eventually landed in South America.

His heart was in Italy. His country was divided and broken up. Part of it was ruled by the Pope, a wicked, cruel, corrupt man; part of it by King Bomba of odious memory; part by the Duke of Modena, who strangled the patriots in prison; part by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, a hateful tyrant, and part of it by Charles Albert of Piedmont, the most liberal of them all, but even he had condemned Garibaldi to death. It was a spectacle to rend the heart of a patriot, and the noble spirit of the young exile was oppressed with its horror.

IN SOUTH AMERICA.

Garibaldi did not spend his time in idle sorrow. He found at Rio Janeiro, where he landed, many Italians, exiles like himself from the land of their birth, and under his leadership such funds as they had were clubbed together and a vessel fitted out to trade between Rio Janeiro and Cape Frio. But Garibaldi was not a successful trader. He was too generous, too little disposed to take care of his own interests, and too fearful of causing loss to others. The little enterprise was not a brilliant success, and soon Garibaldi's sympathies were enlisted in a more congenial adventure. Don Gonzales was President of the Republic of Rio Grande, and was doing battle for independence against the great Empire of Brazil. In this unequal war Garibaldi found employment such as he loved, here he gained the training and experience which he afterward turned to so good an account in native land.

Garibaldi's offer of service was received by Gonzales and his colleagues with open arms, a privateer was soon equipped and placed under the command of Garibaldi with a crew of 100 exiles. Garibaldi named his ship "Mazzini" in honor of his Italian leader, and sailed under the flag of Rio Grande to do battle against an emperor. Their first adventure was a success peculiarly gratifying to Garibaldi. They captured a larger than their own belonging to an Austrian merchant resident in Brazil, which, says Garibaldi, "added a great relish to the capture, much as it belonged to one of the bitterest enemies of my country."

The second adventure on board the Mazzini was not nearly so agreeable; in fact, in this our nearly lost his life. While running between Brazilian ships, which accompanied them for an hour, the Mazzini had her decks swept by murderous fire; Garibaldi was shot through the neck, and thought he was dying. While Garibaldi lay thus almost lifeless upon deck, his followers crowded all sail, and sought refuge in the bay of Guleaguay; but, unfortunately, the born flag of Rio Grande was not regarded friendly in this republic, so the crew of the Mazzini and their apparently dying leader were consigned to a prison, where Garibaldi slowly recovered thanks to the skill of a physician who attended him.

Garibaldi was allowed during convalescence to reside in a Spanish family, Andreas by name, for months, and the Government of Guleaguay paid him five francs a day for the use of his ship. The seeming laxity of the guard set over him at the prison convinced Garibaldi that the government intended him to escape; so, not wishing to disappoint them, he set off one dark stormy evening, but was recaptured after wandering for two days in a mountainous country with but little food. A horrible episode in his life was in store for him on his return to Guleaguay about which he could never speak without an untimely shudder, and then which there is no known episode in Garibaldi's career. He was punished by his wrists for the space of two hours, the hope of forcing him by torture to confess was who helped him escape. But he was determined not to denounce any of his followers, and he breathed a word of information concerning the fate of his leader.

We feel sure that this episode in his life would dispute, for the old general bore the mark of his death on one of his wrists, and the cord gnawing into the flesh, and the iron was well known and talked about by all the patriots in those parts, and the arm for many years afterward was quite disabled.

After undergoing this torture, Garibaldi remained for two months in prison, after the last of which time the governor, finding it impossible to get any information out of him, gave him permission to depart, without ever having been brought to trial, and without ever having heard another word of his indignant protest against the ill-treatment of his detention. He then made his way to Rio Grande, where he engaged in the land campaign under Gonzales.

Gonzales, however, deemed Garibaldi's services at sea more important than his land warfare. Garibaldi, who had no desire other than to be where he could be most useful to his country, willingly obeyed. But while he was engaged for the equipment of his vessel an incident occurred which affected all his future life. He engaged in the prosaic occupation of washing his clothes by the river side. When he made acquaintance he found her a true soldier's lass, brave, dauntless, and as intrepid as Garibaldi himself. She willingly accepted the young soldier's offer, and from that time became his inseparable and devoted companion in the battlefield as well as in the camp. Their honeymoon was passed on board Garibaldi's ship, where Anita was always on deck, even in the fiercest naval battles. In the engagements, which was with an imperious of war, which lasted five hours, the Brazilian commander was shot, and the ship retired. "I experienced," says Garibaldi, "during the fight, one of the most cruel emotions of my life."

WHILE ANITA WAS ON DECK, CHEERING OUR MEN, SWORD IN HAND,

a cannon-ball knocked her down, and two men who were close by. I sprang toward her, expecting to take her up dead, but she rose safely. (See illustration.) The men were killed. I then begged she would go below. "Yes, I will go," she answered, "but only to drive up the cowards who have gone down there to hide." And so she did, and they came up looking terribly ashamed at their discovery, and the more so that a woman was behind them."

The year 1847 was a time of NATIONAL UPHEAVAL IN EUROPE, and Garibaldi heard with emotion that the Italian patriots were moving in organization for a struggle. He had done all he could for Rio Grande, he had been made a general, land and money had been voted him, which he had refused, and he had settled down once more as a trader. But the news of a rising in Italy was like a trumpet in the ears of a war horse, and promptly disposing of all he had in America, he and his family and a band of faithful Italian comrades set sail for Italy. He arrived in March, 1848, and found the country in a worse condition than when he had left it twelve years before. The whole Continent of Europe was in a revolutionary ferment. Thrones crumbled and fell, and Poles, Hungarians, and Italians were fighting against the huge nightmare of despotism which oppressed Europe.

Piedmont was oppressed by Austria; Garibaldi raised a force of volunteers, and marched down the valley of the Ticino. King Charles Albert forbade Garibaldi from entering Piedmont, as it would be a violation of the armistice arranged between himself and the Emperor of Austria. Garibaldi cared neither for Emperor nor King. The Austrians had heard of his American exploits and had a wholesome dread of him, and they determined to attack him. Garibaldi was awake to the movement. He selected his position, and lay down for a few hours' rest. Half-an-hour later the cry was raised, "The Austrians are coming!" Garibaldi sprang up, and in ten minutes was ready to meet them. Dividing his force into two columns, he met 1200 disciplined troops with only about 500 irregulars. The fight lasted some time, when Garibaldi cried, "Charge all together!" The answer was a cheer, a rush, a storm of bullets, and the Austrians were driven away.

Arriving subsequently at a small seaport in the Adriatic, Garibaldi learned that the spirit of liberty had reached the City of the Seven Hills. The palace of the Quirinal, where the Pope then was, was besieged by the populace, who demanded the formation of a Democratic Cabinet and a National Convention. The Pope refused, and ordered the Pontifical troops to disperse all public assemblages. But the people were not to be put down, and the Pope was compelled to fly from Rome to Gaeta.

On the 2d of January, 1849, a grand demonstration in honor of the constituent Assembly took place, and banners were placed round the statue of Marcus Aurelius. On the pedestal of this statue the decrees of the public were read to the people—and the Papacy had fallen from its temporal throne. The Pope protested, and appealed for help to Austria and France.

France was at that time a Republic with Louis Napoleon as President. He had fought when a youth for Italian independence and the Italian patriots believed they had his sympathies. But they were deceived. A French force, numbering 3000 men, commanded by General Oudinot, landed at Civita Vecchia, on the 24th of April, 1849, with assurances of amity, and thus secured a peaceful reception for the French troops. When the mask was lifted the French General was in possession of the fortress of Civita Vecchia, and resistance was impossible. The morning of the 29th of April brought intelligence to Rome of the arrival of the French. The Assembly called a permanent sitting and the situation was discussed.

Suddenly, amid the excitement of the city, the cry ran along the streets, "Garibaldi! Vive Garibaldi!" The people marched on before him, a huge, gathering crowd, filling the air with their caps and flying handkerchiefs, shouting, "He is here—he is here!" The enthusiasm was indescribable. The people hailed him as a deliverer.

Early on April 30th General Oudinot advanced from Civita Vecchia to Rome. Garibaldi ordered a charge, and the French were routed. In the middle of May the Neapolitan army advanced toward Rome with the object of establishing the Pope as absolute master in temporality. Garibaldi met it at Palestrina, completely routed it, and returned victorious to Rome on the 24th of May.

On the 3d of June the French renewed their attack upon Rome. For several days the conflict went on. On the 10th of June Garibaldi made a great sortie. He instructed his soldiers to put their white shirts over their uniforms, lest, in the darkness, friends might be mistaken for foes. The French thought they were fighting an army of ghosts. But at length it was necessary to capitulate, and on July 3d, 1849, the French entered Rome, and in their rear came the villain who blasphemously called himself the Vicar of Christ, the Pope of Rome. Garibaldi and his men quitted the city on the previous day.

The leader of this army without a sovereign, a state, or a flag, had taken from the military chest enough money to satisfy the immediate wants of his men, and had sold his watch to provide for his own personal expenditure. From Tivoli to Terni, to Arezzo, to San Marino he marched, closely pursued by the French, and disappointed in all his hopes of provoking a popular rising. With only 1800 old men and boys, hungry and in rags, he reached the little republic among the Apennines, where, the Austrians having come up and threatened San Marino for conniving at his escape, he disbanded his forces and fled by night with Anita and a few followers.

ANITA'S DEATH.

She was about to become a mother and was worn with fatigue, but she refused to be left behind, asked laughingly if he wished to abandon her, and toiled on to the shores of the Adriatic. The fishers of Cesenatico lent them thirteen small boats in which to make for Venice, but a storm came up and nine were captured by the Austrians. The other four reached the mouth of the Po, where Anita, dying, was landed. She lay for some hours in a cornfield, her head on Garibaldi's knee, while Leggiero, his comrade in South America, kept watch near by. The Austrians passed close to the cornfield, and finding nine of Garibaldi's comrades near by hurried away with the prisoners, whom they publicly murdered in a brutal manner.

When the Austrians had gone some peasants came to Garibaldi's aid and helped him to carry Anita to a cottage, where, as he laid her on a bed, she died. The peasant promised to bury her body, and conjured her husband to escape.

Garibaldi tore himself away from the corpse, his heart almost broken with grief, and with his friend Leggiero travelled through Tuscany, often eating and talking with the Austrian scouts, and, at last, on the 7th of September, reached Genoa, where for a while they were detained in honorable captivity. Thence Garibaldi went to Sardinia, whence he was warned by the French, and where he first made the acquaintance of the savage beauty of Caprera; thence to Gibraltar, whence he was warned by the English, and thence to Tangier, from which port, after a stay of a few weeks, he sailed for Liverpool and

NEW YORK.

Thus driven away from every spot where he set his foot, the warm welcome none so well as Americans know how to give to the true nobles of the earth, cheered the heart of the great Italian patriot. He received a perfect ovation in the American metropolis, and a room was placed at his disposal in the City Hall where he might receive his friends. But Garibaldi had crossed the Atlantic grieving over the failure of his hopes, oppressed by the loss of his beloved and faithful wife, and was anxious for nothing so much as retirement from observation. With an Italian exile, Meucci

Salvi, he formed an acquaintance, and the two men commenced business as candle manufacturers.

Our illustration of

on page 380, represents the building still standing where Meucci Salvi, the tenor, and Garibaldi, established a tallow-candle factory in 1851, and the venerable Antonio Meucci still lives, and shows the memorials of Garibaldi's exile and the evidences of a friendship which the lapse of thirty years did not cool; and when in after years Garibaldi was at the height of his fame and thousands of people were huzzing and kissing his hand, it was with delight that he received from America a long thin box in which he found three gigantic candles, one red, one green, and one white, with the following note pinned to them: "A present for General Garibaldi, to make a tricolored illumination with on the Campedoglio when he gets to Rome."

At Clifton Garibaldi lived very quietly, fishing off the dock or hunting in the woods, working, and rarely visiting the city. In 1853 he returned to his old profession and sailed to China, California, and South America. Returning to New York he sailed for Europe in command of a small trading vessel, "the Commonwealth," receiving an enthusiastic welcome, somewhat to his surprise, at Shields, England, and meeting with no unfriendly manifestations from the authorities at Genoa. For some time he continued to follow the sea, commanding a Genoese steamer, and so found himself able to buy a portion of the much-coveted island of Caprera.

Garibaldi settled down

in 1856 to be in readiness for the outbreak of the Italian revolution, to which he saw events were fast tending. In 1859, at the beginning of the war between France and Sardinia on the one hand and Austria on the other, the King of Sardinia, Victor Emmanuel, invited Garibaldi to form a corps and join his forces. Garibaldi accepted the invitation, and summoned to him warriors from all parts of Italy. Separated from the main body of the Sardinian Army, Garibaldi started into Northern Lombardy and encountered several detachments of the Austrian forces and defeated them. All through the war he did good service for the Italian cause.

The subsequent events of Garibaldi's career are too well known to need more than a brief recapitulation here. In 1860, when the revolt broke out in Sicily against the Neapolitan rule, Garibaldi took advantage of it, and got up an expedition on his own account, notwithstanding the efforts of Victor Emmanuel to put a stop to it. Two steamers, the Piemonte and the Lombardo, embarked about a thousand volunteers of all nationalities, who landed in a few days at Marsala, captured Palermo, and by July of the same year rendered Garibaldi actually master of the whole of Sicily. He was proclaimed Dictator, and a few weeks later, notwithstanding all the protests and efforts of the European powers to preserve the Bourbon rule in Naples, he crossed the Straits and entered that city.

His fame had now reached its climax, though the Sicilian and Neapolitan campaigns were probably the least adventurous and dashing of all he had undertaken. The animosity toward the Bourbons of Naples was so great throughout their dominions that their soldiers deserted the ranks, and the population everywhere opened the gates to Garibaldi with tokens of the greatest enthusiasm.

Garibaldi, however, had no desire to make himself ruler of the country he had conquered, and he announced that he should lay the newly liberated provinces at the feet of the King of Piedmont. Five millions of Italians had proclaimed Garibaldi their liberator; the work he had done he did all alone without aid from the King; on the contrary, with opposition from him; yet he entered Naples with the cry of "Long live Italy and King Victor Emmanuel," and a few weeks later the whole south of the peninsula was added to the dominions of the House of Savoy. On the 21st of October a

CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning.
June 11, 1882.

"The eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee."—I. COR. 12 : 21.

What a Strike Means—All interested in an Early Settlement—How it may be Effected—I. By a Complete Canvass of the Whole Subject—Identical Interests—II. Relief through Co-operative Associations—Established on Rum and Tobacco Savings—What Trade Unions may Accomplish—III. Relief through Forecast and Providence—A Young Man's Effort to Buy a Sealskin Sacque—A Church Ruined by the Centennial—Grand and Mean Savings—A Forty Dollar Present—IV. Employers taking their Employees into Confidence—How one Employer Avoided Strikes—V. Religious Rectification—A Word to Capitalists—The Deaths of Two Employers—A Word to Laboring Men—Congratulations—Eternal Holiday.

THIS week I have been in the Carolinas, and I saw the coming on of such a harvest as has never been witnessed in that clime; and whatever story the speculators in fruit and the speculators in grain may tell you, there will be reaped from all parts of this land a mighty crop, and there is going to be plenty to eat and plenty to wear.

At this time of prosperity one hundred and fifty thousand workmen halt in their industries. Some persons suppose that this stopping is of no very great importance, since the toilers have gone out on a picnic and all seems mild and beautiful and pleasant; but every picnic comes to an end, and men are the same in all ages, and hunger and starvation always mean violence. So that the only safety for the people in this land is as soon as possible to have this great labor trouble adjusted and the strike stopped and the mills opened.

The most alarming and appalling part of the whole business is that skilled labor is about to be imported from beyond the sea, and that many of those who have quit their toil have quit those places of occupation forever; and any man who has any sympathies, any man who has any patriotism, any man who has any love either for God or the human race, ought to be praying now; and every man who has any Christian views of between capital and labor ought now utter them in most emphatic style.

You have seen an elaborate piece of machinery with a thousand wheels and a thousand bands and a thousand pulleys all controlled by one great water wheel, the machinery so adjusted that when you jar one part of it you jar all parts of it. Well, human society is a great piece of mechanism controlled by one great and ever-revolving force—the wheel of God's providence. You harm one part of the machinery of society and you harm all parts. All professions interdependent. All trades interdependent. All classes of people interdependent. Capital and Labor interdependent. No such thing as independence.

I come in and I wave the flag of truce between these two contestants, and I say: "The eye cannot say to the hand, 'I have no need of thee.'"

I. That brings me to the first suggestion, and that is, that Labor and Capital are to be brought to a better understanding by

of the whole subject. They will be brought to peace when they find that they are identical in their interests. When one goes down, they all go down. When one rises they all rise. There will be an equilibrium after a while. There never has been an exception to the rule. That which is good for one class of society eventually will be good for all classes of society, and that which is bad for one class of society will eventually and in time be bad for all.

Every speech that Labor makes against Capital postpones the day of permanent prosperity. Every speech that Capital makes against Labor postpones the day of permanent prosperity. When Capital maligns Labor, it is the eye cursing the hand. When Labor maligns Capital, it is the hand cursing the eye. As far as I have observed, the vast majority of capitalists are successful laborers. If the capitalists would draw their glove, you would see the broken finger nail, the scar of an old blister, the stiffened finger joint. The great publishers of the country for the most part were bookbinders, or type-setters, on small pay. The great carriage manufacturers for the most part sandpapered wagon bodies in wheelwright shops. While, on the other hand, in all our large manufacturing establishments you will find men on wages who once employed a hundred or five hundred hands.

The distance between Capital and Labor is not a great gulf over which is swung a Niagara suspension bridge; it is only a step, and the capitalists are crossing over to become laborers, and the laborers are crossing over to become capitalists. Would God they might shake hands while they cross.

II. Again: There is to come relief to the laboring classes of this country through

CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS.

I am not at this moment speaking of trades unions, but of that plan by which laborers put their surplus together and become their own capitalists. Instead of being dependent upon the beck of this capitalist or that capitalist, they manage their own affairs. In England and Wales there are 813 co-operative associations. They have 340,000 members, they have a capital of $18,000,000, or what corresponds to our dollars, and they do a business annually of $63,000,000.

"But," says some one, "haven't these institutions sometimes been a failure?" Yes. Every great movement has been a failure at some time. Application of the steam power a failure, electro-telegraphy a failure, railroading a failure, but now the chief successes of the world.

"But," says some one, "why talk of surplus being put by laborers into co-operative associations when the vast multitude of toilers of this country are struggling for their daily bread, and they have no surplus?" I reply: Put into my hand the money spent by the laboring classes of America for rum and tobacco, and I will establish co-operative associations in all parts of this land, some of them mightier than any financial institutions of the country. We spend in this country over $100,000,000 every year for tobacco. We spend over $1,500,000,000 directly or indirectly for rum. The laboring classes spend their share of this money. Now, suppose the laboring man who has been expending the money in those directions, should just add up how much he has expended during these past few years, and then suppose that that money to be put into a co-operative association, and then suppose he should have all his friends in toil, who had made the same kind of expenditure, do the same thing, and that should be added up and put into a co-operative association. And then take all that money expended for over dress and over style and over living on the part of toiling people in order that they may appear as well as persons who have more income—gather that all up and you could have co-operative associations all over this land.

I am not saying anything now about

TRADES UNIONS.

You want to know what I think of trades unions. I think they are most beneficial in some directions, and they have a specific object, and in this day, when there are vast monopolies—a thousand monopolies concentrating the wealth of the people into the possession of a few men, unless the laboring men of this country and all countries band together they will go under. There is a lawful use of a trade union, but then there is an unlawful use of a trade union. If it means sympathy in time of sickness, if it means finding work for people when they are out of work, if it means the improvement of the financial, the moral or the religious condition of the laboring classes, that is all right. Do not painters band together in an art union? Do not singers band together in Handel and Hadyn Societies? Do not newspaper men band together in Press Clubs? Do not ministers of religion band together in conferences and associations? There is not in all the land a city where clergymen do not come together, many of them once a week, to talk over affairs. For these reasons you should not blame labor guilds.

When they are doing their legitimate work they are most admirable, but when they come around with drum and fife and flag, and drive people off from their toil, from their scaffoldings, from their factories, then they are nihilistic, then they are communistic, then they are barbaric, then they are a curse. If a man wants to stop work let him stop work, but he cannot stop me from work.

So with trades unions, if they have a really legitimate position; but what practical good could ever come from such an association as is to be found in Manchester, England, called the Manchester Bricklayers' Association, which has enacted this law: "Any man found running the work beyond a regular speed shall be fined two shillings and sixpence for the first offence, five shillings for the second offence, ten shillings for the third, and if still persisted in, shall be dealt with as the committee think proper." Talk about tyranny! There is no tyranny on earth like that of such a trades union. Of course, no good man would have any sympathy with such an institution as that.

But now suppose that all the laboring classes banded together for beneficent purposes in co-operative association, under whatever name they put their means together. Suppose they take the money that they waste in rum and tobacco, and use it for the elevation of their families, for the education of their children, for their moral, intellectual, and religious improvement? What a different state of things we would have in this country, and they would have in Great Britain!

Do you not realize the fact that men work better without stimulant? You say, "Will you deny the laboring men this help which they get from strong drink, borne down as they are with many anxieties and exhausting work?" I would deny them nothing that is good for them; I would deny them strong drink, if I had the power, because it is damaging to them. My father said, "I became a temperance man in early life because I found that in the harvest field, while I was naturally weaker than the other men, I could hold out longer than any of them; they took stimulant and I took none."

Everybody knows they cannot endure great fatigue—men who indulge in stimulants. All our young men understand that. When they are preparing for the regatta, or the ball club, or the athletic wrestling, they abstain from strong drink. Now, suppose all this money that is wasted were gathered together and put into co-operative institutions—O! we would have a very different state of things from what we have now.

III. I remark again: the laboring classes of this country are to find great relief when they learn, all of them learn,

FORECAST AND PROVIDENCE.

Vast numbers of them put down their income and they put down their expenses, and if the income meets the expenses that is all that is necessary. I know laboring men who are in a perfect fidget until they have spent their last dollar. They fly around everywhere until they get it spent.

A case came under my observation where a young man was receiving $700 a year, and earned it by very hard work. The marriage day came. The bride had received $500 as an inheritance from her grandfather. She put the $500 in wedding equipment. Then the twain hired two rooms on the third story. Then this man, who had most arduous employment, just as much as he could possibly endure, got evening employment so he could earn a few dollars more, and by this extra evening employment almost extinguished his eyesight. Why did he take this extra evening employment? Was it to lay by something for a rainy day? No. Was it to get a life insurance so that if he should die his wife would not be a pauper? No. It was for the one purpose of getting his wife a $150 sealskin sacque. I am just giving you a fact I know. The sister of this woman, although she was a very poor girl, was not to be eclipsed, and so she went to work day and night, and toiled and toiled and toiled almost into the grave until she got a $150 sealskin sacque! Well, the news went abroad all through the street. Most of the people on that street were laboring, hardworking people, and they were not to be overcome in this way, and they all went to work in the same direction, and practically said, though not literally: "Though the Heavens fall we must have a seal-skin sacque!"

A clergyman in Iowa told me two or three years ago that his church and the entire neighborhood had been ruined by the fact that the people mortgaged their farms in order to go down to the Philadelphia Centennial in 1876. First one family would go, then another family, and finally it was not respectable not to go to the Centennial at Philadelphia, and they mortgaged their farms. The church and the neighborhood ruined in that way.

Now, between such fools and pauperism there is only a very short step. In time of peace, prepare for war. In time of prosperity prepare for adversity. Yet how many there are who drive on the verge of the precipice, and at the least touch of accident or sickness over they go. Ah! my friends, it is not right, it is not honest. He that provideth not for his own, and especially those of his own household, is worse than an infidel. A man has got no right to live in luxury and have all comforts and all brightness around him, taking his family with him at that rate—everything bright and beautiful and luxuriant, until he stumbles against a tombstone and falls in, and they all get down into the poorhouse. That is not common honesty.

I am no advocate of skinflint saving. I abhor it. But I plead for Christian providence. There are some people who are disgusted if they see anything like economy, such as a man might show in turning down the gas in the parlor when he goes out. There are families actually embarrassed if you ring their doorbell before they have the hall lighted. There are people who apologize if you surprise them at the table. Now, it is mean, or it is magnificent to save just according to what you save for. If it is for the miserly hoarding of it, then it is despicable, but if it means better education for your children, if it means more house help for your wife when she is not strong enough to do much work, if it means that the day of your death shall not be a horror beyond all endurance because it is to throw your family into disruption and annihilation and the poorhouse—then it is magnificent, if it is to avoid all that.

Some of these older persons remember very well Abraham Van Nest, of New York, one of its Christian merchants. He was often called mean because he calculated so closely. Why did he calculate closely? That he might have the more to give. There was not a Bible society, or a tract society, or a reformatory institution in the city of New York but he had his hand in it. He denied himself many luxuries that he might give to others the necessities. He has been many years reaping his reward in Heaven; but I shall never forget the day when I, a green country lad, came to his house and spent the evening, and at the close of the evening as I was departing he accompanied me to the door, accompanied me to the steps, came down off of the steps and said, "Here, De Witt, is $40 for books; don't say anything about it." It is mean or it is magnificent to save according as you save for a good or for a bad object.

I know there are many people who have much to say against savings banks and life insurances. I have to tell you that the vast majority of the homesteads of this country have been the result of such institutions, and I have to tell you also that the vast majority of the homesteads of the future for the laboring classes will be the result of such institutions. Savings banks and especially life insurance companies have had great stress of weather during the past few years, but those that have come out and through all the storm have proved themselves invulnerable they are most valuable institutions for the community. It will be a great day for the working classes of England and the United States when the workingman can buy a barrel of flour instead of flour by the small sack, when he can buy a barrel of sugar instead of sugar by the pound, when he can pay cash for coats and hats and shoes rather than to pay an additional amount for the reason that he has to get it all charged.

CONFIDENCE BETWEEN THE PARTIES.

IV. Again I remark: Great relief is to come for the laboring classes of this country by appreciation on the part of employers that they had better take their employes into their confidence. I can see very easily, looking from my standpoint, what is the matter. Employes seeing the employer in seeming prosperity do not know all the straits, all the hardships, all the losses, all the annoyances. They look at him and they think, "Why, he has it easy and we have it hard." They do not know at that very moment the employer is at the last point of desperation to meet his engagements. Now, there is the trouble, my friends.

I know a gentleman very well who has over a thousand hands in his employ. I said to him some years ago when there was great trouble in the labor market, "How are you getting on with your men?" "O!" he said, "I have no trouble." "Why," I said, "haven't you had any strikes?" "O! no," he said, "I never had any trouble." "What plan do you pursue?" He said, "I will tell you. All my men know every year just how matters stand. Every little while I call them together and say, 'Now, boys, last year I made so much—this year I made less; so you see I can't pay you as much as I did last year. Now, I want to know what you think I ought to have as a percentage out of this establishment, and what wages I ought to give you. You know I put all my energy in this business and risked everything, put all my fortune in it and risked everything. What do you really think I ought to have and you ought to have?' By the time we come out of that consultation we are unanimous; there never has been an exception. When we prosper we all prosper together; when we suffer, we all suffer together, and my men would die for me."

Now, let all employers be frank with their employes. Take them into your confidence. Let them know just how matters stand. There is an immense amount of common sense in the world. It is safe always to appeal to it.

V. I remark again: Great relief will come to the laboring classes of this country through the

of it. Labor is honored and rewarded in proportion as a community is Christianized. Why is it that our smallest coin in this country is a penny, while in China it takes a half-dozen pieces of coin, or a dozen, to make one of our pennies in value, so the Chinese carry the cash, as they call it, like a string of beads around the neck? We never want to pay less than a penny for anything in this country. They must pay that which is worth only the sixth part or the twelfth part of a penny. Heathenism and iniquity and infidelity depress everything. The Gospel of Jesus Christ elevates everything. How do I account for this? I account for it on the plainest philosophy. The religion of Jesus Christ is a democratic religion. It tells the employer that he is a brother to all the operatives in his establishment—made by the same God, to lie down in the same dust, and to be saved by the same supreme mercy.

It does not make the slightest difference how much money you have, you cannot buy your way into the kingdom of Heaven. If you have the grace of God in your heart, you will enter Heaven. So you see it is a democratic religion. Saturate our populations with this Gospel and labor will be respectful, labor will be rewarded, labor will be honored, capital will be Christian in all its behavior, and there will be higher tides of thrift set in. Let me say

A WORD TO ALL CAPITALISTS.

Be your own executors. Make investments for eternity. Do not be like some of those capitalists I know who walk around among their employes with a supercilious air, or drive up to the factory in a manner which seems to indicate they are the autocrat of the universe with the sun and the moon in their vest pockets, chiefly anxious when they go among laboring men not to be touched by the greasy or smirched hand and have their broadcloth injured. Be a Christian employer. Remember those who are under your charge are bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh, that Jesus Christ died for them and that they are immortal,

Divide up your estates, or portions of them, for the relief of the world, before you leave it. Do not go out of the world like that man who two or three weeks ago died in New York, leaving in his will $40,000,000, yet giving how much for the church of God? how much for the alleviation of human suffering? He gave some money a little while before he died. That was well; but in all this will of $40,000,000 how much? One million? No. Five hundred thousand? No. One hundred dollars? No. Two cents? No. One cent? No. These great cities groaning in anguish, nations crying out for the bread of everlasting life. A man in a will giving forty millions of dollars and not one cent to God. It is a disgrace to our civilization. Or as illustrated in a letter which I have here—I shall only make reference to it—concerning a man who departed this life during this year leaving between five and eight millions of dollars. Not one dollar was left, this writer says, to comfort the aged workmen and workwomen, not one dollar to elevate and instruct the hundreds of pale children who stifled their childish growth in the heat and clamor of his factory. Is it strange that the curse of the children of toil follow such ingratitude? How well could one of his many millions have been disbursed for the present and the future benefit of those whose hands had woven literally the fabric of the dead man's princely fortune. O! capitalists of the United States, be your own executors. Be a George Peabody, if need be, on a small scale. God has made you a steward—discharge your responsibility.

My word is

in this country. I congratulate you at your brightening prospects. I congratulate you on the fact that you are getting your representatives at Albany, at Harrisburgh, and at Washington. I have only to mention such a man as Henry Wilson, the shoemaker; as Andrew Johnson, the tailor; as Abraham Lincoln, the boatman. This will go on until you will have representatives at all the headquarters, and you will have full justice. Mark that. I congratulate you also at the opportunities for your children. Your children are going to have vast opportunities. They are above men of fortune. I congratulate you that you have to work and that when you are dead your children will have to work.

I congratulate you also on your opportunities of information. Plato paid one thousand three hundred dollars for two books. Jerome ruined himself financially by buying one volume of Origen. What vast opportunities for intelligence for you and your children. A working man goes along by the show window of some great publishing house and he sees a book that costs five dollars. He says, "I wish I could have that information; I wish I could raise five dollars for that costly and beautiful book." A few months pass on and he gets the value of that book for fifty cents in a pamphlet. There never was such a day for the workingmen of America as this day and the day that is coming.

I also congratulate you because your work is only prefatory and introductory. You want the grace of Jesus Christ,

THE CARPENTER OF NAZARETH.

He toiled himself, and He knows how to sympathize with all who toil. Get His grace in your heart and you can sing on the scaffolding amid the storm, in the shop shoving the plane, in the mine plunging the crowbar, on shipboard climbing the ratlines. He will make the drops of sweat on your brow scattering pearls for the eternal coronet. Are you tired, He will rest you. Are you sick, He will give you help. Are you cold, He will wrap you in the mantle of His love.

Who are they before the throne. "Ah!" you say, "their hands were never calloused with toil." Yes, they were. You say, "Their feet were never blistered with the long journey." Yes, they were; but Christ raised them to that high eminence. Who are these? "These are they that came out of great tribulation and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." That for every Christian working man and for every Christian working woman will be the beginning of eternal holiday.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Cabman's Wife.—At one of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Glasgow meetings on May 5th, Mr. Jack stated: "I remember speaking to the wife of an old cabman. He had been reclaimed from a life of drunkenness, and was under deep concern about the salvation of his wife. It was really pitiable to see him, and she long remained in a state of darkness. I met with her one night under the vestibule of our church, and wished to speak to her about these matters. She pleaded the claims of her family, and particularly of her blind daughter, and said she must hasten home. I placed my hand on her shoulder and said, 'My good woman, has it never struck you that you are as blind as that girl?' In the course of time she was brought to know the Lord, and now she is a happy Christian woman."

"As Bad as Any one in Glasgow."—A Middle-aged man said: "On the 28th of March, in Dr. Aikman's church, I was born again. I had a great struggle. I was a good bit of a sceptic, and much given to strong drink; in fact I was about as bad as any one in Glasgow. Since that time I have had no desire for beer or whiskey, and I can now pass the publican's shop as easily as an iron-monger's. I have had peace and happiness ever since. Mr. Moody: 'Have you erected a family altar?' Man: 'Yes, sir; and we now take in the Christian Herald, it was never in my house before that.'"

"The Wild Man of the Woods."—A Working man said: "I wish to acknowledge Christ's saving power in my own case. It is not a fortnight since I was about the biggest drunkard there was in Glasgow. I have liked the drink since I was fifteen years of age. Mr. Muir saw me in the street and induced me to go to the meeting in the Circus. I was then drunk, and, as Mr. Simpson put it, I was 'The wild man of the woods.' I sat in the pit, but I did not like to sit among respectably-dressed people, and a man said he would find me a nice quiet place in the gallery where no one would see me; but he was mistaken, for God saw me, and before I left I found peace in Christ, and now I am on my way rejoicing."

Christ Among the Swedes, Great Revival in Sweden.—Mr. Franson (a Swede) spoke of a visit of a number of Swedish emigrants to the Circus, where they were addressed for about fifteen minutes in their own language. They then had an inquiry meeting in the stables, and about forty of them were born again. Mr. Franson also spoke of a recent remarkable awakening that had taken place in Sweden. During the past six or seven months from 75,000 to 100,000 people there had given themselves to the Lord. God's people had received a quickening, and the awakening was largely due to formalism, coldness, and stiffness being driven from the church. There had also been a wonderful work among the Sunday-school children."

A Colonel Led to Christ by Miss Daniell.—Colonel Anderson said: "I thank God that I had the privilege to meet with that honored servant of His, Miss Daniell, in Plymouth, four years ago. Until I was 41 years of age, the devil never had a better servant than I was. I was the prime mover in all kinds of sports and gayeties wherever the British flag floated—horse-racing, card-playing, and the service of the devil generally. On the 17th of May, 1878, the Lord met me, and I have had nothing but peace and happiness ever since. Miss Daniell wrote on a piece of paper, 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out,' and said, 'Now you sign that to-night, or make God a liar.' That drove me before the Lord, and from that hour I have known the inexpressible pleasure of His service."

A Grocer's Assistant said, at the Christian Institute on May 8th: "I bless God that I am saved through faith in Christ. I was first roused by a question put to me in my own bible-class by one of the boys. In January, February, and March last, I was an assistant in a grocer's shop where they sold spirits, and I was disgusted by professing Christians coming in and asking for a bottle of this and a bottle of that, and then having it made up like a parcel, that people might not know what they had bought. I was troubled about this, and spent all night in prayer, till about half-past four o'clock in the morning, when I felt I should have to give up my situation. I told my master that I could no longer serve him and serve God. He offered to give me a larger salary, but I felt it to be my duty to leave. When there were so many persons applying for the situation, he said I should make one more of the number out of work. 'No,' I said, 'My Father has a situation for me in the hollow of His hand.' God very soon gave me a situation. It was three or four times better than the one I had given up, and that without seeking. The Lord never forgets those who honor Him."

A Notorious Infidel Saved.—Rev. Mr. Howie (Govan) said at the prayer-meeting at Glasgow on May 10: "We have many cheering cases. Let me mention one. It relates to a man who last night found Christ in his own home. He had been a notorious infidel, sitting up till four or five o'clock in the morning reading infidel books. He was a member of the infidel association and occasionally spoke at the meetings. A member of my congregation met with him and occasionally spoke a few kindly words to him. He got interested, and one Wednesday night he started to come to our meeting but did not find the place. Strange to say on the Saturday afternoon following, he was in the railway collision that occurred at Govan, and he was so severely injured that he lay on a sick bed for nine weeks. During this time he got anxious about his soul. Last night one of my elders spoke to him for about an hour, and at the end of that time he got light. The elder asked me to go and see him. I did so between 10 and 11 o'clock. The man was full of joy, he had quite different thoughts about God and his fellow-men. He had opened his heart to receive the Lord Jesus."

Death in the Young Ladies' Academy.—Speaking in the Paisley Road Free Church, Dr. Moxey pointed to the many uncertainties of life, and enjoined on his hearers the necessity of immediate decision for Christ. He illustrated his remarks by saying, "About a year ago I had the privilege of addressing the members of a young ladies' school, in Edinburgh, and the whole of them, twenty-six in number, were brought to the Lord. A month afterward one of them died, called suddenly before her God. But before departing she gave a triumphant testimony. Asked if she were afraid to die, she said, smiling while, 'No; for I am going to be with Jesus.' A short time ago I again addressed the pupils of the academy. There were amid them several new faces, and among others I noticed the sister of the young lady I have referred to. She was still clad in the sombre garments of mourning. I mentioned the incident of her sister's death, and I remember asking 'Who will be next?' You may say it will be me, because I am so much older than you are. But who can tell? A fortnight later, the young girl who had so comparatively recently lost her sister, was called hence. Death is very near to all of us."

The Merchant's Bond.—At the Circus Meeting on May 5th, Mr. Campbell, a local merchant, said: "A short time ago I was very sick, over-work and keeping late hours had brought on a state of extreme nervous prostration. I went to one doctor, who said, 'What do you drink? You must take sherry.' Some time afterward I consulted another medical man, who said, 'Oh, you must not drink sherry, whiskey is what you must take.' and a third doctor I consulted said, 'No, don't take whiskey, you must drink claret.' I was extremely anxious about a young man employed by us who was giving way to habits of intemperance, and I said, 'Look here, so and-so, I am willing to enter into a bond with you. If you'll sign the pledge for a year I'll do the same.' We entered into such an engagement, and though the young man did not keep his word, I did. As soon as I gave up the drink I began to get better, and when the year was out I was a strong man once more. Then came the question of putting the drink off my table altogether. I said to myself at first, 'Wine may help me; I can get my young friends to come to dinner, and then can take them to an evangelistic meeting.' But I found that some of them got rather too much wine, and the evangelistic meeting did not do them much good, so I determined to take up the cross for Jesus Christ, by banishing the drink altogether, and I have never repented my decision."

THE BACKGROUND OF THE APOCALYPSE.

By Rev. William Maude.

The Apocalypse Unparalleled in Literature—Its Sublime Imagery—The Four Horses and Their Riders—Celestial Phenomena—The New Jerusalem—What is the Permanent Background?—The Vision of the Throne, the Elders, and the Living Creatures—The Seat of the Most High—The Altar before the Throne—Grand Transformation Scene—Awful Silence in Heaven—The "New Song" of the Redeemed.

THE great drama of the Apocalyptic judgments, even when considered merely as a series of symbolic visions seen by the inspired seer of Patmos, while rapt "in spirit on the Lord's-day," stands alone in the range of universal literature for the sublimity of its imagery, as well as for the awe-inspiring character of its action. That imagery is borrowed alike from the heavens above, from the earth beneath, and even from the dark regions under the earth. Heaven, earth, and hell are laid under contribution for figures by which to set forth the greatness of the Divine purposes, the grievousness of the Divine judgments, and the glory of the Divine issue. And yet this imagery is never either unworthy or incongruous; it never sinks below the dignity of the solemn theme; it never, with the one possible exception of the wild beast,* having seven heads and ten horns, falls to the level of the monstrous or the grotesque.

GRANDEUR AND IMPRESSIVENESS.

On the other hand, where, unless it be in the pages of the older Hebrew prophets, shall we match the grandeur and impressiveness of many of the vivid word-pictures which this book presents? Take, for example, the going forth of the four horses, as the first four seals are broken, in their startling contrast of colors and riders—from the splendid and spotless charger of the great warrior who goes forth "conquering and to conquer," to the ghastly creature of corpse-like hue bestrode by the grim form of death; the chosen champions of heaven, as it were, entering the lists and taking their place to play their awful part in the coming tournament of God. What a terrific scene, again, is that presented to us under the sixth seal, when, as amid the convulsive throes of expiring nature, the sun becomes black as sackcloth of hair, the moon becomes as blood, and the stars are rained down to the earth, like the unripe fruit of the fig-tree shaken by a mighty wind, while the very heavens are rent asunder like a burning scroll, and every mountain and island is moved out of its place!

Lastly—for we may not linger in this wondrous picture gallery—we have in the crowning vision of the New Jerusalem descending from heaven, "as a bride adorned for her husband," with its walls of jasper, its gates of pearl, its streets of gold, and its foundations of precious stones, a complex symbolism, a revelation of glory and of joy, which has touched the heart and fired the imagination of humanity as no other revelation ever did. Whether we regard it as a literal reality or as a wondrous piece of symbolism, it stands alone in its altitude of peerless beauty, as a realization of

THE SAINTS' EVERLASTING HOME.

Its glory has shone through the tears and assuaged the sorrows of saints and martyrs, the persecuted and afflicted, in all ages of the Church's history. The pious monk has embalmed his conception of it in a hymn, the long-drawn melody of which is the echo of its own inspiration; the prisoner in the dungeon, as his thoughts have dwelt upon its accumulated splendors, has felt as though his prison walls had dissolved, and he was already the freeman of that "city which hath the foundations, whose builder and maker is God." Surely it is not too much to say, that if it be still true—as true it hat "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither entered into the heart of man the things which hath prepared for them that love Him," there is at least one sense in which this has ceased to be so since John saw this vision of the New Jerusalem, and wrote it for the inexhaustible joy and exaltation of God's strangers and pilgrims on earth.

* Which is introduced for the special purpose of linking the Apocalypse with the Book of Daniel.

But my object in the present paper is not to enlarge upon the wonderful character of the Apocalyptic imagery in general, but rather to draw attention to the fact, commonly quite overlooked, of the high of great importance as enabling us to realize more completely the grandeur and significance of the representations of this sublime book—namely, that the whole action of the Apocalyptic drama is, so to speak, played out on a stage which has a permanent background, the relation of which to the occurrences described, it is necessary to realize if we would not miss much of the impressiveness and the meaning of the latter.

WHAT IS THE "PERMANENT BACKGROUND"? This permanent background—the scenery, if a poetic allusion may be permitted—which remains unchanged up to a point presently to be indicated, is the great vision of the throne, the elders and the living creatures, recorded in Rev. 4:2-11.

Put into other words, and endeavoring to indicate more clearly the relation in which the various objects which it includes stood to one another, it may be thus described: The central and most prominent feature in the whole scene, and that which it would seem first arrested the seer's attention, was a throne; "the throne of the majesty in the heavens," spoken of in the Epistle to the Hebrews; and though neither its form nor appearance is described, it was doubtless "high and lifted up," like that which Isaiah saw in the corresponding theophany which he describes (Isaiah 6:1-4).

Upon this throne "One was sitting;" but if John does not describe the throne, far less does he attempt to describe its Divine occupant. Indeed, that he saw was rather a glory than an actual form; with sublime ambiguity he says, "He that was to look upon like a jasper and a sardius." The "jasper" most probably indicated the color and splendor of the diamond, with which the red of the sardius mingled in mystic wonderful combination. Arranged in a circle or half circle around this throne the seer next observed, upon a lower level, four and twenty lesser thrones, and seated upon them four and twenty human forms—these of grave and venerable "elders" clothed in white robes and wearing crowns of gold; thus combining the emblems of priesthood and royalty.

Within the circuit of these lesser thrones and supporting, as it were, the great central throne itself, which rested on their hinder parts, were four cherubic forms, having severally the Heads of a Lion, a Calf, a Man, and an Eagle; while round the central throne, encircling the formless glory which occupied it, was a beautiful bow of emerald green. All these things formed in a sense a single object, the equipage of the Most High; in the forefront of which burned seven lamps of fire, while round it, as far as the eye could reach, stretched a sea of glass translucent as crystal.

Such was the sublime background upon which the seer gazed; nor was it simply as a lifeless and tinted picture; on the contrary, it was instinct with a Divine life and motion. The cherubim were in ceaseless motion day and night, crying, "Holy, holy, holy," and ever and anon the elders rose from their royal seats, and, removing from their heads the golden crowns which encircled them, cast them down before the central throne in token of profoundest worship, saying, "Worthy art Thou, our Lord and our God, to receive the glory and the honor and the power, for Thou didst create all things, and because of Thy will they are, and were created."

Now what I desire by these remarks specially to impress on the reader's mind, is the fact that this entire scene or background, as I have called it, continued within the sphere of the seer's vision throughout the whole course of the Apocalyptic judgments as contained in the seals, the trumpets, and the vials; in other words that the whole of the action described from the beginning of the fifth chapter to the middle of the nineteenth took place IN THE PRESENCE OF THE THRONE, the elders, and the cherubim. That this was the case can clearly be proved from the passing references to one or other of them which occur throughout these visions.

Thus, when the Lamb takes the seven-sealed book of the inheritance, he does so standing "in the midst of the throne, and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders." Again, as the Lamb, having received the book, breaks its first four seals, the voices of the four cherubim are heard successively saying, as with a loud voice, "Come"; so also, under the sixth seal, the various classes of the dwellers on the earth are represented as saying to the rocks and mountains, "Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb."

Again, in connection with the description given in the seventh chapter of the "great multitude which no man could number," we are not only told that they were "standing before the throne and before the Lamb," but reference is made to the simultaneous worship of "the elders and the four living creatures;" while one of the elders actually enters into conversation with John respecting their identity and destiny. In like manner, of the hundred and forty-four thousand seen standing on the Mount Zion, in the fourteenth chapter, it is said: "And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four living creatures and the elders." Again, when, in the following chapter, the seven angels who have the seven last plagues come out from the temple in heaven, it is "one of the four living creatures" who delivers to them the seven golden vials full of the wrath of God. And, lastly, in the nineteenth chapter, after the awful destruction of Babylon, it is said: "And her smoke goeth up forever and ever. And the four and twenty elders and the four living creatures fell down and worshipped God that sitteth on the throne, saying, Amen; Hallelujah."

THE ALTAR BEFORE THE THRONE.

It is a very remarkable circumstance, however, that whereas in the vision of the fourth chapter, above quoted and described, there is no allusion to the Jewish tabernacle or its furniture, yet, in the sixth chapter, on the opening of the fifth seal, the seer tells us, "I saw underneath the altar the souls of them that had been slain for the word of God," etc., and this altar is apparently the altar of sacrifice—corresponding to the brazen altar of the tabernacle—for Alford says, "the peculiar form of the word slain which follows seems to imply this."

Yet, again, in the eighth chapter, on the opening of the seventh seal, we read: "And another angel came and stood over the altar, having a golden censer, and there was given unto him much incense, that he should add it unto the prayers of all the saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne." (Rev. 8:1-2, R. V.) Here, then, we have reference made to the golden altar, which, in the tabernacle, occupied its position in the holy place, and which is here located "before the throne." A similar allusion to "the golden altar" is made in the ninth chapter, on the sounding of the sixth trumpet; and then, in the eleventh chapter, on the sounding of the seventh trumpet, we meet with the more explicit and comprehensive statement: "And there was opened the temple of God that is in heaven, and there was seen in His temple the ark of His covenant."

While, lastly, in the fifteenth chapter, before the pouring out of the seven vials, John says: "And I saw, and the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened: and there came out of the temple the seven angels that had the seven last plagues, arrayed with precious stones, pure and bright, and girt about their breasts with golden girdles. And one of the four living creatures gave unto the seven angels seven golden bowls full of the wrath of God." And here observe particularly that, though the scene would seem to be the temple, "the living creatures"—and, as we learn from chapter 19:4, the elders and the throne—are still simultaneously present.

Thus we have mention made—first of the altar of sacrifice, which, in the tabernacle, stood in the outer court—then of the golden altar, which had its position in the holy place; and, lastly, of the Holy of Holies, with the ark of the covenant within it. And all this, in combination with the scenery of the heavenly vision in the fourth chapter, which remains permanent throughout. How is this to be reconciled? Is the explanation this—which, if true, is surely very beautiful?—that, as the visions of the Divine Judgment proceeded, the scenery of the temple grew up, as in around the unearthly, heavenly glories described in the fourth chapter; till, subsequently, the judgments being ended, and their blessed result attained, the "great voice out of the throne" shall be heard, saying: "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He shall dwell among them, and they shall be His peoples, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God" (Rev. 21:3).

In brief conclusion, let me illustrate, in two or three instances, the additional completeness and impressiveness imparted to some of the scenes of the Apocalyptic drama by the realization of their relation to the background of the fourth chapter. Thus, for example, in the case of the vision of the "great multitude which no man could number" (chap. 7:9-17), what a new sublimity does it add to the picture, when we see them, as it were, occupying, in their countless, white-robed masses, the heretofore vacant glassy sea, which stretched, like a crystal pavement, over the wide space between the throne, the elders and the cherubim, and the seer himself. "The celestial scene," as Alford says, "becoming filled with this innumerable throng; its other inhabitants remaining as before." While their loud and unceasing cry, "Salvation unto our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb," mingles with the anthems of the elders and the cherubim, and is overpowered only by the voices and thunders proceeding from the eternal throne.

AWFUL SILENCE IN HEAVEN.

Again, when we are told that, on the opening of the seventh seal, "there followed a silence in heaven about the space of half an hour"—this statement, most impressive in itself, become infinitely more so when we consider all that it involves, if so be that the principle of interpretation here advocated be kept in mind. It involves the conclusion that the cry of "Salvation unto our God" died upon the lips of the great multitude. It involves the conclusion that the sublime anthem of the elders ceased. It involves the conclusion that the "Holy, holy, holy" of the cherubim was no longer heard. Yea, it involves the conclusion that, from the throne itself, the "voices and thunders" which awed all heaven, became silent. The very life of heaven was arrested; the heart of the universe stood ominously still; and, had that silence lasted more than half an hour, it had surely ceased to beat.

THE "NEW SONG."

Lastly. In the case of the glorious vision of the "hundred and forty and four thousand standing on the Mount Zion"—elevated, it would seem, above the countless multitude already referred to—each one in that sea of upturned faces radiant in the light of the Divine signature unstamped upon each brow—how much is the sublimity of the spectacle increased by the consideration that their wondrous "new song," which no man could learn save themselves, was sung "before the throne"; and, that as the great tide of unique melody swelled upon the Apostle's enraptured ear, it gathered volume as it rolled inward, till it burst in thunder around the enthroned Lamb! And how exquisite a consolation must it have been to the burdened heart of the seer to perceive how, even while the righteous judgments of God were desolating the earth, heaven was becoming more and more populous. How the celestial scene which, when first disclosed, presented as its sole creature inhabitants the elders and the cherubim, became the Temple of the Lord, thronged with adoring worshippers; till at length—so far, at least, as this present age is concerned—the Father's house was filled, and the Saviour's soul was satisfied.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President Sent to the Senate on Wednesday, June 7th, the nominations for the Tariff Commission. They were William A. Wheeler, of New York (chairman); John L. Hayes, of Massachusetts; Henry W. Oliver, Jr. of Pennsylvania; Austin M. Garland, of Illinois; Jacob A. Ambler, of Ohio; John S. Phelps, of Missouri; Robert P. Porter, of the District of Columbia; John W. H. Underwood, of Georgia; Duncan F. Kenner, of Louisiana. The momentous character of the work committed to the hands of the Commission is generally appreciated, and as it was felt that the future commercial welfare of the country depended in no small degree on the report the Commission will render, the list of names selected by the President has been carefully scanned. The result is considered generally satisfactory, and it is believed that an impartial investigation will be made. The names were thus placed by Mr. Morrill, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, who said, "There are probably not less than four men upon it who would be called revenue tariff men, headed by John S. Phelps, of Missouri; one or two strongly protective men, two or three moderately so, and the others would probably be in favor of reducing the revenue to the proper wants of the government without injuring the business interests of the country." Ex-Governor Phelps and ex-Vice-President Wheeler have declined to serve on the Commission, and a petition has been sent to the President asking that two practical business men may be nominated for the vacant places.

The Army Appropriation Bill Occupied the attention of the Senate during the early part of last week. The principal feature in dispute was the limit of age for compulsory retirement of officers. It had been originally fixed at sixty-two, but on Monday, June 5th, an amendment was passed changing the limit to sixty-four. The amendment was framed for the purpose of excluding General Sherman from the immediate operation of the law, he being now sixty-two years of age. A motion was made to except Generals Sherman, Schofield, Hancock, Howard, and Terry from the operation of the law, these officers having received the thanks of Congress for conspicuous military service. It was lost by a heavy majority. As the measure stands, no exceptions are made to compulsory retirement at the prescribed age, but General Sherman alone will continue to receive his full pay. In this form the bill, which has more significance than appears on its surface, was finally passed by the Senate.

The House of Representatives Passed the Deficiency Bill last week and proceeded to the discussion of the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive Appropriation Bill, but did not complete it before adjourning on Saturday. The chief obstacle to its passing is the recommendation of the committee that the staff of clerks in the Executive Department should be increased by 7522 persons, which will increase the appropriation to nearly twenty million dollars. On this question Mr. Kasson, in the interest of Civil Service Reform, moved that the additional clerks to be appointed should be selected from among persons not under eighteen nor more than fifty years of age; that each person selected, after passing a proper examination, should receive at first only a temporary appointment for a term not exceeding six months; that he should be subject to removal at any time if found to be physically, mentally, or morally disqualified; that after six months of satisfactory service he should be entitled to receive an appointment for the term of three years, during which he should not be removed except for cause, unless his services should not be required during the full period because of the falling off of the amount of work to be done; and that in making appointments preference should be given to suitable persons from States and Congressional Districts whose "quota" of government appointments is not full. Mr. Kasson's amendment was, however, ruled out by the chairman, though it is probable that some such provision will ultimately be enacted.

The Ohio Republican Convention, Which has been anticipated by the party with not a little apprehension, assembled on June 7th. Since the Pond Liquor Bill has been declared unconstitutional, the liquor stores have all been reopened, and it has become evident that the whole subject will have to be considered and finally settled. Thus the election, which was not regarded as important so far as the offices to be filled were concerned, became serious in view of the temperance question. Before the Pond Bill passed the liquor trade in Ohio was unrestricted, as the Constitution prohibited license but did not prohibit the sale of liquor. The Pond Bill imposed a tax on the liquor dealer and required him also to give a bond. As a result of the recent legal decision there is a demand for an amendment to the Constitution, and it is this question on which the election will probably turn. The Republicans are between the Prohibitionists, numbering 16,000 votes, on the one hand, and the Germans on the other, and both parties were anxious to see how far the platform adopted would go. The Convention passed a clause declaring the party in favor of amending the Constitution so as to permit of the taxation and regulation of the liquor traffic, and that all laws upon the statute books must be enforced, which includes the Sunday act. This is considered unsatisfactory by both Prohibitionists and the liquor dealers.

An Appalling List of Youthful Criminals has been made up by the New York Sun from the local journals of the respective States. The whole of the crimes mentioned were committed in one and the same week. A boy of Belleville, Ill., killed the girl who rejected his addresses on account of his dissipation. Two Arkansas boys quarrelled over a rabbit hunt, and one slew the other with an axe. A St. Louis boy stabbed the playmate who teased him for his ignorance of English. A West Virginia boy shot his rival in a girl's affections. A Virginia boy confesses the poisoning of two persons. A Texas boy shot a little girl because she refused to put down a pail when he ordered her to. A Kansas boy is on trial for intentionally drowning a playfellow. Two Wisconsin boys maltreated a child nearly to death. Three boys pleaded guilty to highway robbery in Chicago. An Iowa boy is a forger. A Missouri boy set fire to a house. A New Mexico boy shot a baby. A Colorado horse-thief is aged 8 years, and none of the other criminals mentioned was over 16.

The Opening of Dr. Cullis's New Faith Cure House in Boston was celebrated with a very interesting service on May 23d. The Faith Cure House is described as a large double cottage built in handsome style, on the Grove Hall grounds, and furnished, though as yet only partially, with simple elegance. It has been built entirely from the voluntary offerings of those who have been healed in answer to the prayer of faith. Dr. Cullis, in the course of a dedicatory address, stated that this was the seventh dedication held in eleven years, on the Grove Hall grounds, and it marked in some respects a new departure in the work. Six years ago the desire had come to him to found a Faith Cure House. People who came from a distance had to go to hotels and boarding-houses where they sometimes came under worldly sceptical influences which affected their souls. The $4000 which had been given to the house had come in small voluntary offerings during the last ten years from those who had been healed; $100 had come in yesterday for the purpose, and $5 that day. People who came might stay one day, three days, four days or a week, till they were satisfied that they were healed. People did not need to be afraid that no one would die, for there is a time appointed for all. He had seen many taken to glory without any sickness, but old age. In the course of these twelve years hundreds and hundreds of people had come to him for prayer, some from long distances. One young man, for instance, had come to him from New Brunswick, and was then about to return.

The Chautauqua Foreign Missionary Institute has issued timely notice of its annual exercises. It invites all friends of missions, foreign and home, in every denomination and from every land, to its fourth annual gathering, in the beautiful grove beside Lake Chautauqua. The great day will be: Opening day, C. Teachers' Retreat at C. School of Languages, July 8th; Memorial Day, C. Literary and Scientific Circle, July 9th; Closing Exercises, C. T. R., July 28th; Mid-Season Celebration, Saturday, July 29th; Fourth Anniversary, C. F. M. I., Monday, July 31st; Ninth Annual Assembly Opening, August 1st; Closing Exercises, C. F. M. I., Thursday, August 3d. Memorial Day Anniversary, C. L. S. C. Late reports of all missionary work are desired, that they may be seen in the missionary reading room at Chautauqua; these may be sent to the Secretary, Mark's parsonage, Buffalo, N. Y., to C. P. Hart.

An Interesting Ceremony was Witnessed in the city of Washington on May 23d when ground was broken for the new Christian Church, to be erected as a memorial of President Garfield. No programme had been arranged, but the work began with a very pretty act. Two little four-year old girls, one of them the daughter of the pastor Mr. Power, turned up the first sod, which was wheeled away by a boy of six summers. All the congregation who were present then handled the spade for a moment in turn before the field was abandoned to the workmen.

The Christian Work Among the Railroad employes conducted by Miss Jennie Smith, assisted by Miss Adelaide Sherman, Mr. George Perin, Mr. Hilton and others, is making remarkable progress. The meetings at Grafton, W. Va., are such as have never before been witnessed in that locality. Ninety conversions are already reported there, and ministers and church members are working heartily in the cause. God is signally blessing the work of this earnest band of evangelists. Since the work commenced at Martinsburg, W. Va., on March 4th, over nine hundred persons have professed saving faith as the result of the divine blessing on their labors.

The Cleveland Journals Report the Hopeful progress of the revival services conducted by Major Cole. The Christian workers of the city are rendering good service to the movement by organizing a procession which perambulates the parks and squares where loungers are found. Gospel hymns are sung and small printed cards of invitation to the services are distributed. Another procession will this week make the tour of the saloon districts. Morning meetings are held in the Tabernacle every day from ten o'clock until noon; then there are the evening meetings and after that the inquiry meetings which continue until a late hour. Major Cole remains at the Tabernacle all day to converse with anxious sinners, and he has now, owing to the late hour to which he is often detained there, had a bed improvised in the building, so that he is practically there for consultation and advice at all hours day and night. On May 26th an infidel who came to disturb the meetings and turn them into ridicule rose in a state of distress, admitted his object in coming to the meeting, and begged for the prayers of God's people.

The Wicked Scheme of a Gang of Train Robbers to wreck a train at Madison, Conn., was happily thwarted on the night of May 23d. They selected a bridge as the scene of their operations, and were busy from sunset until near midnight in fixing ties in an upright position between the ties of the track. They had just completed their arrangements, and were lying in wait for the fast train then nearly due, when they were detected by a young station agent, who by desperate exertion succeeded in stopping the train before it reached the bridge. Unhappily infidels and vicious men who are employed by the enemy of souls to wreck the lives of the young, and ruin their souls are not always detected as these miscreants were, but it is one of the most important duties of Christians to watch the designs of these men and give warning to those who are in danger of falling a prey to their cunning devices (2 Cor. 2 : 11).

A Strange Discovery was Made Under the flooring of an old church at Dallas, Texas, on June 6th. The Dallas Electric Light Company having purchased the old church property in Austin Street, pulled down the building to make way for their new edifice. In the course of their operations the builders came upon a large quantity of burglars' apparatus. It appeared to have belonged to a gang concerned chiefly with the robbery of banks, for besides the ordinary tools, there were cases of dynamite cartridges, and an oilcloth screen representing the front of an iron safe, apparently intended to be hung up to hide burglars who might be working on the real safe behind it. The curious feature of the affair was that the burglars should have selected a church as a hiding place for their apparatus. The use to which they put the church is probably unprecedented, though unhappily it is by no means rare for forgers, defaulters, and swindlers to use their connection with a church as a cover to conceal their real character (Ezek. 33 : 31).

The Pavement of a Street Caught Fire in San Francisco a few nights ago from the effects of the electric light apparatus. Shortly after the lamps were lighted a passing pedestrian was astonished by finding himself sinking into the asphaltum. He also saw steam and smoke arising from the sizzling and smoking pavement directly over where the electric wires connecting with the lamps are laid in wooden troughs, and the lamps were almost extinguished. Word was sent to the office of the electric light company, and they caused the asphaltum pavement to be dug up, and found that the packing or non-conducting covering of the electric wires had become misplaced, thereby allowing the electricity to come in contact with the asphaltum, which was soon in a boiling state. It is obvious that in using the electric light great care will have to be taken to keep the wires from coming in contact with the earth, or there will be some serious accidents. The chief cause of spiritual corruption in the history of the Church in the time of Luther and other reformers was of a similar nature. The people were depending for light on men whose contact with the world had unfitted them for such an office (Isa. 56 : 10-12).

The Happy Issue to a Divorce Case is Reported from Illinois. A rich farmer and his wife living near Walnut Hill, Ill., after dwelling together in unity for forty years, suddenly came to the surprising conclusion that their tempers were incompatible, and accordingly separated. The wife then brought a suit for divorce, which came on for trial at Mt. Vernon recently. The lawyers on both sides during the dinner recess entered into a most creditable agreement to reconcile the aged couple, if it were possible, and the judge cordially offered to assist them. During the afternoon session each made a conciliatory speech, affirming that his client regretted the necessity for separation over a trifling cause and was sorry that the love of so many years should be blighted, and the judge followed with a pathetic admonition. At this point the husband straightened himself in his chair and looked toward his wife; she in turn threw a forgiving glance at him; they both rose, clasped hands, received the congratulations of the court, and in two minutes they were driving toward Walnut Hill happy in reunion. It is not often that mediation between husband and wife is attended by such a gratifying result, but in this case, as in that of Christians who quarrel, a misunderstanding and a misconception of motives is generally the cause of the trouble. Happy are they who instead of widening the breach succeed in healing it (Matt. 5 : 9).

A Puzzled Patient once left the Office of the late Dr. John F. Gray. The kind-hearted physician, in prescribing for her, distinctly told her that she must take not only the medicine ordered, but the cover in which it was wrapped. The patient was a poor sewing girl who, when she went to Dr. Gray for advice was given a phial of medicine and told to go home and go to bed. "I can't do that, Doctor," the girl replied, "for I am dependent on what I earn every day for my living." "If that is so," said Dr. Gray, "I'll change the medicine a little. Give me back the phial." He then wrapped around it a $10 bill, and returning it to her, reiterated his order, "Go home and go to bed," adding, "Take the medicine, cover and all." The girl was naturally puzzled by the order until she came to obey the doctor's instructions and then she discovered his generous provision. A similar experience often happens to those who obey the divine commands in simple faith. Men have found after their conversion that God is calling them to leave their business as being one in which a Christian should not be engaged, and they have obeyed, not knowing how they would be provided for, but He who led them forth not knowing where they would go has at the same time supplied their need (Luke 18 : 29, 30).

A Fatal Act of Endearment is described in a Georgia journal. It appears that when the recent terrible cyclone was approaching Monticello, the wife of one of the physicians of the town, hearing the storm coming, ran to her husband, who threw his arm about her neck. At the same moment the wind blew the house down upon them, and crushed them to the floor, the mother with the infant in her arms, the husband with his arm around his wife's neck. The timbers locked the doctor's arm so closely about her neck that he could not remove it. He was conscious that he was choking her to death, but all his efforts to throw off the timbers were futile. When assistance came his wife was dead. It is difficult to conceive of the agonizing regret that filled the bereaved husband's heart as he realized that the very act which he intended should be one of comfort and protection should have led to the death of his beloved wife. But while we can sympathize with him in his trial we are sadly conscious that there are other husbands and lovers whose love has had consequences yet more terrible. Women who have come very near to the kingdom of God have been held back and the new spiritual life has been choked by the influence of those who loved them and whom they loved. Such men will, when their eyes are opened, suffer a terrible remorse (Matt. 18 : 6).

The Ingratitude of a Millionaire is Described in a journal published in one of the small towns of New York State. It asserts that in the local poorhouse there is now living an aged Irishman who was thirty years ago in prosperous circumstances. He was a generous open-handed man, and many anecdotes are told of his lavish benevolence in the days of his wealth. Among others it is said that hearing that his sister and her husband had died suddenly in a distant State, leaving two little boys penniless, he travelled thither, and returning with the orphans placed them in a good school and had them well educated. He afterward supported them until they were able to maintain themselves. Subsequently misfortunes came upon him, and in his old age he became miserably poor. To-day he is in the poorhouse, and one of the boys he educated is a millionaire, whose costly jewels and profuse display and magnificent entertainments the European newspapers often report. Such ingratitude, if the story is true, is very shameless, but we constantly see cases of the truth of which there can be no question, in which men whom God has blessed with temporal and spiritual blessings, are content to enjoy them in selfish idleness, never sacrificing time, money, or labor in His service (Rom. 12 : 1).

THE PERPETUITY OF THE LAW OF GOD.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"For verily I say unto you, Till Heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."—Matthew 5 : 18.

Two Serious Errors—I. The Law Perpetual—Jesus Did not Abolish it—He Explained it—Pointed out its Spiritual Character—Unveiled its Living Essence—Embodied its Commands in His Life—Bore its Penalty—The Law Perpetual from its Nature—Is no more than God may Righteously Ask—No more than is Good for man—A Sliding Scale of Duty—What Perfect Sanctification Means—II. The Law must be Fulfilled—In the Sacrifice of Christ—In His Life—The Apostle Paul's State—Where Absolute Perfection will be Attained.

It has been said that he who understands the two covenants is a theologian, and this is, no doubt, true. I may also say that the man who knows the relative positions of the law and of the Gospel has the keys of the situation in the matter of doctrine. The relationship of the law to myself, and how it condemns me; the relationship of the Gospel to myself, and how if I be a believer it justifies me—these are two points which every Christian man should clearly understand. He should not "see men as trees walking" in this department, or else he may cause himself great sorrow, and fall into errors which will be grievous to his heart and injurious to his life. To form a mingle-mangle of law and Gospel is to teach that which is neither law nor Gospel, but the opposite of both. May the Spirit of God be our teacher, and the Word of God be our lesson-book, and then we shall not err.

Very great mistakes have been made about the law. Not long ago there were those about us who affirmed that the law is utterly abrogated and abolished, and they openly taught that believers were not bound to make the moral law the rule of their lives. What would have been sin in other men they counted to be no sin in themselves. From such Antinomianism as that may God deliver us. We are not under the law as the method of salvation, but we delight to see the law in the hand of Christ, and desire to obey the Lord in all things.

Others have been met with who have taught that Jesus mitigated and softened down the law, and they have in effect said that the perfect law of God was too hard for imperfect beings, and therefore God has given us a milder and easier rule. These tread dangerously upon the verge of terrible error, although we believe that they are little aware of it. Alas, we have met with authors who have gone much further than this, and have railed at the law. Oh, the hard words that I have sometimes read against the holy law of God! How very unlike to those which the apostle used when he said, "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good." How different from the reverent spirit which made him say, "I delight in the law of God after the inward man."

I gather from our text two things upon which I shall speak at this time. The first is that the law of God is perpetual: "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law." The meaning is that even in the least point it must abide till all be fulfilled. Secondly, we perceive that the law must be fulfilled: Not "one jot or one tittle shall pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." He who came to bring in the Gospel dispensation here asserts that He has not come to destroy the law, but to fulfil it.

I. First : the law of God must be perpetual. There is NO ABROGATION OF IT, nor amendment of it. It is not to be toned down or adjusted to our fallen condition; but every one of the Lord's righteous judgments abideth forever. I would urge three reasons which will establish this teaching.

In the first place our Lord Jesus declares that He did not come to abolish it. His words are most express: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil." And Paul tells us, with regard to the Gospel, "Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: yea we establish the law" (Rom. 3: 31). The Gospel is the means of the firm establishment and vindication of the law of God.

Jesus did not come to change the law, but He came to explain it, and that very fact shows that it remains, for there is no need to explain that which is abrogated. Upon one particular point in which there happened to be a little ceremonialism involved, namely, the keeping of the Sabbath, our Lord enlarged, and showed that the Jewish idea was not the true one. The Pharisees forbade even the doing of works of necessity and mercy, such as rubbing ears of corn to satisfy hunger, and healing the sick. Our Lord Jesus showed that it was not at all according to the mind of God to forbid these things. In straining over the letter, and carrying an outward observance to excess, they had missed the spirit of the Sabbath law, which suggested works of piety such as truly hallow the day.

He showed that Sabbatic rest was not mere inaction, and He said, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." He pointed to the priests who labored hard at offering sacrifices, and said of them, "the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath, and are blameless." They were doing divine service, and were within the law. To meet the popular error He took care to do some of His grandest miracles upon the Sabbath-day; and though this excited great wrath against Him, as though He were a law-breaker, yet He did it on purpose that they might see that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath, and that it is meant to be a day for doing that which honors God and blesses men. O that men knew how to keep the spiritual Sabbath by a ceasing from all servile work, and from all work done for self!

The rest of faith is the true Sabbath, and the service of God is the most acceptable hallowing of the day. Oh that the day were wholly spent in serving God and doing good! The sum of our Lord's teaching was that works of necessity, works of mercy, and works of piety are lawful on the Sabbath. He did explain the law in that point and in others, yet that explanation did not alter the command, but only removed the rust of tradition which had settled upon it. By thus explaining the law He confirmed it; He could not have meant to abolish it or He would not have needed to expound it.

In addition to explaining it the Master went further; He pointed out

ITS SPIRITUAL CHARACTER.

This the Jews had not observed. They thought, for instance, that the command "Thou shalt not kill" simply forbade murder and manslaughter; but the Saviour showed that anger without cause violates the law, and that hard words and cursing, and all other displays of enmity and malice, are forbidden by the commandment. They knew that they might not commit adultery, but it did not enter into their minds that a lascivious desire would be an offence against the precept till the Saviour said, "He that looketh upon a woman to lust after her committeth adultery with her already in his heart." He showed that the thought of evil is sin, that an unclean imagination pollutes the heart, that a wanton wish is guilt in the eyes of the Most High. Assuredly this was no abrogation of law; it was a wonderful exhibition of its far-reaching sovereignty and of its searching character.

The Pharisees fancied that if they kept their hands, and their feet, and their tongues, all was done; but Jesus showed that thought, imagination, desire, memory, everything, must be brought into subjection to the will of God, or else the law was not fulfilled. What a searching and humbling doctrine is this! If the law of the Lord reaches to the inward parts, who among us can by nature abide its judgment? Who can understand his errors? Cleanse Thou me from secret faults.

The ten commands are full of meaning—meaning which many seem to ignore. For instance, many a man will allow in and around his house inattention to the rules of health and sanitary precaution, but it does not occur to him that he is trampling on the command—"Thou shalt not kill;" yet this rule forbids our doing anything which may cause injury to our neighbor's health, and so deprive him of life. Many a deadly manufactured article, many an ill-ventilated shop, many a business with hours of excessive length, is a standing breach of this command. Shall I say less of drinks, which lead so speedily to disease and death, and crowd our cemeteries with untimely graves? So, too, in reference to another precept; some persons will repeat songs and stories which are suggestive of uncleanness—I wish that this were not so common as it is. Do they not know that an unchaste word, a double meaning, a sly hint of lust all come under the command, "Thou shalt not commit adultery?" It is so according to the teaching of our Lord Jesus. Oh, talk not to me about our Lord's having brought in a milder law because man could not keep the Decalogue, for He has done nothing of the kind.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, in addition to explaining the law and pointing out its spiritual character, also unveiled its living essence, for when one asked Him, "Which is the great commandment in the law?" He said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it; Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." In other words, He has told us, "All the law is fulfilled in this: thou shalt love." There is

THE PITH AND MARROW OF IT.

Does any man say to me, "You see, then, instead of the ten commandments we have received the two commandments, and these are much easier," I answer that this reading of the law is not in the least easier. Such a remark implies a want of thought and experience. Those two precepts comprehend the ten at their fullest extent, and cannot be regarded as the erasure of a jot or tittle of them. Whatever difficulties surround the ten commands are equally found in the two, which are their sum and substance. If you love God with all your heart you must keep the first table; and if you love your neighbor as yourself you must keep the second table.

If any suppose that the law of love is an adaptation of the moral law to man's fallen condition they greatly err. I can only say that the supposed adaptation is no more adapted to us than the original law. If there could be conceived to be any difference in difficulty it might be easier to keep the ten than the two; for if we go no deeper than the letter, the two are the more exacting, since they deal with the heart, and soul, and mind. The ten commands mean all that the two express; but if we forget this, and only look at the wording of them, I say, it is harder for a man to love God with all his heart, with all his soul, with all his mind, and with all his strength, and his neighbor as himself, than it would be merely to abstain from killing, stealing, and false witness.

Christ has not, therefore, abrogated or at all moderated the law to meet our helplessness; He has left it in all its sublime perfection, as it always must be left, and He has pointed out how deep are its foundations, how elevated are its heights, how measureless are its length and breadth. Like the laws of the Medes and Persians, God's commands cannot be altered; we are saved by another method.

To show that He never meant to abrogate the law, our Lord Jesus has embodied all its commands in His own life. In His own person there was a nature which was perfectly conformed to the law of God; and as was His nature such was His life. He could say, "Which of you convinceth me of sin?" and again, "I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in His love." I may not say that He was scrupulously careful to keep the law; I will not put it so, for there was no tendency in Him to do otherwise; He was so perfect and pure, so infinitely good, and so complete in His agreement and communion with the Father, that He in all things carried out the Father's will. The Father said of Him, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him." Once more, that the Master did not come to alter the law is clear, because after having embodied it in His life He willingly gave Himself up to bear its penalty, though He had never broken it; bearing the penalty for us, even as it is written, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." "All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way, and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." If the law had demanded more of us than it ought to have done, would the Lord Jesus have rendered to it the penalty which resulted from its too severe demands? I am sure He would not. But because the law asked only what it ought to ask—namely perfect obedience; and exacted of the transgressor only what it ought to exact, namely, death, as the penalty for sin—death under divine wrath, therefore the Saviour went to the tree, and there bore our sins and purged them once for all. If, therefore, it is clearly proven that Jesus was obedient to the law, even to the extent of death, He certainly did not come to abolish or abrogate it; and if He did not remove it, who can do so? If He declares that He came to establish it, who shall overthrow it?

But, secondly, the law of God must be perpetual from its very nature, for does it not strike you the moment you think of it that truth must always be true, and purity must always be purity? Before the ten commandments were published at Sinai there was still that same law of right and wrong laid upon men by the necessity of their being God's creatures. Right was always right before a single command had been committed to words. You cannot bring right down to a lower level; it must be where it always is; right is right eternally, and cannot be wrong. You cannot lift up wrong and make it somewhat right; it must be wrong while the world standeth. In spirit the law is eternal.

The law of God is no more than God might most righteously ask of us. If God were about to give us a more tolerant law, it would be an admission on His part that He asked too much at first. Can that be supposed? Was there, after all, some justification for the statement of the wicked and slothful servant when he said, "I feared thee, because thou art an austere man?" It cannot be. For God to alter His law would be an admission that He made a mistake at first, that He put poor imperfect man (we are often hearing that said) under too rigorous a régime, and therefore He is now prepared to abate His claims, and make them more reasonable.

It has been said that man's moral inability to keep the perfect law exempts him from the duty of doing so. This is very specious, but it is utterly false. Man's inability is not of the kind which removes responsibility; it is moral, not physical. Never fall into the error that moral inability will be an excuse for sin. What, when a man becomes such a liar that he cannot speak the truth, is he thereby exempted from the duty of truthfulness? If your servant owes you a day's labor, is he free from the duty because he has made himself so drunk that he cannot serve you? Is a man freed from a debt by the fact that he has squandered the money, and therefore cannot pay it? Is a lustful man free to indulge his passions because he cannot understand the beauty of chastity? This is dangerous doctrine. The law is a just one, and man is bound by it though his sin has rendered him incapable of doing so.

The law moreover demands

NO MORE THAN IS GOOD FOR US.

There is not a single commandment of God's law but what is meant to be a kind of danger signal such as we put up upon the ice when it is too thin to bear. Each commandment does as it were say to us, "Dangerous." It is never for a man's good to do what God forbids him; it is never for man's real and ultimate happiness to leave undone anything that God commands him. The wisest directions for spiritual health, and for the avoidance of evil, are those directions which are given us concerning right and wrong in the law of God. Therefore it is not possible that there should be any alteration thereof, for it would not be for our good. I should like to say to any brother who asks that God has put us under an altered rule: Which particular part of the law is it that God has relaxed? Which precept do you feel free to break? Are you delivered from the command which forbids stealing? My dear sir, you may be a capital theologian, but I should lock up my sons when you call at my house. Is it the command about adultery which you think is removed? Then I could not recommend your being admitted to any decent society. Is the law as to killing softened down? Then I had rather have your son than your company. Which law is it that God has exempted you from? That law of worshipping Him only? Do you propose to have another God? Do you intend to make graven images? The fact is that when we come to detail we cannot afford to lose a single link of this wonderful golden chain, which is perfect in every part as well as perfect as a whole. The law is absolutely complete, and you can neither add to it nor take from it. "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty all. For he that said, Do not commit adultery, did also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law." If, then, no part of it can be taken down, it must stand and stand forever. To alter the law is to leave us without any law at all. A sliding-scale of duty is fatal to the principles of law. If each man is to be accepted because he does his best, we are all doing our best. Is there anybody that is not? If we take their words for it, all our fellow-men are doing as well as they can, considering their imperfect natures. Even the harlot in the streets has some righteousness—she is not quite so far gone as others. Have you never heard of the bandit who committed many murders, but who felt that he had been doing his best because he never killed anybody on a Friday? Self-righteousness builds itself a nest even in the worst character.

This is the man's talk: "Really, if you knew me, you would say, I have been a good fellow to you as well as I have. Consider what a poor fallen creature I am; what strong passions were born in me; what temptations to vice beset me, and you will not blame me much. After all, I dare say I am as satisfied with me as with many who are great deal better, because I had so few advantages." Yes, you have shifted the standard, and every man will now do that which is right in his own eyes and claim to be doing his best.

What a fine opening this leaves for vain glory. To wonder that men talk of the law has been lowered. There is nothing at all remarkable in our getting up to the rule if it is conveniently lowered for us. I believe I shall be perfectly sanctified when I keep God's law without mission or transgression, but not till then. If any man says that he is perfectly sanctified because he has come up to a modified law of his own, I am glad to know what he means, for I have no longer any discussion with him; I see nothing wonderful in his attainment. Sin is my want of conformity to the law of God, and until we are perfectly conformed to that law in all its spiritual length and breadth it is idle for us to talk about perfect sanctification; no man is perfectly clean until he accepts absolute purity as the standard by which he is to be judged.

So long as there is in us any coming short of the perfect law we are not perfect. What a humbling truth this is! The law shall not pass away, but it must be fulfilled. This truth must be maintained, or if it goes, our tacklings are loose, we cannot well strengthen the mast; the ship goes all to pieces; she becomes a total wreck. The Gospel itself would be destroyed could you destroy the law. To tamper with the law is to trifle with the Gospel. "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."

II. I come to show, secondly, that

THE LAW MUST BE FULFILLED.

I hope there are some in this place who are saying, "We cannot fulfill it." That is exactly where I want to bring you. Salvation by the works of the law must be felt to be impossible by every man who would be saved. We must learn that salvation is of grace through faith in Jesus Christ our Lord, and not by our own doings or feelings; but this is a doctrine no one will receive till he has learned the previous truth, that salvation by the works of the law can never come to any man of woman born. Yet the law must be fulfilled. Many will say with Nicodemus "How can these things be?" I answer, the law is fulfilled in Christ, and by faith we receive the fruit thereof.

First, as I have already said, the law is fulfilled in the matchless sacrifice of Jesus Christ. If a man has broken a law what does the law do with him? It says, "I must be honored. You have broken my command which was sanctioned by the penalty of death. Inasmuch as you did not honor me by obedience, but dishonored me by transgression, you must die." Our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the great covenant representative of His people, their second Adam, stood forward on the behalf of all who are in Him, and presented himself as a victim to divine justice. Since His people were guilty of death, He, as their covenant head, came under death, in their place and stead.

It was a glorious thing that such was possible, and it was only so because of the original constitution of the race as springing from a common father, and placed under a single head. Inasmuch as our fall was by one Adam, it was possible for us to be raised by another Adam. "As in Adam all died, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." It became possible for God, upon the principle of representation, to allow of substitution. Our first fall was not by our personal fault, but through the failure of our representative; and now in comes our second and grander representative, the Son of God, and He sets us free, not by our honoring the law, but by His doing so. He came under the law by His birth, and being found as a man loaded with the guilt of all His people, He was visited with its penalty. The law lifts its bloody axe, and it smites our glorious Head that we may go free.

It is the Son of God that keeps the law by dying, the just for the unjust. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die,"—there is death demanded, and in Christ death is presented. Life for life is rendered; an infinitely precious life instead of the poor lives of men. Jesus has died, and so the law has been fulfilled by the endurance of its penalty, and being fulfilled, its power to condemn and punish the believer has passed away.

Secondly, the law has been fulfilled again for us by Christ in His life. Jesus Christ as our head and representative, came into the world for the double purpose of bearing the penalty and at the same time keeping the law. The law requires a perfect life, and he that believeth in Jesus Christ presents to the law a perfect life, which he has made his own by faith. It is not his own life, but Christ is made of God unto us righteousness, even to us who are one with Him. "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." That which Jesus did is counted as though we did it, and because He was righteous God sees us in Him and counts us righteous upon the principle of substitution and representation.

Ay, but that is not all. The law has to be fulfilled in us personally in a spiritual and Gospel sense. "Well," say you, "but how can that be?" I reply in the words of our apostle: "What the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh," Christ has done and is doing by the Holy Spirit, "that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit." Regeneration is a work by which the law is fulfilled; for when a man is born again there is placed in him a new nature, which loves the law of God and is perfectly conformed thereto. The new nature which God implants in every believer at the time he is born again is incapable of sin; it cannot sin, for it is born of God. That new nature is the offspring of the eternal Father, and the Spirit of God dwells in it, and with it, and strengthens it.

The apostle Paul, when describing his inward conflicts, showed that he himself, his real and best self, did keep the law, for he says, "So then with the mind I myself serve the law of God" (Romans 7:25). He consented to the law that it was good, which showed that he was on the side of the law, and though sin that dwelt in his members led him into transgression, yet his new nature did not allow it, but hated and loathed it, and cried out against it as one in bondage. The new-born soul delights in the law of the Lord, and there is within it a quenchless life which aspires after absolute perfection, and will never rest till it pays to God perfect obedience and comes to be like God Himself.

This which is begun in regeneration is continued and grows till it ultimately arrives at

ABSOLUTE PERFECTION.

That will be seen in the world to come; and oh, what a fulfilment of the law will be there! The law will admit no man to heaven till he is perfectly conformed to it, but every believer shall be in that perfect condition. Our nature shall be refined from all its dross and be as pure gold. It will be our delight in heaven to be holy. There will be nothing about us then to kick against a single commandment. Then shall the law of the Lord have eternal honor from our immortal being. We delight in it after the inward man now, but then we shall delight in it as to our risen bodies, which shall be charmed to be instruments of righteousness unto God forever and ever. No appetite of those risen bodies, no want and no necessity of them shall then lead the soul astray, but our whole body, soul, and spirit shall be perfectly conformed unto the Divine mind.

Let us long and pant for this. We shall never attain it except by believing in Jesus. Perfect holiness will never be reached by the works of the law, for works cannot change the nature, but by faith in Jesus, and the blessed work of His Holy Spirit, we shall have it, and then I believe it will be among our songs of glory that heaven and earth pass away, but the word of God and the law of God shall stand fast forever and ever. Amen.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has Written a Letter expressing his sympathy with the movement to liberate the Episcopal Church from State patronage and control. The letter was addressed to the Liberation Society, and was as follows: "I feel that this question of liberating the bride of Christ from her dishonorable association with the State grows upon me in importance the more I love the Lord Jesus. I see the political evil of the situation, but the religious criminality is that which most oppresses me. Here is a Church of Christ which surrenders itself to the State. Its bishops are appointed by the rulers of a worldly kingdom; and, as for itself, it cannot wear the ribbon or leave it off without Cæsar's permission. It is a mercy that some few of her sons find this fetter too galling. The mystery is that they should continue to wear it when the door to Christian liberty is open. I long to see the piety of Episcopalians so elevated that they will hate the present infamous alliance, with all its hard bondage."

The Progress of Temperance in Great Britain.—At the recent annual meeting of the Band of Hope Union, it was stated that as far as could be estimated there were 8500 Bands of Hope and other organizations for the promotion of temperance principles among young people in the country. There were 1,070,000 members between seven and twenty-one years of age. With the sanction of the School Board for London numerous special lectures had been given in the board schools, and conferences held with the teachers. Illustrated lectures had been given in refuges, on board training ships, and in similar institutions for the young. The services of the provincial agents had been in increasing demand, two gentlemen thus employed having delivered 550 lectures and addresses, at which about 100,000 persons were present, and in connection with which 1900 pledges had been secured; 707 Bands of Hope were reported as existing in London, and these received regular addresses and other assistance from the union. Of 3237 young people belonging to Bands of Hope, it was found that their average age was 18 years, and their length of abstinence 11 years and nine months.

plebiscitum was held in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Almost everybody voted in favor of Victor Emmanuel, and he made his entry into the city seated in a carriage by the side of Garibaldi, who, immediately after the ceremony was over, retired to Caprera in the modest capacity of President of the Committee for the Liberation of Rome and Venice.

In August, 1862, pressed by Mazzini and the party of action, Garibaldi undertook his unfortunate expedition to Rome. After having once more reached Calabria, he marched on Reggio with some 2000 men, but was met by Cialdini, who repulsed him and drove him back to Aspromonte, where he was attacked by Pallavicini, severely wounded, transported to Spezia and subsequently to Pisa. That the troops of the King of Italy should have shot and wounded Garibaldi, who had been so loyal to him and who had done so much for him, was accounted throughout Europe a scandalous thing, but it was obvious that Italy was not then strong enough to defy the enemies Garibaldi's success would have aroused against her. The policy of the Italian Government was sagacious, and its cruelty was regretted as much by those who dictated it as by those who sympathized with Garibaldi.

When he had recovered from his wound Garibaldi paid

A VISIT TO ENGLAND, and it may be safely said that no foreign visitor, not excepting Kossuth, was ever received with such demonstrations of enthusiasm by the people. He was greeted on his arrival in London by an immense concourse of people, and was entertained by several leading members of the aristocracy, prominent among whom were the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland. He was specially honored with a magnificent banquet by the Lord Mayor and the City of London.

illustrates the popular ovation which was accorded him upon leaving the Mansion House after the banquet. Thousands crowded around the carriage of the red-shirted hero, that they might grasp his hand, and for hours the route to the Duke of Sutherland's mansion was impassable, and the enthusiasm unbounded.

In 1866 he again took the field, was engaged in operations in the Tyrol, and sustained a severe repulse from the Austrians in July, which he immediately retrieved. In 1867 he determined to complete, if possible, the unification of Italy. He therefore organized an invasion of the States of the Church. The Government arrested Garibaldi, and he was permitted to return to Caprera, but only as a prisoner, a man-of-war being stationed there to prevent his escape.

This vigilance, however, was unavailing, for on the 14th of October he fled to Florence, harangued the populace, and started on the 22d to join the insurgent bands on the Roman frontier. At the head of four battalions of volunteers he defeated the Pontifical troops at Monte Rotondo on October 26th, but a few weeks later he sustained a crushing defeat at Mentana.

He again retired to his island home, but on hearing of the downfall of the French Empire, in 1870, he again left it, and, hastening to France, he placed his sword at the disposal of the Government of the National Defence. For a little time he had command of the army of the Vosges, but in February 1871, once more sought the retirement of Caprera. It was in 1870 that France, whose soldiers had guarded the Pope at Rome, needed all her military strength to cope with Germany, and the garrison being withdrawn, the evacuation of Rome was the consequence. Negotiations were effected by which the Italians and Garibaldians occupied the city, and Rome became the capital of a united and liberated Italy, and the temporal power of the Pope was broken for ever.

From that time until his death on June 2d, the grand old man has made his home at Caprera, rarely leaving it for a lengthened period. His career as a member of the Italian Parliament was not a success. Garibaldi was a soldier, he was neither a statesman nor a diplomatist, and when he assumed either rôle he became the victim of designing men, who took advantage of his simple, guileless nature to gain his name as a credit to foolish and sometimes wicked schemes. His life too was embittered by domestic troubles, for since Anita's death he was twice married, and on neither occasion was the union a happy one. His children, too, were a source of anxiety to him; but throughout his declining years he maintained the calm composure and cheerful spirit which had distinguished him in his days of trial and hardship. Caprera had many visitors eager to look on the aged hero, and they were always sure of a cordial welcome.

The last two years of his life he spent as a confirmed invalid, and his friends knew that should any serious illness attack him he would succumb. When, therefore, it was announced a few weeks ago that Garibaldi was suffering from bronchitis, all felt that the end of his glorious life was at hand. He died calmly on June 2d, and the brave soldier, the ardent patriot, and self-sacrificing conqueror passed away from the scene of his struggles and victories.

A TIMELY RESCUE.

Two young men were strolling along the beach one summer morning in the neighborhood of a famous seaside resort on the Atlantic coast. They were intimate friends, and had been so ever since as little boys they went to the same village school together. They were now preparing to enter the great business world and were full of enthusiasm as to their future. One of them, Charles Stone, was to be a stockbroker, and his companion, George Wilson, was studying for the legal profession.

"I wish I could have been a soldier or a sailor," said George. "There would have been so much chance to distinguish oneself then and win a great name. A lawyer may become very learned and very rich, but he has not an opportunity for great deeds. I feel now that I could lead a far more lorn hope with pride or head company of soldiers on a desperate charge without a sensation of fear. I expect to get on prettily well, and I suppose I shall have my share of the good things of the profession, but I would have preferred to wear a uniform and had a chance of showing the world what I can do."

"Yes," said his friend, "a soldier's life I admit has charms for the brave and stalwart, but I have an idea that moral courage is after all a higher type of quality than physical courage, and it is not necessary to be in the army to show that. I think the bravest boy in our school was not that big bully, Robinson, who was always ready for a fight, at whom you and I have seen many a time with his face bruised and bleeding, fighting on when I could scarcely see. I think Tom Hirst was a braver lad. You remember that night in the bedroom when he knelt down before all the boys to say his prayers, and kept it up, too, night after night in spite of their sneers and coarse jokes."

"Well, that is not my idea of courage," said George. "Robinson, whom you call a bully, is certainly a fine fellow, and he did not care how the fellow was who offended him, he would always hit him. But then you were always one of Tom Hirst's sort, and I have seen you many a time let fellow insult you and put upon you without resenting it. You and I have always been good friends and have always liked you, but if any trouble came between you and me together I fancy the fighting would fall to my share."

The conversation was interrupted here by the young men arriving at the high rocks which they had started out to climb. They were almost perpendicular and in climbing they had no breath spare for talk. Having reached the summit they rested for a few minutes and then commenced their descent. They proceeded cautiously, picking their way over the projections and making as winding a path as possible. But when about half way down George Wilson set his foot on a piece of moss and slipped; quick as thought he was precipitated to the foot of the rocks and lay there bruised and groaning. Charles was soon by his side assisting him to rise. But it was of no use. His ankle was badly sprained and he could not stand. What was to be done? There was no way from the spot where the young men were, except over the rock which could not be climbed by any one with a sprained ankle, and George was too heavy a weight to be carried by Charles, who was of much slighter build than his friend. The case was serious, and to their horror they saw that the tide was rising and in less than half an hour the place where they were would be covered with the waves.

"Leave me here, Charles," said the prostrate youth; "save yourself, you cannot help me. There is no one about who could help you and I am of no use your staying to die with me."

But that was not Charles's idea of the duties of friendship, and he summarily disposed of his friend's entreaty without argument. "No, my boy," he said, "I shall not desert you. You said just now that I had not much courage, but I should be a coward indeed to leave you now. It is pretty clear, though, that it is all over with us both, and I should like to pray before we die." So the young Christian knelt down by his friend and there commended his soul and that of his companion to the keeping of Jesus, to whom he had some months before given his heart.

It was a solemn time, but he arose from his knees refreshed and strengthened. The water had advanced close to the spot where they were, and they saw that a very short time would suffice to end their lives. They were looking sadly at the advancing flood, when Charles sprang to his feet with a cry of joy, "A boat! a boat!" he cried; and there in the distance they saw two people rowing across the bay. Charles shouted and waved his cap again and again, and at last, to their intense joy, they heard the answering cry from the boat and saw that it was approaching them.

The two young men were speedily taken on board and borne to the town in safety. It was an experience neither of them ever forgot; and in after years, when both of them were working for Jesus, the incident was often described as an illustration of the sacrifice of Jesus, who not only had compassion on the lost and perishing, but actually gave up His life that they might be saved.

THE BROTHER'S FAREWELL.

It is a sad word, and many a heart has been well-nigh broken when the tongue gave it utterance. But in this world of changes the word must often be spoken, and it is well for those who part when they are assured that, however widely they may be separated, and however improbable it is that they will meet again in this life, they will be certain to meet beyond the grave in the mansions Christ has gone to prepare for those who love Him. These were the thoughts passing in the mind of a young man of twenty-five years one gloomy winter morning as he took his way down to the west side of New York City, where the great ocean vessels lay awaiting their cargo and passengers. The young man walked very sadly through the big shed on the pier and crossing the gang-plank stepped on board a vessel which was to leave in an hour. He glanced rapidly over the groups of men and women there, who on business or pleasure were about to leave the friendly shores of their native land.

Soon his eye fell on the person he had come to meet. His brother, Arthur Hamilton, was standing looking at the busy scene, his travelling rug thrown over his arm, and his luggage lying on the deck at his side.

The two young men were the only sons of a merchant who had lately died, and Arthur, the younger, was taking the portion of goods that had fallen to him and was going to Europe as he said, "to see life." His elder brother Alfred had vainly endeavored to persuade him to remain in America and to help him in carrying on their father's business. But Arthur steadily refused to lead a humdrum life, and his brother was now come on board to bid him a sad farewell. Arthur had been the favorite son of his parents, but he had never been a good lad, and now that the restraints of home were removed, Alfred had only too substantial ground for fearing that his younger brother would suffer shipwreck in the voyage of life.

"I do not want to preach to you, as you call it, my boy," said Alfred, "but I do beg of you for your own sake that you will pray to God to keep you from temptation and sin. You are going where you may be tempted, but He is able to save you, and He will if you ask Him in faith."

"O there you are with your canting talk, Alfred," said Arthur. "I do wish you would not be always lecturing me as if you were a parson. Now you just rest contented and let me go and enjoy myself for a year or two and then I will come back and settle down quietly and be a steady, respectable churchgoer, and you shall come and talk to me every day like a father. You will see that after I have seen the world I shall not be any the worse, but shall be able to settle my religious affairs to your satisfaction, all in good time."

So the brothers parted. As the last strokes of the bell were heard Alfred clasped his brother's hand, gave it a hearty shake and crossed the gang-plank to the shore, sick at heart and with gloomy forebodings.

Two years passed and Arthur had written to his brother only three or four letters describing the cities through which he passed and announcing in his last epistle that he intended spending the coming winter in Paris. That was the last letter Alfred ever received from the traveller. A letter came to him from a doctor a few months afterward, saying that he had been attending a young American, who in dying begged him to write to Alfred Hamilton and gave him the melancholy intelligence. The kind-hearted doctor refrained from wounding his correspondent's heart, but if he had told the whole of what he knew, he would have said that Arthur Hamilton died of dissipation.

Alfred learned something of this afterward, and he reflected with sad thoughts on his brother's parting words, "all in good time." Like thousands of men he had counted on years of opportunity that he never enjoyed, and now throughout eternity he must suffer the consequences of his procrastination.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

As a Hired Servant.

FROM a profound and dreamless sleep Jean Merle awoke early the next morning, with the blessed feeling of being at home again in his father's house. The heavy cross-beams of black oak dividing the ceiling into panels; the low broad lattice window with a few upper panes of old stained glass; the faded familiar pictures on the wall; these all awoke in him memories of his earliest years.

But the dead past must bury its dead. If there had ever been a deeply buried, hidden hope, that a possible return to something of the old life lay in the unknown future, it was now utterly uprooted. Such a return was only possible over the ruined lives and broken hearts of Felicita and his children. If he made himself known, though he might be secure against prosecution, the story of his former crime would revive, and spread wider, joined with the fair name of Felicita, than it would have done when he was merely a fraudulent banker in a country town. However true it might be what Phebe maintained, that he might then have suffered the penalty of his sin, and afterward retrieved the past, while his children were too young to feel the full bitterness of the shame, it was too late to do it now. The name he had dishonored was for ever forfeited. His return to his former life was hedged up on every hand.

He was a broken-hearted man, who had cut himself off from all human ties and affections, and who was longing to feel that he was not forsaken of the universal Brother and Saviour. His cry was, "My soul thirsteth for Thee; my flesh longeth for Thee, in a dry and weary land, where no water is." It was his own fault that he was in the dry and weary wilderness; but oh! if Christ would not forsake him there, would dwell with him, even in this desert made desolate by himself, then at last he might find peace to his soul.

There was a deep inner consciousness, the forgotten but not obliterated faith of his boyhood and youth, before the world with its pomps and ambitions had laid its iron hand upon him, that Christ was with him, leading him day by day, if he would but follow nearer to God. Was it impossible to follow His guidance now? Could he not, even yet, take up his cross, and be willing to fill any place which he could yet fill worthily and humbly; expiating his sins against his fellow-men by truer devotion to their service, as Jean Merle, the working-man; not as Roland Sefton, the prosperous and fraudulent banker.

This return to his father's house, and all its associations, solemn and sacred with a peculiar sacredness and solemnity, seemed to him a pledge that he could once more be admitted into the great brotherhood and home of Christ's disciples. Every object on which his eye rested smote him, but it was with the stroke of a friend. A clear and sweet light from heaven shed its penetrating rays into the darkest corners of his soul. Forgiven! God had forgiven him; and man had forgiven him. Before him lay an obscure and humble path; but the heaviest part of his burden was gone. He must go heavy-laden to the end of his days, treading in rough paths; but despair had fled, and with it the sense of being separated from God and man.

He heard the feeble, yet deep old voice of Mr. Clifford outside his door inquiring from Mrs. Nixey if Mr. Merle was gone down stairs yet. He made haste to go down, treading the old staircase with something of the alacrity of former days. Phebe was in the dining-room, and the servants came in to prayer as they had been used to do forty years ago when he was a child. An old-world tranquillity and peacefulness was in the familiar scene; which breathed a deep calm over his tempest-tossed spirit.

"Phebe has been telling me all," said Mr. Clifford when breakfast was over; "tell me what can be done to save Felicita and the children."

"I am Jean Merle," he answered with a melancholy smile; "Jean Merle, and no one else. I come back with no claims, and they must never know me. Why should I cross their path and blight it? I cannot atone for the past in any way, except by keeping away forever from them. I shall injure no one by continuing to be Jean Merle."

"No," said Phebe, "it is too late now, and it would kill Felicita."

"This morning a thought struck me," he continued, "a project for my future life, which you can help me to put into execution, Phebe. I have an intolerable dread of losing sight of you all again; let me be at least somewhere in England, where you can now and then give me tidings of my children and Felicita."

"I will do anything in the world to help you," cried Phebe eagerly.

"Then let me go to your little farm," he answered, "and take up your father's life, at least for a time, until I can see how to make myself of greater use to my fellow-men. I will till the fields as he did, and finish the carvings he has left undone, and live his simple, silent life. It will be good for me, and I shall not be banished from my own country. I shall be a happier man than I have any right to be."

"Have you no fear of being recognized?" she asked.

"None," he replied. "Look at me, Phebe. Should you have known me again if I had not betrayed myself to you?"

"I should have known you again anywhere!" she exclaimed. But it was her heart that cried out that no change could have concealed him from her; there was a dread lying deep down in her conscience that she might have passed him by with no suspicion. He shook his head in answer to her assertion.

"I will go out into the town," he continued, "and speak to half a dozen men who knew me best, and there will be no gleam of recognition in their eyes. Recollect, Roland Sefton is dead, and has been dead so long that there will be no clear memory left of him as he was then to compare with me. And any dim resemblance to him will be fully accounted for by my relationship to Madame Sefton. No, I am not afraid of the keenest eyes."

He went out as he had said, and met his old townsmen, many of whom were themselves so changed that he could barely recognize them. But none knew him. The memory of Roland Sefton was blotted out; he was utterly forgotten, as a dead man out of mind.

As Jean Merle strayed through the streets crowded with market-people come in from the country, his new scheme grew stronger and brighter to him. It would keep him in England, within reach of all he had loved and had lost. The little place was dear to him, and the laborious, secluded peasant life had a charm for one who had so long lived as a Swiss peasant. By-and-by, he thought, the chance resemblance in the names would merge that of Merle into the more familiar name of Marlowe; and the identity of his pursuits with those of the deaf and dumb old man would hasten such a change. So the years to come would pass by in labor and obscurity; and an obscure grave in the little churchyard, where all the Marlowes lay, would shelter him at last. A quiet haven after many storms; but oh! what a shipwreck had he made of his life!

All the morning Mr. Clifford sat in his arm-chair, lost in thought, only looking up sometimes to ply Phebe with questions. When Jean Merle returned, his gray, meditative face grew bright, with a faint smile shining through his dim eyes.

"You are no phantom then?" he said. "I've been so used to your company as a ghost that when you are out of sight I fancy myself dreaming. I could not let Phebe go away lest I should feel that all this is not real. Did any one know you again?"

"Not a soul," he answered; "how could they? Mrs. Nixey herself has no remembrance of me. There is no fear of my being known."

"Then I want you to stay with me," said old Mr. Clifford eagerly; "I'm a lonely man, seventy-seven years old, with neither kith nor kin, and it seems a long and dreary road to the grave. I want one to sit beside me in these long evenings, and to take care of me as a son takes care of his old father. Could you do it, Jean Merle? I beseech you, if it is possible, give me your services in my old age."

"It will be hard for you," pleaded Phebe, in a low voice; "harder than going out alone to my little home. But you would do more good here, you could save us from anxiety, for we are often very anxious and sorrowful about Mr. Clifford. I can take care that you should always know before Felix and Hilda come down. Felicita never comes."

How much harder it would be for him even Phebe could not guess. To dwell within reach of his old home was altogether different from living in it, with its countless memories, and the unremitting stings of conscience. To have about him all that he had lost and made desolate; the empty home, from which all the familiar faces and beloved voices had vanished; this lot surely was harder than the humble, laborious life of old Marlowe on the hills. Yet if any one living had a claim upon him for such self-sacrifice, it was this feeble, tottering old man, who was gazing up into his face with urgent and imploring eyes.

"I will stay here and be your servant," he answered, "if there appears no reason against it when we have given it more thought."

For the first time in her life those who were about Phebe Marlowe felt that she was under a cloud. The sweet sunny atmosphere, as of a clear and peaceful day, which seemed to surround her, had fled. She was absent and depressed, and avoided society, even that of Hilda, who had been like her own child to her. Toward Felicita there was a subtle change in Phebe's manner, which could not fail to impress deeply her sensitive temperament. She felt that Phebe shrank from her, and that she was no longer welcome in the studio, which of all places in the world had been to her a place of repose and of brief cessation of troubled thought.

Phebe's direct and simple nature, free from guile and worldliness, had made her a perfect sympathizer with any true feeling. And Felicita feeling with regard to her past most sorrowful had been absolutely real; if only Phebe had known all the circumstances of it, as she had always supposed she did.

Phebe was, moreover, fearful of some accident betraying to Felicita the circumstance of Jean Merle living at Riversborough. There had never been any direct correspondence between Felicita and Mr. Clifford, except on purely business matters; and Felix was too much engrossed with his own affairs to find time to run down to Riversborough, or to keep up an animated interchange of letters with his old friend there. The intercourse between them had been chiefly carried through Phebe herself, who was the old man's prime favorite. Neither was he a man likely to out anything he might wish to conceal.

But still she was nervous and afraid. How! from improbable it was that through some unthought-of channel Felicita might hear that stranger, related to Madame Sefton, had entered the household of Mr. Clifford as his confidential attendant, and that this stranger's name was Jean Merle. What would happen then?

She was burdened with a secret, and her nature abhorred a secret. There was gladness, almost utterly pure, to her in the belief that there was One Being who could read the inmost recesses of her heart, and see, with the lovingkindness of an Allwise Father, its secret faults, the errors which she did not herself understand. That she had nothing to tell to God, which He did not know, her already, was one of the deepest foundations of her spiritual life. And in some measure, in a possible measure, she would have had it so with those whom she loved. She did not shrink from showing to them her thoughts, and motives, and emotions. It was the limit of expression, so quickly reached, so impassable, that chafed her and she was always searching for fresh modes of conveying her own feeling to other souls.

Possibly the enforced speechlessness in which she had passed her early years had aided in creating this passionate desire to impart herself to those about her in unfettered communion; and she was as delighted in the same unreserved confidence in those who conversed with her. But now she was doomed to bear the burden of a secret, fraught with strange and painful consequences to those whom she loved, if time should ever divulge it.

The winter months passed away cheerlessly though she worked with more persistent energy than ever before, partly to drive away the thought that troubled her. She heard from Mr. Clifford but not more frequently than usual, and Jean Merle did not venture upon sending her a line of his handwriting. Mr. Clifford spoke in guarded terms of the comfort he found in the companionship of his attendant, in spite of his being a sad and moody man. Now and then he told Phebe that this attendant of his had gone away to her solitary little house on the uplands, of which Simon Nixey kept the key, and that he stayed there a day or two, finishing the half-carved blocks of oak he father had left incomplete. It would have been a happier existence, she knew, for himself, if Jean Merle had gone to dwell there altogether; but it was along this path of self-sacrifice and devotion alone lay the road back to a Christian life.

One point troubled Phebe's conscience more than any other. Ought she not at least to tell Canon Pascal what she knew? She could not help feeling that this second fraud would be worse in his estimation than the first one. And Felicita, the very soul of truth and honor, had connived at it. It seemed immeasurably more terrible in Phebe's own eyes. To her money had so small a value, it lay on so low a level in the scale of life, that a crime in connection with it had far less guilt than one against the affections.

And how unutterable a sin against all who loved him had Roland and Felicita fallen into! She recalled his mother's mourning for him through many long years, and her belief in death that she was going soon to rejoin the beloved son whom she had lost. Her own grief she put aside, but there was the deep, boyish sorrow of Felix, and even little Hilda's fatherlessness, as the children had grown up through the various stages of childhood. It might have been bad for them to bear the stigma of their father's shame, but still Phebe believed it would have been better for every one of them to have gone bravely forward to bear the just consequences of sin.

She went down into Essex to spend a day or two at Christmas, carrying with her the fitful spirit so foreign to her. The perfect health that had been hers hitherto was broken; and Mrs. Pascal, a confirmed invalid, to whom Phebe's physical vigor and evenness of temper had been a constant source of delight and invigoration, felt the change in her keenly.

"She has something on her mind," she said to her husband; "you must try and find it out, or she will be ill."

"I know she has a secret," he answered, "but it is not her own. Phebe Marlowe is as open as the day, she will never have a secret of her own."

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S.S. Lesson for June 25. Golden Text, Acts 2:22.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

In our lessons for the past quarter we have seen Jesus, as our golden text says, "a Man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by Him." In His twice-wrought miracle of multiplying the loaves and fishes, we have seen His sovereign power at work, on behalf of those who were weary, and needy, and hungry; we learned something of the wealth of His resources, and we ought to have learned the wrong we do to God, whenever a shadow of care or anxiety about things temporal rests for a moment upon our minds.

HE IS OUR CARETAKER,

how could we have a better! We saw His miraculous power in exercise when not only He walked upon the water but He also enabled Peter to do the same. Surely He teaches us to recognize no difficulties, but in the path where He calls us to tread, to rise by faith above all difficulties, all apparent impossibilities, in our close alliance with Him who created and who controls all the powers of nature.

He can never bring us to the Red Sea and bid us go forward, without taking the responsibility of making a way in the sea, a path in the mighty waters. He will not bring us to an overflowing Jordan, and bid us pass over, without a pillar of fire or of cloud to pioneer us, and to make a way for His redeemed to walk in. If He calls us to endure a furnace of fire, as did the Hebrew youths of old, He will be in the midst to guarantee that we shall not be burned.

Carnal minds will argue perhaps, "Why, if His power was so great did He not employ it in the release from prison of His devoted pioneer John the Baptist?" for there are those who, understanding little of the almightiness and majesty of God, look upon His power as so much material to be used up at pleasure. When Jesus began to minister, the work of the Baptist was concluded, he was promoted from service below to service in the immediate presence of God. Who will say that he was any worse for having died by the will of God at the hands of a tyrant like Herod?

We have seen two special subjects of the Lord's teaching to His own disciples. Unbelief in the first instance. He showed them how the repeated manifestations of His miraculous power in their deliverance left them just as careful and troubled about things temporal, about circumstances and earthly resources, as though the mighty Saviour had never been revealed to them. This was the more humbling because they had witnessed the loss of the people of Nazareth, who had had Jesus among them, able and willing to heal and to do His mighty works; and yet scarcely anything happened there; He only "laid His hands on a few sick folk, and healed them." Then, when they asked Him why they could not cast out the evil spirit from the afflicted child, He showed them that their unbelief was the one cause.

How little we know the terrible unbelief of our hearts! Were it not for our unbelief, we should now be doing the works which Jesus did, and yet greater works, because He is gone to His Father, and His presence in heaven is the guarantee that He will give the Holy Spirit to His believing people. He also taught them

THE LESSON OF THE CROSS.

No sooner had Peter owned his Lord to be "the Christ of God" than Jesus taught all His disciples how the Son of man must suffer, be rejected, killed, and rise again the third day. And when Peter could not, or would not, understand Him, He taught them all that whoso will come after Him must also deny himself, take up his cross and follow that suffering and rejected Saviour. He taught them that which they never fully possessed and experienced until they were baptized with the Holy Ghost—the great lesson of losing their own life and thereby saving it. On earth, among ordinary men, "All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's; their own pleasure, not His pleasure; their own fame, not His fame; their own convenience, not His; but Jesus taught us to lay down our life, i.e., our own pleasure, fame, convenience, choice, in favor of Him; and He taught that all other Christianity than this is but savorless salt, utterly useless and contemptible."

The disciples did not understand. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine" (John 7:17); when any man is willing to give up his own life, he soon understands how to do it; it is a thing learned only in the doing. Again and again Jesus repeated this lesson; after His transfiguration, and again after the healing of the child; but His words met with the same dull unopened hearts. And is it not so now among many who call themselves Christians? They will have anything which will not cost them something, anything which will not make them peculiar, which will not take them out of their position, which will not interfere with their habits, convenience, or comfort, anything which will not compromise them with their family; anything, in fact, which brings them no self-denial, no cross. But the very spirit of Christianity is to deny ourselves; to live, and do, and speak at a cost to ourselves. If it is not worth the cost,

BETTER GIVE IT UP;

if it is not worth while to be peculiar for Christ's sake, if He is not worth more than our position, if our habits, convenience, or comfort are more to us than He is, if our tie to Him is not even closer than that of our nearest relations, it is clear that He has not yet the throne of our hearts; we are living still unto ourselves and not unto Him which died for us and rose again.

As part of the same lesson He taught them humility, and showed them that Christianity is the exact reverse of nature, for it makes the least greatest and the last first; the cup of cold water given in the name of a disciple as great or greater than the working of a miracle; the widow's mite a greater gift than the abundance of the more opulent. He taught thoroughness also in His complete exposure of the heart of man, from which proceeds all evil; and again in His appeal to the disciples to cut off hand or foot, or to pluck out the eye, rather than suffer a hindrance to their souls.

Besides this teaching to His own followers, we have seen our Lord engaged in teaching the Pharisees. It was a kind to which they were unused, for He exposed their hollowness and externalism, and left them no ground to stand upon. There was power in all He said; acceptable or unacceptable it was true; it could not go in at one ear and out at the other; no one who heard Him, no one who hears His truth now, when preached in the power of the Holy Ghost, can remain neutral, the hearer must either take sides with Him or declare openly against Him. The Pharisees did the latter, and their successors in self-righteousness are doing the same thing this very day.

Besides His miracles and His teaching, we have seen our Lord constantly, almost daily, engaged in HIS WORK OF HEALING.

It pervades all the four chapters from which our lessons have been drawn. In the sixth chapter we see Him at Nazareth, hindered by the unbelief of

His own townspeople from doing any mighty work, "save that He laid His hands upon a few sick folk and healed them." In the same chapter we read of His sending the twelve, two and two, and giving them power over unclean spirits; and immediately following we have this account, "They went out, and preached that men should repent. And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them." It is in the very same chapter that we read of His coming into the land of Gennesaret, and how the people carried about the sick in beds where they heard He was, and in the villages and towns they laid them "in the streets, and besought Him that they might touch if it were but the border of His garment; and as many as touched Him were made whole."

Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, my readers, that Jesus should heal the sick? "This same Jesus" is not altered. He is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever" (Heb. 13:8). He came to set all wrong things right, to do good and to heal all that are oppressed of the devil (Acts 10:38) in spirit, soul, or body; and, blessed be His name, He is giving us tokens of it, for we continually see and hear of those who are healed in the name of, and by faith in, the Lord Jesus.

It is very striking in the Acts of the Apostles that whenever there was a special power of the Holy Spirit manifested, it seems to have been accompanied by

of life and power of testimony, and at the same time by increased power to heal. It was when "great grace was upon them all" that the very shadow of Peter passing by was used to heal the sick, and it was when the tide of divine life rose high at Ephesus, that handkerchiefs and aprons from the body of Paul were brought to the sick, "and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them" (Acts 19:12). As it is the Holy Ghost who brings our souls in contact with Christ for healing, so it is the Holy Ghost which makes us apprehend and experience His healing power in our bodies; and the more full of the Spirit is a company of Christians, the easier it becomes for one in their midst to be healed of spiritual or physical disease. The Lord give us all more of His Spirit that His power may be made manifest among us, that His kingdom may come, and His will be done! Amen!

THE PERSECUTED RUSSIAN JEWS.

THE number of Jewish refugees arriving in Galicia from Russia is constantly increasing. The fugitives from Kitaigrod and Mohileff give the most appalling accounts of the treatment suffered by the Hebrew inhabitants of those towns. Five hundred workmen have emigrated from Gordno. Some 7000 Jewish families have applied to the Emigration Committee at Jaffa for assistance to enable them to settle in Palestine. There is an exodus of the Jews from all parts of Russia. 9000 have already left Russian territory.

The Vienna Presse's correspondent at Brody says the condition of the Jews there is more terrible than previous telegrams led the public to suppose. Complaint has been made against the Liverpool Relief Committee that they only transport strong young men to America, while men and women with large families are left at Brody. Starvation is increasing and sickness is widespread. The emigration from Russia is still progressing, and the Jews are selling the whole of their property at any cost and hurrying to the frontier. A later telegram states that the Mayor of Lemberg has directed the Relief Committee of that town to commence disbursing the funds hitherto held back.

A despatch from Berlin to the London Telegraph states that the Jewish Committee have resolved that they will only help those whom the action of the Russian authorities or the destruction of their property obliges to emigrate, as they are no longer able to assist voluntary emigrants. The Moscow Gazette states that seventy of the principal firms there have addressed an important memorial to the Minister of Finance setting forth the disastrous consequences of expelling the Jews from Moscow. Three hundred students have started for Canada.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Funeral of Garibaldi took Place on June 8th. The remains were interred in the cemetery at Caprera. The funeral ceremonies began at a quarter to four o'clock and closed at five o'clock. A storm of wind and rain raged the whole time. The coffin, covered with garlands and flowers, was borne by some of the survivors of the Thousand of Marsala, and was followed by the Duke of Genoa, Signor Zanardelli, General Ferrero, the representatives of both Chambers and delegates of 300 various associations. Speeches were delivered at the grave by the vice-president of the Senate, the president of the Chamber of Deputies, the two cabinet ministers who were present, and Signor Crispi. As the coffin was lowered into the grave salutes were fired by the Italian men-of-war Washington and Cariddi. A despatch from Rome to the London Standard says: "It is rumored that sooner or later the body of Garibaldi will be removed to the Pantheon in that city."

The Sultan of Turkey has Despatched a commissioner to Egypt to endeavor to restore order. The commissioner, whose name is Dervisch Pacha, has been received with tokens of respect by all parties. As he passed through the streets of Cairo shouts were raised of "God give victory to Islam! Confound the infidels! God save the Sultan and the national party!" The correspondent at Cairo of the New York Herald says, "No such show of fanaticism has been known in Egypt for years. Arabi Bey made a great military display, two regiments being in attendance. Dervisch Pacha presented two letters to the Khédive from the Sultan, declaring that it was Dervisch's mission to reassert the power of the Khédive. All the consuls general separately visited Dervisch Pacha, except the representatives of England and France, who called upon him together. Dervisch Pacha said he hoped to succeed in arranging the present difficulties." Serious riots broke out last Sunday between the natives and Europeans, during which several persons were killed and wounded, and a number of houses destroyed. There was fighting before the French Consulate, to which several of these mortally wounded at the outbreak of the riots were conveyed. The disturbances continued some time before the authorities took any steps to suppress them. The English Consul was severely hurt, receiving a blow from a bludgeon. An engineer of the British man-of-war Superb was killed. The Greek Consul and the Italian Vice-Consul were also severely wounded. The disturbances continued five hours, when a body of military appeared and dispersed the rioters.

The British Parliament is still Engaged in the consideration of the bill for the repression of crime in Ireland. In the course of the debate it was stated by Mr. Trevelyan, the Secretary for Ireland, that of seventeen agrarian murders last year there had not been one conviction. It was also stated that the number of outrages reported to the Irish constabulary during the month of May was 396, including two murders exclusive of the Phoenix Park affair. The Land League party in the House of Commons are receiving aid from the radical wing of the Liberal party, and thus assisted hope to obstruct the passage of the bill for above a month. Outside the House the Irish leaders are making inflammatory speeches. Mr. Davitt especially denounces the bill as "a purely wanton attempt to interfere with Irish liberty." There is, however, a strong feeling manifested throughout Great Britain that Irish liberty, by which appears to be meant liberty to murder, needs to be "interfered with."

Another Series of Outrages is Reported from Ireland. A Galway landlord, named Walter M. Bourke, of Rahasane, was shot dead on Thursday, June 8th. A private soldier, who formed his escort, also fell under the deadly fire. The murder occurred at Ardahan, seven miles north of Gort. Mr. Bourke was riding in front of his dragoon escort, when a volley from rifles was fired at them from behind a wall and both fell dead. Mr. Bourke was a magistrate and son of the late Crown Solicitor for Mayo. He was a barrister by profession and had amassed a fortune in India. He possessed two estates in Ireland—one at Cur-raleagh and the other at Rahasane. After returning from India he contested the seat in Parliament for Mayo. An attempt has been made to assassinate a farmer of Rathglass, county Mayo. Six men walked up to him in a field and asked him why he had taken a farm when he was warned against doing so. One man then placed a revolver against his forehead and said: "Now you will receive your reward." Another man interposed and said: "Do not kill him. He may be a good man yet." They then fired six shots at him, lodging two bullets in his thigh. Another attempt was made to murder an extensive farmer and mill-owner, living at Curraghtrench, county Roscommon. The farmer, who had had some quarrels with his neighbors about cutting turf in his bog, was standing at three o'clock in his farm yard, when three men with blackened faces, carrying heavy bludgeons, jumped over the wall and attacked him in a most savage manner. Drawing their revolvers they fired several shots, three of which took effect, one bullet lodging in his hip, another breaking his leg above the knee and a third smashing his foot below the ankle. The injured man was sinking rapidly when the last despatch from the place was sent.

A New Scheme of a Communistic Character is being advocated by Mr. Davitt for the settlement of the land question in Ireland. In a speech delivered in Liverpool on June 8th, previous to his sailing for this country, he announced his adhesion to the doctrine of state ownership of land in every country, and indicated, while denying, a divergence of opinion between himself and Mr. Parnell, as to the ultimate solution of the Irish land question. Mr. Davitt said that all the land of Ireland could be purchased for $700,000,000 in government bonds repayable in fifty years. Mr. Parnell is opposed to the new scheme, on the ground that in exchange for ownership it offers the tenants an impersonal landlord with rents varying from year to year in fixed proportion to the production of the soil, so that whoever worked hardest and most skillfully would have to pay the most rent. He also opposes it because it is based on communistic principles and believes that if it is adopted by the Land League large numbers of English liberals who are now in sympathy with the movement would abandon it. There are indications, however, that the scheme is favorably received by the more radical members of the League.

The Adulteration of American Cotton has formed the subject of numerous complaints from British merchants. An attempt has now been made to induce the British Government to take action in the matter. At a meeting of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce held on June 7th, a communication was received from the Foreign Office concerning the adulteration. The Secretary of the chamber was instructed to write to the Foreign Office, giving particulars and recommending that the influence of the British Embassy at Washington be brought to bear against the practice.

Mutilated Russian Jews to the Number of 125 have been received in a single hospital at Odessa. The New York Times publishes a communication from an Austrian physician who visited the hospital and describes some of the horrors he witnessed there. The most of the wounds, he says, were of a very dangerous character, "the aggressors having been cruel enough to pour spirits and petroleum into them." Did they resist this treatment, the Russians cut off arms and legs, and carried them to the woods as food for wolves. One young woman of 18 years had her "breast cut off with a sword, while her baby had its eyes put out with a red-hot iron." On Easter eve, she says, "a wild horde burst open her door, took her baby and threatened not to return it until she had given up all the money and valuables in the house. She fetched all she had. When the child was returned to her, its eyes had already been put out. In her despair she threw herself upon those who had done the horrible deed, but they flung her to the ground, treated her in the most horrible fashion imaginable, and when her husband returned and drew a revolver, he was thrown to the ground also, bound with cords, and forced to look on while the monsters cut his wife's breast clean away. She was left lying there with her baby, but the man was carried off, and she has never heard of him since." "An old man with a white beard had had his arm broken in three places; another had had both his feet sawed off; one boy's breast was cleft in two, and another's teeth were torn out." These cases were actually seen by the Austrian physician, and the horrors were perpetrated by the men whom Mme. Ragozin and her friends would have us regard as humane and civilized beings.

Mr. Moody's Labors in Glasgow Continue to attract large congregations, and the association formed to organize the work in the city has on its books the names and addresses of over 4000 persons who have professed to have received blessings at this time; these names are being arranged according to districts; a hundred Christian friends have been appointed, so that every case may be visited, and each individual presented with a copy of Mr. Moody's book on "Heaven." The names of those who have had no regular church connection—and these form the greater number—will be handed shortly to ministers who, in the different districts, will be likely to watch with pastoral solicitude over the new converts. New names and addresses are still coming in.

The Opening of the New Head-Quarters of the Salvation Army in England was celebrated on May 13th. General Booth presided. The headquarters, a picture of which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 22d, 1881, is to be known as the "National Barracks and Congress Hall." It is situated at Clapton, and has been purchased and refitted on behalf of the Salvation Army at the cost of $115,000. At the opening of the proceedings, which were enthusiastic, there was a debt of nearly $40,000, but more than half this sum was subscribed for on the spot. The third "War Congress" was opened in the new hall on the following Monday.

The Famine in Asia Minor appears to be more serious than was reported. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions at Boston has received a letter from Mr. Bartlett, an American missionary at Talas, a city near Cesarea, in Asia Minor, dated April 18th, which says, "From one-half to three-fourths of the people in many villages are already destitute, and there are yet three months to the harvest at Dendil. Out of 130 families 80 are reported as in absolute want. In some of the houses the morning meal consists simply of a kind of weed used for greens, with a slight sprinkling of cracked wheat boiled, together forming a sort of soup or porridge and eaten without bread or any other kind of food. If friends in America have heart and means to grant some aid to these sufferers many lives may yet be saved."

Lord Radstock, the English Nobleman whose preaching has been so signally blessed in his own land, has been holding a series of Gospel services at St. Petersburg, which have proved both interesting and successful. It is remarked that the simple story of the Cross of Christ meets with much acceptance among the Russians.

Vol. IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1881, with complete index. Price, $3 including postage: ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

L. Moody in Chicago—His Triumphant Death.

A NAME highly honored in the Christian church throughout America is that of Henry Moorhouse. Mr. Moody has often spoken publicly of his indebtedness to the young evangelist and of the invigorating and stimulating influence Mr. Moorhouse exercised over him, and there are many Christian workers now actively engaged in preaching the Gospel who bless God that they were ever led to hear him. He paid six visits in all to this country, and on every occasion his work was widely blessed. A memoir of Mr. Moorhouse by Rev. John McPherson has lately been issued, from which the following facts are collected.

Henry Moorhouse was born at Ardwick, England, on September 27th, 1840, and after twenty years of self-denying labor as an evangelist, he died on December 28th, 1880, at the age of forty. His parents were honest working people, leading a quiet industrious life, and in cordial sympathy with the principles and aims of the Wesleyan Methodists.

From his earliest childhood Henry was instructed in the truths of the Gospel. His father was a teacher in a Sunday-school, and it was one of the happiest of his experiences, week by week, to take his boy to school, where, in his tender years, and ere yet his mind was occupied with other things, he could learn

THE ALPHABET OF SCRIPTURE KNOWLEDGE.

How much Henry Moorhouse owed to the Sabbath-school and to the teacher who added to his instruction the influence of a father's love, it is impossible to determine; but there is ample reason to believe that the lessons of childhood, dimmed and blurred, and all but blotted out during the period of his wayward youth, were revived in wonderful vividness in after life.

At the age of twelve Henry obtained employment in a shipping house, where, unhappily, he fell under the influence of wicked companions. Work gave place to idle and reckless pranks. For his daring conduct in swinging on a "teagle" (a crane) from a top story of a very tall building, he was by the employer's advice removed by his father to a new sphere of occupation, in a spindle and fly works. This change, however, wrought no improvement; he loved the company of idle and turbulent lads, and nothing could keep him from spending his time with them.

RECKLESSNESS IN WRONG-DOING.

The adventure of the "teagle" swing was an illustration of his natural disposition, and it was only one of many reckless feats which characterized the wild career on which he entered. He would outdo others in feats of daring, even if in so doing he should disregard all law and duty. To his ill-regulated fancy and foolish ambition, the very charm of heroism lay in foolishly risking his life, not for any useful purpose, but in sheer bravado.

About this time a new influence, at once gentle and powerful, began to operate as a partial check on his waywardness. A young lady, who in subsequent years became his wife, was accustomed to meet him at school, and tried to lead him to Christ. It was probably owing in some measure to the influence of his faithful and gentle friend that he continued to attend the Sabbath-school; for self-willed, impatient of all restraint, and bent upon worldly pleasures though he now was, his susceptible nature was unable wholly and at once to shake off the loving hand that sought to arrest him.

Although Mary did not succeed in leading him to Christ, her love held him in check for a time, and made a deep impression on his heart, despite the storms of sin that were now raging in his soul, and the dark clouds which were beginning to settle down with most ominous gloom upon his path. Besides drunkenness and other vices, he plunged with reckless impetuosity into gambling. He speedily graduated, and assumed a premiership of badness. He became a leader and won money in considerable sums. He became well known as a daring and skilful player in the principal gambling hell in Manchester (represented in the left hand corner of the upper portion of our front picture), he was backed against all players by the owner of the establishment, who pronounced Henry Moorhouse a champion in this bad amusement. His adventures were sometimes desperate, but he was for the most part successful.

Amid the inflation of his animal spirits, the merriment of jolly companionships, and the heyday of sin, Henry was often ill at ease. There was a skeleton in the cupboard, and the cupboard would now and again swing open. To face this grim thing he used to carry on his person a loaded pistol to shoot, not his neighbor, but himself, convinced that the time would come when his despair would cause him to prefer death to life. He was firmly resolved that when he had spent his all

HE WOULD COMMIT SUICIDE.

In this there may have been an element of boyish bravado; but it shows he had reached that more remote region in the "far country" whence few return. Every fresh step he took in the way of transgression became harder and harder. His lawless course brought him into frequent collision with public order and justice, and he became an inmate of a prison cell. Once and again, in fits of sheer wretchedness, he sought, by various means, to take his own life; but, providentially, circumstances now of one kind now of another intervened to foil the desperate attempt. Thus the sinner pursued his sin, but the matchless mercy of God pursued the sinner.

THE GREAT REVIVAL OF 1857-61.

The period in which the conversion of Henry Moorhouse took place was remarkable in the history of the Church of Christ. From 1857 to 1861 the Holy Spirit was poured out on churches and nations. Tidings of the great American revival were borne to Britain like the vivifying breath of spring. It seemed to be the sounding of some mighty angel's trumpet summoning men to prayer. Answers to prayer, many and marked, became a striking feature of the movement. In church, in school, in cottage-meeting, on green lawns, in highland glens, on lonely moors, in shops, in public-houses, in theatres, men were unexpectedly seized with a fear of God, a sense of the importance of eternal things, and a strong desire to obtain salvation. In America, in Ireland, in England, in Scotland, and in many other parts of the world, the spirit of grace and supplication fell on the hearts of men of every creed and class, men without as well as within the Christian pale; and the joyful song of deliverance followed.

THE WAVE ROLLS OVER LANCASHIRE.

In 1859-60, the gracious work of God was making progress in various cities and towns of Lancashire. Laborers whom the Lord of the harvest had brought into the field were reaping in plenty. The time was full of energy, hope, and joy. Great meetings were held in Manchester, where thousands assembled in the places of meeting, and many souls were saved.

Among others converted at this period was Thonas Castle, one of Moorhouse's companions in evil. The young convert lost no time in seeking out his friend and setting before him all the inducements to repentance which his own experience of grace, mercy, and peace through Jesus Christ abundantly suggested. But in vain; the hardened rebel made no sign of surrender. He was prayed for, but there was no apparent answer to those prayers. He was taken to a friend's house, where kind-hearted, fervent Christian men prayed with him and for him. It was all to no purpose; they might as well have spoken to the winds. He left his employment, and fled from the place for the express purpose of escaping from the very scene of the merciful efforts made for his recovery, and

ENLISTED IN THE ARMY.

(A view of the Recruiting Sergeant's Quarters is depicted on the right hand side of the portrait.) Having been bought off by his father, at serious cost, he proved to be not less bound than before by the terrible rigor of the devil's service. I was still the devoted soldier of Satan, and, we from bad to worse. One night in December, 1861 as he was passing along Hyde Street—an obscure back street in Manchester—the attention of his companions was drawn to the cheerful sounds of praise issuing from a little room. They beckoned him to come on. "Hallo," he exclaimed, "what up?" To play a practical joke on him, they replied,

"LOTS OF DRINK AND FUN."

The sound of the hymn singing fell pleasantly on his ear, and he could not resist the sudden impulse to go in. The place was crowded, and he was compelled to take his stand upon the stairs. The people were chiefly factory men and women gathered together for prayer and hearing the Word of God.

Revival grace and blessing had reached the poor, benighted back street; some were rejoicing with newly found joy; others, deeply moved, were seeking light and peace. The parable of the Prodigal Son was read and commented upon, the speaker dwelling on the words, "Bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger." The preacher, little imagining that such a prodigal was listening to his words, described a case like Henry's. The picture was well drawn; the reckless youth was forced to look into a mirror that reflected his true inner self in all its hideous deformity of feature. He felt constrained to recognize the likeness; his heart smote him; he said to himself,

"HARRY, THOU ART THE MAN!"

A sense of guilt, searching and intolerable seized upon him as he stood on the stair; and such a tremor shook his soul that he had to hold the banister to prevent himself from falling.

His first step was to return to the house of his father, who received him in the very fullness of forgiving love. Here, however, he found no rest; the great Father's house was not yet reached. A terrible wilderness intervened. In his misery, he one day rushed out of the house, without his coat and sought a neighboring tavern, where he attempted to drown the voice of an accusing conscience in the intoxicating cup; but in vain. The liquor seemed to have lost its usual potency; the more he drank the louder did conscience raise its voice. His apprehensions of approaching judgment and eternal doom refused to be silenced by the spell of strong drink; and in spite of his deep potations he remained sober.

For three weeks he continued in this tempest-tossed condition, seeking rest and finding none. Sometimes he went to the Circus meetings, but he found no peace. His convictions deepened and he sought in various ways to drown his misery but the misery would not drown; this misery never drowns. Was there any chance for him? Unbelief, with a host of malignant and tormenting demons, answered, "No!" Despair suggested the most fearful of wicked alternatives. "Go back to sin; nothing else is left you; it will be all the same in the end. Or else at once; plunge into the unknown; nothing can be worse than this; anything else might be better." His anguish grew so desperate that his intimate friends trembled lest the terrible strain should cause his reason to fail.

As Henry Moorhouse reeled along this pathway of sorrow he fell into the hands of a wise counselor. Mr. Walter Caddell's hospitable house was open for inquirers, and this devoted servant of the Lord took Henry by the hand, and helped him in the hour of his need, and though he was not directly instrumental in leading him to Christ, he was used of God to hold up his goings at a time when reason often tottered under the load of sin, and a single false step might have plunged the unhappy youth into suicide and perdition.

MEMORABLE VISIT TO AN ENGINE-ROOM.

One day he went to see a young Christian in the engine-room of Messrs. John Rylands and Sons' dry-goods warehouse. His friend received him joy-

Moorhouse found his friend rejoicing in the. This, however, did not mend matters; the ast of his old companion's joy with his own iaciating burden of anguish made him worse. he young convert to tell of his own deliver- from the guilt of sin and the penalty of hell, lenry no good; to bid him do as he had done ed like sheer mockery; to assure him of st's willingness to 'save him made no impres-isely, and doubtless under the guidance of the Spirit, the young Christian drew his distract- iend's attention to the Word of God. Turning omans 10:8, 9, 10, he read, "The word is thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart; is, the word of faith which we preach; that if shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, shalt believe in thine heart that God hath d Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. with the heart man believeth unto righteous- , and with the mouth confession is made unto tion."

Now," said the young teacher, "do you be- that? Do you believe in the risen Saviour, that the work of redemption is finished, be- e Christ is risen?" "I do, with all my heart," ed Moorhouse. "Then are you going to ess what you believe?" "Of course I will," the ready answer. "What, then?" said the r, pointing to the words, "Thou shalt be d." Henry trembled with a strange emotion. i," he cried out,

"I SEE IT! I AM SAVED!"
aw, he believed, he rejoiced, he confessed, and as ready from that hour to bear witness for st in Manchester, or anywhere else. (The t in the left hand corner of the lower portion ur front picture represents this interesting e.)

Henry Moorhouse was now a new man. Immedi- separation from evil companions and all dis- rable courses, was the result of his conversion. ering into partnership with his former compan- in folly and sin, Thomas Castle, now, happily, llow-Christian, they began business with six s, which they invested in thread, tape, boot- s, etc. These were quickly sold, and a fresh ly bought, and thus they succeeded in a few s in realizing a net gain of seven dollars.

astle, having no turn for business, left his com- ion, and found employment in a saw-mill, em- ing his spare time on Sundays and in the even- in open-air preaching. His career was cut t by an accident in the mill resulting in his h. "Tom, my lad, art thou going to die?" his sister to him, shortly before the end. o, Hannah," he replied, with a smile, "not ig to die; going to live; for he that believeth Jesus shall never die."

Henry now entered into the employment of a pkeeper in Oxford Street, Manchester, where urther proved his ability as a salesman; but lost no opportunity of studying the Book Truth, and trying to lead sinners to Christ. God in His infinite wisdom intended Henry orhouse to play an important part upon a more lic stage, and summoned him to the task.

THE EVANGELIST'S FIRST ADDRESS.
A large room in Walter Street, Ancoats, a sub- of Manchester, had, at the suggestion of some kingmen recently converted, been taken by Caddell for the preaching of the Gospel. e two young ladies had gathered together about hundred young women, for the double pur- of making garments for themselves, and of ring Gospel truth. To this company Mr. orhouse delivered his first address.

ot long afterward Mr. Caddell proposed to in- to a meeting in the same room as many thieves other bad characters as could be found, for the pose of hearing from Henry Moorhouse an ac- of his conversion, and a plain statement of way of salvation. To this Henry agreed, and rge number of the lowest class were invited to . To each was given a printed card of invita- , in the following terms: "None but Thieves, uests and Vagabonds Admitted." About four dred attended; there was an enormous con- uption of victuals, and a terrifying noise.

Henry failed to appear. The remembrance of the past, not less than his inexperience as a preacher, completely unnerved him. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Harrison Ord; and many, melted to tears, professed a desire to forsake their evil ways.

Henry Moorhouse's business began to give him concern. The stock was largely composed of sham jewelry, and the question arose whether the puffing of such articles was in strict keeping with the profession and duty of a Christian. His conscience became more and more uneasy, but relief came in a curious way. One day as he was busy selling, and doubtless indulging a good deal in the rattling wit of the auctioneering profession, an eccentric character, a weird-looking man who wore no hat, and went about everywhere warning men of judgment to come, entered the shop, and cried out to Henry, "Thou ought to be with thy Bible for souls, and

"DROP THAT HAMMER FOR THE DEVIL."
It was a word in season. He thought he heard the voice of God in it. He soon afterward (in 1864) left the business, and went forth to preach "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God."

To follow Moorhouse as an evangelist would be to traverse a considerable portion of Great Britain and Ireland and a portion of the United States of America, and we shall, therefore, content ourselves by simply indicating some of the more striking incidents associated with his work, until he was summoned to his rest and eternal reward. In these early days the young evangelist came under the influence of Mr. John Hambleton, whose genial sympathies and ripe experience greatly helped him. Together they visited cities, towns, villages, and unfrequented rural parishes, preaching Christ as they went, and many believed. They started stored with Bibles and religious literature which they sold or distributed gratuitously.

In Halifax they found a remarkable opening. A work of grace was in progress, and it was given them largely to reap its fruits. Night after night the Odd Fellows' Hall was crowded, and many of the people, both old and young, were moved to tears by the simple and touching words of the boy-like preacher. Many, it is known, were then "added to the Lord."

Passing on to Scarborough, they preached in a theatre, and enjoyed much blessing in the work. Here many professed faith in Christ, some of whom are preaching the Gospel to this day. Leaving that town, they pressed on until they arrived at the scene of at Stratford-on-Avon. There they were joined by Mr. Edward Usher, who brought with him a large supply of Bibles, Testaments, and tracts. It needed high courage to face the excited crowd who had gathered from every quarter of the world to celebrate the birth of the great poet. These did not want religion just then and there; and to be confronted by three simple men of God with their Bibles was truly more than weak human nature in the circumstances could have been expected meekly to bear. No wonder, therefore, that the people gnashed with their teeth, tore the tracts, and threw the fragments in the faces of the evangelists, with sufficient demonstrativeness. But they persevered in bearing their testimony to the truth; nor did they go without the rich reward of souls won for Christ.

Passing on from place to place, preaching Christ as they went, at last they arrived at the racecourse of

and there, amid the wild excitement of the races, boldly raised the standard of the Gospel, as shown in the right hand corner of the lower portion of the frontispiece. Nothing daunted by the rude jostling of the angry crowds, the ribald railery, the coarse blasphemy, and the ferocious use of the horsewhip, and all sorts of disagreeable missiles, they preached Jesus, and left the issue with their Master. To pass through such scenes is, to a fine, sensitive nature, scarcely less than the martyr's fire. It was an ordeal demanding strong faith, invincible courage, and quenchless zeal.

But such cross-bearing service never fails of success.

Henry Moorhouse's evangelistic labors were now incessant. Doors opened on every side, nor was he slow to enter. He began to be more and more sought after, the interest in his preaching, often raised by mere curiosity, not seldom leading to conversion. London, Bristol, Oldham, Rochdale, Liverpool, and Chester, and many other places were visited, and in each of them precious fruits were gathered into the garner of Christ. Then passing on to Ireland, a very wide field of opportunity seemed to be providentially prepared for the young English preacher.

IN THE THEATRE AT CORK
he and John Hambleton encountered a fierce mob of Romanists, whose evident purpose was to prevent the preaching of salvation through faith. By yelling and other hideous noises and threatening demonstrations, they succeeded in drowning the voices of the preachers, who, however, continued their attempts until victory crowned their peaceful arms, and they were enabled to deliver the message of salvation.

HIS TOURS IN AMERICA.
In 1867 Henry Moorhouse visited the United States of America for the first time. He paid several visits in all to the New World, which were all fruitful of blessing; but, perhaps, his first evangelistic tour yielded far richer results than any other period in his ministry. A wide and an effectual door was opened for him. He was honored with invitations from churches and cities; he was welcomed with enthusiasm, and hailed as "the great English preacher." Thousands hung on his lips, and, infinitely better than all, the Holy Spirit accompanied his preaching with great power; whole congregations were moved to tears and inquiry, and multitudes were saved.

FIRST VISIT TO MR. D. L. MOODY.
In the course of this tour Mr. Moorhouse visited Chicago, and in the absence of Mr. Moody, conducted his meetings, preaching every night six or seven times in succession on his favorite text, John 3:16. The audience was deeply moved; the people felt a heaven-born preacher had appeared among them. On his return, Mr. Moody went to hear and see for himself, and was so much impressed that, in his generous enthusiasm he hired the capacious Farwell Hall, and announced throughout the city that Mr. Moorhouse would preach in it. It was at this time that he began his remarkable Bible-readings, and by means of them Mr. Moody, and other eminent American evangelists, were stimulated to renewed efforts to reach the unconverted.

ILLNESS AND TRIUMPHANT DEATH.
And in this way he continued in labors more abundant until the year 1880, when, after eight weeks of severe illness, the end came. He had committed himself and all his concerns to Christ, and he was literally without a care. His sufferings were most severe; but, said the strong believer, "The Lord makes no mistakes!" "Do not fret," he would say to dear ones weeping around him, "it's all right! it's all right!" About twelve o'clock on December 28th, he passed into the presence of Him whom he loved and on the last day of the year 1880, lovingly his brethren laid him in a Christian's grave, the cabinet where the Lord safely treasures the body of His servant, until His return, when "the dead in Christ shall rise first; then they who are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

A Jew Saved by a Tract.—Dr. M'Call, when in London, was waited upon by a young Hebrew, who stated that he had received a tract from the Doctor when he was in Warsaw. The young Jew said that he came to the meeting where the distribution took place with the object of ridiculing it, but upon receiving the tract from the hands of Dr. M'Call he determined to read it. The result was that he studied the Scriptures, and became a thorough Christian, and had come from Warsaw all the way to London to receive baptism at the hands of the doctor.

THE HORSE AND HIS RIDER.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
June 18, 1882.

"Hast thou given the horse strength? Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men. He saith among the trumpets, ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."—Job 39: 19, 25.

The Question of the Turf—A Coronet for the Horse—His Prominence in the Bible—The Horses of Distinguished Men—Those who Maltreat him—A Tribute to Bergh—A Suitable Punishment for Cruel Drivers—His Development Justifiable—Demanded by Patriotism—The Attempt to turn it into Evil—Prizes Legitimate—Where the Sin of the Turf Begins—The Pool-Rooms and their Work—A Word for certain Foreheads—The American Race-Course—The Curse of the Country—Getting Money without Earning it—Square Old-Fashioned Honesty—A Christian who loved Horses.

AT this season of the year when there come long columns of intelligence from the race-course, and multitudes are flocking to the watering-places to witness equine competition, and there is lively discussion in all households about the right and wrong of such exhibitions of mettle and speed, and when there is a heresy abroad that the cultivation of a horse's fleetness is an iniquity instead of a commendable virtue—at such a time a sermon is demanded of every minister who would like to defend public morals on the one hand, and who is not willing to see an unrighteous abridgment of innocent amusement on the other. In this discussion I shall follow no sermonic precedent, but will give independently what I consider the Christian and common-sense view of this potent, all absorbing, and agitating question of the turf.

There needs to be a redistribution of coronets among the brute creation. For ages the lion has been called the king of beasts. I knock off its coronet and put the crown upon the horse, in every way nobler, whether in shape, or spirit, or sagacity, or intelligence, or affection, or usefulness. He is semi-human and knows how to reason on a small scale. The Centaur of olden times, part horse and part man, seems to be a suggestion of the fact that the horse is something more than a beast. Job in my text sets forth his strength, his beauty, his majesty, the panting of his nostril, the pawing of his hoof, and his enthusiasm for the battle. What Rosa Bonheur did for the cattle, and what Landseer did for the dog, Job with mightier pencil does for the horse.

THE HORSE IN THE BIBLE.

Eighty-eight times does the Bible speak of him. He comes into every kingly procession, and into every great occasion and into every triumph. It is very evident that Job and David, and Isaiah, and Ezekiel, and Jeremiah, and John, were fond of the horse. He comes into much of their imagery. A red horse—that meant war. A black horse—that meant famine. A pale horse—that meant death. A white horse—that meant victory. Good Mordecai mounts him while Haman holds the bit. The Church's advance in the Bible is compared to a company of horses of Pharaoh's chariot. Jeremiah cries out, "How canst thou contend with horses?" Isaiah says, "The horse's hoofs shall be counted as flint." Miriam claps her cymbals and sings, "The horse and the rider hath He thrown into the sea." St. John describing Christ as coming forth from conquest to conquest represents Him as seated on a white horse. In the parade of Heaven the Bible makes us hear the clicking of hoofs on the golden pavement as it says: "The armies which were in Heaven followed Him on white horses."

I should not wonder if the horse, so banded, and bruised, and beaten, and outraged on earth should have some other place where his wrongs shall be righted. I do not assert it, but I say I should not be surprised if after all, St. John's descriptions of the horses in Heaven turned out not altogether to be figurative, but somewhat literal.

As the Bible makes a favorite of the horse, the patriarch, and the prophet, and the evangelist; and the apostle stroking his sleek hide and patting his rounded neck, and tenderly lifting his exquisitely formed hoof, and listening with a thrill to the champ of his bit, so all great natures in all ages have spoken of him in encomiastic terms. Virgil in his Georgics almost seems to plagiarize from this description in the text, so much are the descriptions alike—the description of Virgil and the description of Job. The Duke of Wellington would not allow any one irreverently to touch his old war-horse Copenhagen, on whom he had ridden fifteen hours without dismounting at Waterloo, and when old Copenhagen died, his master ordered a military salute fired over his grave.

John Howard showed that he did not exhaust all his sympathies in pitying the human race, for when sick he writes home: "Has my old chaise horse become sick or spoiled?" There is hardly any passage of French literature more pathetic than the lamentation over the death of the war charger Marchegay. Walter Scott has so much admiration for this divinely honored creature of God that in "St. Ronan's Well," he orders the girth slackened and the blanket thrown over the smoking flanks. Edmund Burke, walking in the park at Beaconsfield, musing over the past, throws his arms around the worn-out horse of his dead son Richard, and weeps upon the horse's neck, the horse seeming to sympathize in the memories. Rowland Hill, the great English preacher, was caricatured because in his family prayers he supplicated for the recovery of a sick horse, but when the horse got well, contrary to all the prophecies of the farriers, the prayer did not seem quite so much of an absurdity.

But what shall I say of the

of this beautiful and wonderful creature of God? If Thomas Chalmers in his day felt called upon to preach a sermon against cruelty to animals, how much more in this day is there a need of reprehensive discourse. All honor to Professor Bergh, the chief apostle for the brute creation, for the mercy he has demanded and achieved for this king of beasts. A man who owned four thousand horses, and some say forty thousand, wrote in the Bible: "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." Sir Henry Lawrence's care of the horse was beautifully Christian. He says: "I expect we shall lose Conrad, though I have taken so much care of him that he may come in cool. I always walk him the last four or five miles, and as I walk myself the first hour it is only in the middle of the journey we get over the ground." The Ettrick shepherd in his matchless Ambrosial Nights speaks of the maltreatment of the horse as a practical blasphemy.

I do not believe in the transmigration of souls, but I cannot very severely denounce the idea, for when I see men who cut and bruise and whack and welt and strike and maul and outrage and insult the horse, that beautiful servant of the human race, who carries our burdens and pulls our ploughs, and turns our threshers and our mills, and runs for our doctors—when I see men thus beating and abusing and outraging that creature, it seems to me that it would be only fair that the doctrine of transmigration of souls should prove true, and that for their punishment they should pass over into some poor, miserable brute and be beaten and whacked and cruelly treated, and frozen and heated and overdriven; into an everlasting stage horse, an eternal traveller on a towpath, or tied to an eternal post, in an eternal winter, smitten with eternal epizootics!

O! is it not a shame that the brute creation, which had the first possession of our world, should be so maltreated by the race that came in last—the fowl and the fish created on the fifth day, the horse and the cattle created on the morning of the sixth day, and the human race not created until the evening of the sixth day. It ought to be that if any man overdrives a horse, or feeds him when hot, or recklessly drives a nail into the quick of his hoof, or rowels him to see him prance, or so shoes him that his fetlocks drop blood, or puts a collar on a raw neck, or unnecessarily clutches his tongue with a twisted bit, or cuts off his hair until he has no defence against the cold, or unmercifully abbreviates the natural defence against insectile annoyance—that such a man as himself ought to be made to pull and let his ride!

But not only do our humanity and our Christian principle, and the dictates of God demand that kindly treat the brute creation and especially horse; but I go further and say that whatever be done for the

and his strength and his majesty ought to be. We need to study his anatomy and his adaptations. I am glad that large books have been written showing how he can be best managed, and what ailments can be cured, and what his usefulness and what his capacities are. It would be a sight in this age of the world, when the florist turned the thin flower of the wood into a gory rose, and the pomologist has changed the gnarled fruit of the ancients into the poetry of pear and peach and plum and grape apple, and the snarling cur of the Orient has become the great mastiff, and the miserable creature of the olden times barn yard has become the vonshire and the Alderney and the short-horn the horse, grander than them all, should gain advantage from our science or our civilization our Christianity.

Groomed to the last point of soft brilliance, flowing mane a billow of beauty, his arched in utmost rhythm of curve, let him be harnessed in graceful trappings and then driven to the highest goal of excellence, and then fed at luxuriant oat bins, and blanketed in comfortable stall. A long tried and faithful servant of the human race deserves all kindness, all care, all reward, all culent forage and soft litter and paradisaic pasture field. Those farms in Kentucky and different parts of the North, where the horse is trained to perfection in fleetness and in beauty in majesty, are well set apart.

A DELUSION.

There is no more virtue in driving slow than driving fast, any more than a freight train going miles the hour is better than an express train going fifty. There is a delusion abroad in the world that a thing must be necessarily good and Christian if it is slow and dull and plodding. There are very good people who seem to imagine it is unbiblically pious to drive a spavined, galled, glanderspringhalted, blind, staggered jade. There is so much virtue in a Rosinante as there is in Bucephalus. At the way some people drive, I wish his horses of fire would have taken several weeks to get into Heaven.

We want swifter horses, and swifter men in swifter enterprises, and the church of God to get off its jog trot. Quick tempests, quick rainings, quick streams why not quick horses? In time of war the cavalry service does the most execution, and as the battles of the world are probably not all past, our Christian patriotism demands that we be interested in equinal velocity. We might as well have poorer guns in our arsenals and clumsier ships in our navy yards than other nations, as to have under our cavalry saddles as before our parks of artillery slower horses. In the battle of Granicus where the Persian host drove the Macedonian infantry into the river, and down to the horses on which Philip Sheridan and Stonewall Jackson rode into the fray, this is the military service has been recognized. Hannibal, Gustavus Adolphus, Marshall were cavalymen. In this arm of the service Charles Martel at the battle of Poitiers beat back the Arab invasion. The Carthaginian came with the loss of only seven hundred men over the Roman army with the loss of seventy thousand. In the same way the Spanish chivalry drove back the Moorish hordes.

The best way to keep peace in this country and in all countries is to be prepared for war, and there is no success in such a contest unless there is plenty of light-footed chargers. Our Christianity and our instruction from the Word of God demand that first of all we kindly treat the horse, and then after that, that we develop his fleetness and his grandeur and his majesty and his strength.

But what shall I say of the effort being made day on a large scale to make this splendid ure of God, this divinely honored being,

AN INSTRUMENT OF ATROCIOUS EVIL?

do not like that, go down to the East River pitch it off the docks. You cannot afford to will lose all. Gambling blasts a man or it s his children. Generally both and all.

here is at this time a horse betting craze.
re is great danger that our beautiful Coney nd beach, the finest watering place on the merican continent, the benediction of God upon oklyn and New York, should become a place anguished for the gathering of gamblers and s andrils and pickpockets. I say there is great ger in that direction. There are thousands of ng men who have already taken a long stride the down grade through the Brighton Beach es and the Sheepshead Bay races. There have n stores in New York and Brooklyn robbed of all sums of money by boys who wanted to get money to buy betting tickets.

ast summer, on Barclay Street, New York, re were three pool rooms for betting on the se races at Coney Island and other points, and se three pool rooms were crowded and surrounded by boys and men, and the police had to nd and keep the way clear. Hear it, you citis, the police of New York aware of the betting ols and doing nothing! I hear there is now one h place on Willoughby Street, in our city. I l the attention of the public authorities to it for estigation in that direction. Hunter's Point also be headquarters of much of this infamy.

But what a spectacle when at Saratoga, or at ng Branch, or at Brighton Beach, or at Sheepsnd Bay, the horses start, and in a flash fifty or undred thousand dollars change hands! Multudes ruined by losing the bet, others worse ned by gaining the bet; for if a man lose in a t a horse race, he may be discouraged and it, but if he win the bet he is very apt to go aight on to hell! There are three different ids of betting at horse races, and they are about ally leprous: by "auction pools," by "French tuals," by what is called "bookmaking"—all mbing, all bad, all rotten with iniquity.

There is one word that needs to be written on e brow of every poolseller as he sits deducting three or five per cent and slyly "ringing up" ore tickets than were sold on the winning horse—word to be written also on the brow of every ok-keeper who at extra inducement scratches a se off of the race, and on the brow of every ckey who slackens pace that, according to agree-ent, another may win, and written over every judge's stand, and written on every board of the surrounding fences. That word is,

"SWINDLE!"

Yet thousands bet. Lawyers bet. Judges of courts bet. Members of the legislature bet.
Members of Congress bet. Professors of religion bet. Teachers and superintendents of Sunday schools, I am told, bet. Ladies bet, not directly, but through agents. Yesterday, and every day they bet, they gain, they lose, and this summer while the parasols swing and the hands clap and the huzzas deafen, there will be a multitude of people cajoled, and deceived, and cheated who will at the races go neck and neck, neck and neck to perdition.

Cultivate the horse, by all means, drive him as fast as you desire, provided you do not injure him or endanger yourself or others; but be careful and do not harness the horse to the chariot of sin.
Do not throw your jewels of morality under the flying hoof. Do not under the pretext of improving the horse destroy a man. Do not have your name put down in the ever-increasing catalogue of those who are ruined for both worlds by the dissipations of

THE AMERICAN RACE-COURSE.

They say that an honest race-course is a "straight" track, and that a dishonest race-course is a "crooked" track—that is the parlance abroad; but I tell you that every race track, surrounded by betting men, and betting women, and betting customs, is a straight track—I mean straight down!
Christ asked in one of His Gospels: "is not a man better than a sheep?" I say, yes, and he is better than all the Dexters, and the Luke Black-burns, and the Hindoos, and the Glenmores, and the old Paroles that with lathered flanks ever shot around the ring at a race-course. That is a very poor job by which a man in order to get a horse to come out a full length ahead of some other racer, so lames his own morals that he comes out a whole length behind in the race set before him.

Do you not realize the fact that there is a mighty effort on all sides to-day to get money without earning it? That is the curse of Brooklyn, and it is the curse of New York; it is

THE CURSE OF AMERICA

—the effort to get money without earning it, and as other forms of stealing are not respectable, they go into these gambling practises. I have received a letter giving the names of the proprietors and the locations of some ten or fifteen "policy" shops in this city. I do not know whether they are correct charges or slanderous charges. I have no time to make an investigation myself. I shall hand the letter over to the authorities, public authorities.
But let me say to the officers in Brooklyn and New York, and in Kings County, that they will be backed up in all their efforts to extirpate gambling from these cities—gambling of all sorts, gambling whether it appears in the crowded street, or down on the magnificent beach where the Atlantic with unceasing voice invites our sweltering populations to come down to refreshment, stepping into the great Bethesda where the angel of healing is ever troubling the waters.

I preach this sermon on

SQUARE OLD-FASHIONED HONESTY.

I have said nothing against the horse, I have said nothing against the turf. I have said everything against their prostitution. Young men, you go into straightforward industries and you will have better livelihood, and you will have larger permanent success than you can ever get by a wager; but you get in with some of the whiskey, rum-blotched crew which I see going down on the ocean boulevards, though I never bet, I will risk this wager, five million to nothing, you will be debauched and damned.

Cultivate the horse, own him if you can afford to own him, test all the speed he has, if he have any speed in him; but be careful which way you drive. You cannot always tell what direction a man is driving in by the way his horses head.

FORTY YEARS AGO

we rode three miles every Sabbath morning to the country church. We were drawn by two fine horses. My father drove. He knew them and they knew him. They were friends. Sometimes they loved to go rapidly and he did not interfere with their happiness. He had all of us in the wagon with him. He drove to the country church. The fact is, that for eighty-two years he drove in the same direction.

The roan span that I speak of was long ago un-hitched and the driver put up his whip in the wagon house never again to take it down; but in those good old times I learned something that I never forgot, that a man may admire a horse and love a horse, and be proud of a horse, and not always be willing to take the dust of the preceding vehicle, and yet be a Christian, an earnest Christian, an humble Christian, a consecrated Christian, useful until the last, so that at his death the church of God cries out as Elisha exclaimed when Elijah went up with galloping horses of fire: "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof!"

An English Admiral on the Value of Total Abstinence.—A valuable testimony as to the amount of hardship or exposure to cold that can be endured without the use of intoxicating drinks of any kind was given by Admiral Sir John Ross. His first voyage was to Jamaica, where the captain and several of the crew died. He was exposed to the burning sun, slept on deck in the dew, and ate fruit without any bad effects. He ran about bareheaded and barefooted; but never tasted spirits, and to that alone he attributed the extraordinary good health he enjoyed. The same thing happened to him at St. Petersburg, where he used to run, barefooted and bareheaded on the ice and suffered no harm; but still all the while avoiding spirits.

On his last voyage to Honduras, he was the only man that went out in the ship that came back alive, which he attributed entirely to abstinence from spirituous liquors. During his voyages to the Arctic regions, though twenty years older than any of the officers and crew, and thirty years older than all excepting three, he could stand the cold and endure the fatigue better than any of them, who all made use of tobacco and spirits, from which he totally abstained.

A Fight with Fire in Mid-Ocean was Maintained for three days on board the ship Charger, which arrived at New York on June 9th. She left this port for San Francisco on May 13th with a general cargo, among which were several packages of cartridges. All went well for two weeks, and the Charger was twelve hundred miles from port when the second mate noticed smoke issuing from the fore hatch. He took off the cover and descended, but he was soon heard calling for help and was drawn up badly burned about the face, neck and hands, and almost suffocated. The hatches were then battened down and the decks flooded.

Holes were then cut in the deck and water poured on the flames, but they had to be plugged up again, for the air entered through the apertures and helped the fire. Various expedients were tried to admit water without air with partial success. The cargo continued to smoulder, and on the evening of the third day after the discovery of the fire a package of cartridges exploded. Then symptoms of mutiny were noticed among the crew. They were weary with their three days' fighting with the fire and working the ship at the same time, and they went aft and demanded that the captain abandon the ship before the other cartridges should explode.
The captain, beset as he thus was by difficulties on all hands, nevertheless remained firm. He induced the men to return to their duty, the course of the ship was changed to return to New York, and on the morning of June 7th it was found that the fire was entirely subdued. On June 9th New York was sighted, and in the mercy of God the Charger entered port safely without the loss of a single life, after a more perilous voyage than had ever been experienced by any man on board. To a Christian man whose eyes have been divinely opened the position of that ship bears a close resemblance to the state of the ungodly man. The fiery passions of his nature, the explosive elements within him, the mutinous desires of his lusts are all typified. With such a picture before us we see that it was no empty theory Jesus stated when He said, "Ye must be born again" (John 3:7).

THE GREAT PYRAMID AND PROPHECY.

By George Webster.

THE judgment of the living nations (Matt. 25 : 32), and the blotting out of the Gentile kingdoms, which are so fully revealed in the Word of God, being not yet accomplished, the six thousand years of the world are not yet ended, or there must be a supplementary period between the sixth thousand years and the seventh, or Millennium. Is there such a period revealed either in the Word of God or by the Pyramid? We read in the Word of God of "THE TIMES OF THE GENTILES," and that that period is "seven times."

This period and its length were first made known when Moses warned God's ancient people that if they walked contrary to God, that He would walk contrary to them, and "seven times" would pass over them. They took their "own way," and walked contrary to God, and the final seven times of Levit. 26 began to pass over them when Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, took the kingdom of Israel captive, and placed a king in Israel under himself instead of being under the "King of Heaven."

The second revelation and measurement of "the times of the Gentiles" is given as "seven times" in the dream of Nebuchadnezzar, as interpreted by the prophet Daniel. This dream reveals the length of the period as "seven times," during which the Gentile kings and kingdoms rule in their own strength.

THE PERIOD OF THEIR POWER.

The length of the period of Gentile power and privilege is also made known unto us in the Revelation by John. Two measurements are given to make known the length of the period during which the kings of the Gentiles were to rule over the people of God. First they ruled over God's ancient people forty-two months. They are characterized during this period as trampling them under foot (Rev. 12 : 2). Secondly, they have been both ruling and teaching during forty-two months, and they are characterized as speaking blasphemies during this latter period (Rev. 13 : 5). These two periods of 42 months make a period of 84 months, and as the Chaldean month was 30 days, 30 times 84 is 2520, and as every one of these days stands for a year in fulfilled prophecy, we are thus warranted in saying that 84 prophetic months are 2520 prophetic years.

Two measurements are also given to show the length of this period regarding God's ancient people—the Jews. The Two Witnesses among them were to maintain the truth in sackcloth under two dispensations of grace, 1260 days (Rev. 11 : 3-4), and the witnesses are also revealed as to lie dead in the street of the Great City three days and a half (Rev. 11 : 8-11). It must be observed in reading these two measurements that the former, i.e., 1260 are prophetic days, each day being a year in fulfilled history, and that the latter, i.e., three and a half days, are year-days—that is, each day being a year, and each year 360 days, and each day equal to a prophetic year, and we thus find that a "year-day" and "a time" are synonymous terms in the reading of the prophecies relating to the times of the Gentiles; and also that the 1260 days during which the Two Witnesses maintained the truth among the Jews while they were under the Gentile rules and the three and a half year-days during which they have been dead in the street of the Great City, when added together make 2520 prophetic days, and thus equal to the above 84 months of Gentile rule over them.

THE TRUTH AMONG THE GENTILES.

There are also two measurements given to make known the length of the period during which the truth has been among the Gentiles. The Church, symbolized as "the woman," was first 1260 days, i.e., years, among the Gentiles, as recorded Rev. 12 : 6—that was from the carrying away of Israel to Babylon in 606 B.C. down to the end of the first half of the times of the Gentiles, in A.D. 636. The Church has also been among the Gentiles during the last half of "the times of the Gentiles." The length of this period is "a time," 360 days; "times," 720 days; and "half a time," 180 days

(Rev. 12 : 14), and these added are 1260 prophetic days; and when the length of this latter period is added to the former, they make one period of 2520 prophetic days, and prophetic days being equal in length to Chaldean years, we are thus taught that the length of the times of the Gentiles is 2520 Chaldean years. If, then, this period began with our month of August 606 B.C., it ended with our July A.D. 1878. But what saith the measurements of the great Pyramid to this date?

THE PYRAMID MEASUREMENTS.

As the measurements in the Pyramid seem to be taken from the beginning of the Grand Gallery, that is, from the birth of Christ, we must look for a comparison from the beginning of the Grand Gallery. On looking over a few drawings of the Grand Gallery, there is to be seen a groove, or graven line, from one end of the Grand Gallery to the other, about half up the north wall, and the measured length of this partly-observed graven line is 1878, four pyramid inches, and this measurement, reckoning a pyramid inch to the Chaldean year, and then the chronology of the times of the Gentiles during the Gospel age and Pyramid chronology are the same, and all the different measurements end at this date.

If, then, the times of the Gentiles during the Gospel age is so exactly revealed by the graven line in the Grand Gallery, may not the length of the passages, or rather the periods as revealed by the passages between the Grand Gallery and King's Chamber, be also revealed by grooves graven in the stones of these passages, or in some place or part of the antechamber?

BETWEEN "THE TIMES OF THE GENTILES" AND THE MILLENNIUM.

However, having found that the graven line and its length, and all the prophetic measurements as given by Moses, Daniel, and John, agree in showing that the times of the Gentiles ended in A.D. 1878, are there not also measurements contained in the Word of God, by which the length of the period between the "times of the Gentiles" and the Millennium may be known?

Attention has been directed to the length of the passage between the Grand Gallery and the King's Chamber, opening up the question which was first discussed by the trio of divine beings in the presence of Daniel as one of the two that stood upon the bank of the river said unto the Man clothed in linen, who stood upon the waters of the river, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" Dan. 12 : 5-6, and as Daniel heard, but understood not the answer, he again said, "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" and the Lord said, "From the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days. Blessed is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days."

In this answer we have the measurement of two periods. The first period, 1290 days, embraces the length of the first half of "the times of the Gentiles," and thirty years added to it, the last thirty being the period during which Mohammedanism was established in the Holy Land, and made known in the Revelation as the period of the first Apocalyptic War (Rev. 9 : 1-12).

THE LATTER PERIOD OF SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS.

The 1335 days is the last half of the times of the Gentiles and 75 years added to it, during which the kingdoms of the Roman Empire are to destroy each other, and leave this world as "the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ." It is to this latter period of 75 years to which the attention of God's people should be drawn, because we are living in it since 1878, and this is also the period which is represented by the two passages between the Grand Gallery and the King's Chamber in the Great Pyramid.

Although the prophet Daniel has given the measurement of this period of 75 years, not only as one measure, but in conjunction with the last half of the times of the Gentiles, John, in the Revelation, has divided the 75 years into two parts. The one is termed "the hour of trial," Rev. 3 : 10, and the hour of destruction, Rev. 18 : 10, 17, and 19. As one hour is the twenty-fourth part of our day, so the twenty-fourth part of 360 years being 15 years 15 years is the prophetic hour. This is the part of the 75 years, and the remaining portion the 75 years, being sixty years, we thus find this is the length of the great tribulation, such never was and never will be its like again in world, (Rev. 16 : 18; Matt. 24 : 21; Mark 13 :

We are thus enabled by these revelations to that the prophetic measurements as contained in Pyramid between the south end of the Grand Gallery and the King's Chamber, will be found to be in all seventy-five inches, and when divided, fifty inches will be the passage length from the Gallery to antechamber and sixty inches the revealed measurement of the antechamber, and doubtless the grooves will yet be found, and the harmony between the revelations contained in the Bible and the Pyramid thus fully established.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

"Can You Fight the Devil?"—At the Glasgow temperance meeting held in the Circus on the 10th, Major Oldham narrated that a minister that some years ago he went to spend a week at Ardrossan, and he fixed upon a question he determined to ask every one that he met. The question was, "Can you fight the devil?" No one could give him an answer until he got hold of an old sailor, or fisherman. He said to him, "Can you fight the devil, my friend?" The sailor looked up, and with twinkle in his eye said, "My own strength I can do nothing, but through Christ strengthening me I can do all things."

Three Blind Women Made to See.—In Scroggie said: "At the close of the women's meeting, in the Circus, yesterday, I noticed a blind girl in front of the platform. My heart was drawn to her by reason of her blindness, and I asked her if she were a Christian. She said 'No, I am not; but I would like to be.' I found there were two other blind women along with her. We got workers to talk to them of the way of salvation, and they all three joyfully received the Lord Jesus Christ before they went away."

From Morality to Christ.—Mr. Jack said: "I was speaking at the Circus on Friday evening when a man who had been leading a moral and upright life—a man who was a teetotaler and knew nothing about gross sin; but still he was in spiritual blindness, for he did not know the Lord. As we were talking, the light shone into his heart, and he was led away from reliance upon his morality to Christ as his Saviour. Near us was a man who called me by name, and I found that he was saved three years ago. He was at that time one of the worst drunkards in Glasgow. I said to him, 'John, it gives me great pleasure to shake you by the hand and praise God with you for the Saviour you have found. Now, just sit down and tell us brother the story of your conversion.' He did so with the most helpful result. As I saw my new friend and this man restored from a life of vice talking together, I saw a new evidence of the fact that the same Saviour is needed by us all."

A University Graduate's Confession.—A young man about thirty years of age said: "I should think I have been the biggest backslider in Glasgow. I came up to this city from my native town in Ayrshire when I was about thirteen years of age. I studied Latin and Greek, and then passed through the university. For many years I was a member of the Y.M.C.A. I was also made the superintendent of a Sabbath-school, and through my efforts, I believe, great good was done; but notwithstanding all this I fell. I led a sin more than the service of the Lord. I cannot tell you how far I wandered away from the Good Shepherd, but I was sometimes almost in despair. I thought that I was the only individual in the wide universe that God had forsaken. I shall never forget the evening I first went to the University Hall to hear Mr. Moody. I went for the purpose of passing an hour or two away from my heavy load on my hands. The text was Cl. 6 : 7: 'Be not deceived.' I went home, and my whole life seemed to pass before me and I could not sleep, for I was in terrible agony of soul. I prayed God out of a penitent heart to be merciful to me sinner, and He heard my cry. On the night before Glasgow Fast I went to Dr. Bonar's church, and followed Mr. Moody to Free St. Mark's. I resolved to go into the inquiry-room, and there Mr. Carstairs kindly explained to me the way of salvation. I went home, and there, when I was agonizing with God, the blessing of peace came to my soul. The rock on which I split was spiritual pride, and let me warn all present to guard against it."

Liquor Dealer and Police.—Mr. Campbell said: "About two years ago two or three of us young men resolved to go into the Gorbals district, on the south side of Glasgow, to visit a saloon where we knew a number of young men resorted night after night, to try if we could not rescue them. We visited the neighborhood several times speaking to the young men as they went in and came out of the place. The landlord did not like our line of action. He spoke to a policeman, and the policeman spoke to us, but as we were not obstructing the causeway we declined to go away. A second policeman came upon the scene, and there having been further consultation with the landlord, they took one of us into custody. They made wrong statements to the inspector at the station, but he said he could not see the young man had done anything wrong, and he liberated him. We then prayed for the policeman and for the landlord of the house, and soon afterward asked the landlord to lend one of his rooms for the purpose of a prayer meeting. The request, he said, was altogether wrong, but after a little persuasion he called his man and said, 'John, light up No. 1, and let these gentlemen have their prayer meeting.' On the next Sabbath one of the two policemen came to our meeting and asked our forgiveness for what he had said and done, and before he left he was led to trust in Christ as his Saviour. That policeman is now on his way to the Livingstone Mission on Lake Nyanza, where he is going to engage on foreign mission work."

A Major's Conversion.—Major Olaham said: "After I left my home in Scotland to go to school in England, I ceased to pray, because there was not another boy in the place in the habit of doing so, and I should have been laughed at. I went right away from God until I denied Him. My hope was that some time or other God would give me a month, or a week, or a day perhaps, to repent, and that I should be able to repent quietly in bed without any one seeing me, and that I should thus be able to enjoy the best of this life and of the life to come. I have been twenty-two years in India, and for the first half of this time I lived for myself. I lived wholly for pleasure, and cared nothing for God. I kept my Bible down in the bottom of my box; I did not like to see it because it condemned me, and I did not like to part with it, because I knew it was God's message to me. In 1868 I came home to this country, intending to try and get a little more out of the world, as I found the world in India did not satisfy me. I went to London and took what pleasure I could there. Then I was called down to Scotland to attend the death-bed of a dear friend whose life was slowly ebbing away. This was the first time I had faced the fact that I, too, must die. One day I attended service in a small church at Roseneath. I went there for a walk, as the day was fine. There was a strange minister—a minister from Glasgow—taking the service, and he had a very impressive way of reading God's word. He gave out his text 'Wherefore He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing that He ever liveth to make intercession for them.' That word 'liveth' brought me to Christ. It was a new call to me. I had always thought that Jesus was dead. I knew He had died for me; but now I saw that He lived for me. I went home that night and began to pray, and I then received Christ as my Saviour."

A Converted Jew in Prison.—At a Prayer-meeting in Glasgow, Rev. Eliezar Bassin (Edinburgh), said: "As a son of Abraham, and one who was persecuted by the Jews after I became a Christian, I should like to say a few words about the joy I felt at being persecuted for the sake of the Master. I was imprisoned thirty years ago in Odessa. I had been brought from Constantinople, and when I arrived at Odessa I was taken before the chief man in the town. I had a conversation with him, and when he left me he said, 'I will do what I can for you.' In a short time afterward a Cossack came to me and asked me to accompany him. I asked him where to? And he said 'To prison.' I asked leave of him to go to a restaurant and get some refreshments, and he went with me. He there took glass after glass of strong drink till he became so drunk I could easily have run away from him, but I determined to wait till the Lord delivered me. I took him rather than he took me to the prison, and there I was searched and everything of value taken from me. I was then put into a large room with forty or fifty other prisoners. They came round me and asked me to pay my footing money. I told them that everything was taken from me, and I had nothing to give them. They said: 'We never saw such a stupid man as to give up all your money; why didn't you give the official something for himself, and he would have let you keep the rest?' They asked me where I came from, and on my telling them Constantinople, they said, 'You must have wealth then?' I said, 'I have got something better than money.' They said, 'Precious stones?' and immediately began to search my mouth. I said, 'I have something better than precious stones—I have something that will release you from prison.' They looked at the bars and high windows and then at me. They said, 'Is it possible?' I said, 'I don't mean this prison, but the prison of everlasting death.' I then spoke to them of the deliverance through Christ, I sang to them and then prayed, and I believe that through my feeble instrumentality several of those prisoners were led to Christ. This, then, I thought, was the reason why I was led into captivity."

THE JEWISH PERSECUTION: A SIGN OF THE END.

By William O'Neill, M.D., M.R.C.S.

Great Britain as the Modern Tarshish—The Present Influx of Jews into Palestine—The Predicted Time of the Jews' Restoration is now at Hand—The End of the Age—The State of Europe.

THE present murders, spoliations, and persecutions of the Jews in "holy" Russia, may be the beginning of the end of all their troubles, and the time may be at hand for which they have so long fervently prayed and hoped. Many people believe that the "seven times" predicted by Daniel are drawing to a close, and that the "Times of the Gentiles" are nearly fulfilled. The waters of the mystical Euphrates are drying up rapidly before our eyes, and now we hear of frightful persecutions of the chosen people in Russia, where two-thirds of them reside, and rumors of a second Exodus, all of which may portend the end of this age, for we are told that immediately before this dispensation terminates, the chosen people will return to their old heritage in a time of unexampled trouble.

"Surely the Isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first to bring my sons from far" (Isaiah 60:9). As Tarshish, or Tyre, was the greatest naval power in ancient times, and in this respect resembles Great Britain, which is the greatest naval power of the present time, it is to be hoped therefore that Great Britain, or Christian Tarshish from the Isles of the Sea, is the power destined some day to render powerful assistance to the Jews in their restoration to the Holy Land.

For some years back a yearning to return to Palestine has been manifested by Jews, and as a consequence a steady influx of the people into the country has been taking place. During the last ten years the Jewish population of the country has doubled itself. Jerusalem is gradually becoming a centre of civilization, and is assuming the appearance of a modern town. Villas are being erected in the neighborhood of the city, and there are no less than three Jewish building societies in operation. The Russian persecutions have now given such an impetus to Hebrew emigration into Palestine that money is all that is required in order to re-people the land, especially as the Sultan, who is a liberal-minded and humane man, receives the Jews into his dominions with pleasure, and renders them whatever assistance he can. The Jews appreciate the kind treatment of the Sultan and Mussulmans, and they say that they find the Turks are more merciful than the members of the Greek Church. Such an influx of Hebrews has not been known since the destruction of Jerusalem by Hadrian.

Whether this awakening of the Jews and this intense longing desire of thousands of Jewish families in Russia and elsewhere to settle in the land of their forefathers, is the beginning of the foretold Jewish restoration, time only can tell. The final restoration of the Hebrews to their ancient heritage will doubtless occupy a period of several years, and will take place for the most part, as Daniel says, "during a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation." Unfortunately this Jewish emigration has begun in bloodshed and persecutions, and any observant person looking at the present state of the nations of the Continent, would not be surprised any morning to hear of war breaking out, the magnitude of which would not be surpassed "since there was a nation."

We have conditions, then, at the present time, to remind us of the predictions of the prophets, even to the great maritime power, from the isles of the Gentiles, rendering generous and willing assistance in money and ships to the Jews.

But besides all this, we are told that we are approaching the time when the final restoration of the Jews should take place. The exact day or year is not stated in the Scriptures, but we can gather from Daniel that this great event, unspeakably important to Jew and Gentile, would occur in the "Time of the End." The "Time of the End" is or will be evidently the closing years of the "Times of the Gentiles," or the time when Jerusalem will cease to be trodden down by the Gentile powers. Although not expressly stated, it is strongly inferred in the Scriptures that the "Times of the Gentiles" were to continue, in symbolic language, for "Seven Times," or seven years, whose days are years, i.e. 2520 years, according to the year-day interpretation. If we date this "Seven Times," the latter half of which period is often called "time, times, and the dividing of time" from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, "the golden head of the fourfold image," we shall find that the "Times of the Gentiles" are drawing to a close.

Many people believe that the final fall of the Gentile power, and consequently the end of this dispensation, will terminate with the close of the sixth thousandth year of the world, and that the beginning of the seventh thousandth year will usher in the Millennium.*

At the present time many wise and thoughtful people think they can discern the clouds which portend the commencement of the storm, gathering in the distant horizon, and the way in which nations will arrange themselves in order to work out unconsciously the will of Him who knows the end from the beginning. Wars, or a series of wars, which may prove to be the precursors of a new dispensation, may break out ere long, for Europe is in a state of unprecedented ferment, and little better than an armed camp, and, moreover, the Eastern question is still unsolved. It is thought by many strategists, that Palestine will some day be the great battlefield of the nations. A military writer describes the country as "the gateway between the East and West; or rather, as the Barbican which commands the two avenues of the Euphrates and Red Sea line of communication." Russia, next to Turkey, is the power that has the greatest hold on Palestine. Her hospice commands Jerusalem, and is evidently constructed more for military than for religious purposes.

It is now almost universally admitted that the Prophet Ezekiel in speaking of Gog, the chief Prince of Meshech and Tubal, refers to the Czar of Russia and his dominions. The name and titles of the Northern King should be rendered "Gog of the land of Magog, Prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President sent to the Senate the Nominations for the Utah Commission on June 16th. They are all Western men, and it is believed that if confirmed by the Senate they will make a thorough and impartial investigation. They are: Alexander Ramsey, of Minnesota, Algernon S. Paddock, of Nebraska, G. T. Godfrey, of Iowa, Ambrose B. Carleton, of Indiana, and James R. Pettigrew, of Arkansas. Mr. Ramsey has been twice Governor of Minnesota, and served in the United States Senate from that State from 1863 to 1875. Mr. Paddock was elected to the Senate by Nebraska, and served from 1875 to 1881. Mr. Godfrey is Assistant United States District Attorney. Mr. Carleton is a Democratic lawyer and Mr. Pettigrew, of Arkansas, is a journalist by profession and at present is the Journal Clerk of the United States Senate.

The Notorious Whiskey Bill, the Consideration of which led to the appointment of Senator Windom's investigating committee, was defeated in the Senate on June 15th. The bill which passed the House by more than a two-thirds vote, provided for the indefinite extension of the time in which spirits may lie in bond without the payment of tax. The period is now three years. When the proposal was made in the Senate to postpone its consideration indefinitely, 32 votes were given in the affirmative and 20 in the negative. The majority consisted of 22 Republicans, 8 Democrats and 2 Independents.

The House Committee on Appropriations has reported the Naval Appropriation Bill, which, provides for an appropriation of $15,351,996. A large part of this enormous sum Secretary Chandler and Mr. Robeson propose to spend in completing the ships now in the navy yards, which have already cost the nation more than they will ever be worth, and which when completed will be antiquated and practically useless. It may be hoped that this bill will be carefully examined before it is allowed to pass. Mr. Robeson's record in connection with the navy under the Grant régime has not been forgotten by the country, and as it is well known in the House, every item in the appropriation bill should be closely scrutinized.

The Senate Debated the Japanese Indemnity Question on Monday and Tuesday of last week, and finally decided to restore the whole sum received from that country, but without interest. It is now eighteen years since Japan paid three million dollars on the demand of the British Government as joint compensation to four Powers—the United States, Great Britain, France, and the Netherlands for an insult to the flags of those countries. The insult consisted in a rebellious prince of Japan at war with the central government having fired on certain ships passing through the straits of its inland sea. The Government of Japan was granted the alternative of paying the indemnity or of opening its ports to foreign ships. At that time the civil war in Japan prevented the government accepting the latter alternative and so the indemnity was paid, the Japanese Government borrowing the money in London at ten per cent. Of the whole sum the United States received $785,000. Since that time the ports of Japan having been open, it was felt that we had no right to retain the money indemnity as well as enjoy the privileges of trade. Its return has therefore been recommended by four successive Presidents. The House of Representatives voted to return the money with the interest, but on Tuesday, June 13th, the Senate decided to return only the original sum, the caused assigned for retaining the interest being that the Japanese minister had been lobbying for the bill. This reason excited some surprise, as bills supported by the lobby are generally supposed to have a better chance of passing than others.

Two Million Dollars have been Given to the cause of education in New Orleans by Mr. Paul Tulane, of Princeton, N. J., and the deed of endowment was signed a few days ago. Mr. Tulane is a native of Princeton but settled in early life in New Orleans, where he realized an enormous fortune. In 1857 he retired from business and returned to Princeton. He has now vested the whole of his New Orleans property, valued at two millions, in the hands of trustees, the interest thereof to be applied to founding and endowing a college for the education of young men in languages, literature, science and art. Mr. Tulane is well known in Princeton for his liberality. It is stated that it is no uncommon thing for 200 poor families to enjoy a turkey dinner at Christmas and New Years at his expense, and the cold of midwinter has been banished from many a hearth-stone by loads of wood and coal sent by his orders. It has been his habit, also, to confer a double benefit by paying the pew rents of many attendants on his church who were without the means.

An Interesting Conference Commenced its sittings in New Haven, Conn., on June 7th. It was the twelfth annual conference of the Secretaries' Association of the Young Men's Christian Association of the United States and British Possessions. There were about 200 secretaries present, representing the International and State Committees, and the local associations from St. John, N. B., to New Orleans, and from Portland, Maine, to San Francisco, Cal. The conference assembled in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Dates, Secretary of the Glasgow, Scotland, Association, tendered to the conference the greetings of the Associations of Great Britain. A letter was read from Mr. Hind Smith, Secretary of the English National Committee. Each secretary was introduced, giving name, position, and number of years in the service.

The Republican State Convention of Maine assembled at Portland on June 13th. Senator Hale presided, and in the course of his address took occasion to reply to the animadversions the New York Tribune and other journals have thought proper to make on President Arthur and his policy. Mr. Hale said: "Any man who saw President Arthur during those long, weary days when General Garfield hovered on that thin margin which lies next to both life and death, and saw the tender solicitude that yet did not break his calm spirit, will appreciate in some degree the nature that is his. President Arthur is trying to bring all shades of opinion which are essentially Republican into accord, so that they may work together for the good of the country through the Republican party. I have no warrant to speak for him and have sought none; but I know that he has a hard task to perform. The tyranny and the arrogance of men long used to power is hard to bear. The recklessness and unreasonableness of men who are seeking to gain power is just as hard to bear, and between these two the President must keep an even balance if he can. We must do him the justice to remember that he has left undisturbed that great office, the filling of which by President Garfield in the person of Collector Robertson brought on him a fire hotter than that of converging batteries upon a battlefield." The nomination for Governor, which was eagerly sought, was carried by Colonel Frederick Robie. In reference to the Prohibition question, the ninth plank in the platform adopted pledges the party to "support the policy of the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, the wisdom and efficiency of which legislation in promoting the moral and material interests of Maine have been demonstrated through the practical annihilation of that traffic in a large portion of the State; and we favor such legislation and such enforcement of law as will secure to every portion of our territory freedom from that traffic. We further recommend the submission to the people of the constitutional prohibitory amendment." A call has been issued by the Prohibitionists for a meeting on June 24th to decide upon a course of action. It is expected that they will not support the Republican ticket.

A Destructive Tornado Passed over Kansas City, Mo., on June 17th, doing considerable damage. Houses were unroofed and overturned and giant trees were torn up by the roots. Many entire families were missing that night, but it was subsequently found that only one person had been killed, though many had been injured and some seriously. At Leavenworth and St. Louis the storm was still more severe, and in the former city the loss of life is reported serious, although the numbers are not yet ascertained. The scene at St. Louis is thus described by an eye-witness: "When the storm raged fiercest and the houses rocked on their foundations, hundreds of men, women, and children abandoned their beds, preferring to wander around the streets in the pelting rain to running the risk of being crushed by falling houses. The southern portion of the city presented a pitiable sight about midnight, the heavy rain having flooded this part of the town. The families with few exceptions, waded knee-deep in water to seek some place of shelter. Many of them mothers, with infants in their arms and little children clinging to their skirts, made their way in water and mud to the shelter of a friendly freight car. Several steamers in the harbor were sunk and will be a total loss." The storm extended through Iowa inflicting severe losses. Grinnell, Kellogg, and Malcom suffered most. It is believed that in those three cities alone over fifty lives were lost.

A Request for Special Prayer for Iowa has been issued by the Woman's National Temperance Union. The President, Miss Willard, thus writes: Tuesday, June 27th, has been appointed by the Legislature of Iowa as the day when the question of the Amendment to the Constitution, forever prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, shall be submitted to the people of that State. The liquor interest is prepared to make a vigorous fight, and money and speakers are already pouring into the State from all quarters. The enemy is vigilant and determined, but our trust is in God and the righteousness of our cause. In the past He has led us to many a victory, and we will still have the promise of an abundant future. We would, therefore, ask that every local union in each State observe the 27th of June as a day of prayer, and, assembling in the usual place of meeting, pray mightily for the triumph of our cause in the State of Iowa.

Twenty Thousand Unemployed Men in Line at Pittsburg, Pa., on June 17th, showed that the prospects of an early settlement to the labor troubles are still remote. The demonstration is described as decorous and orderly. One of the reports says, "The marked feature of the entire affair was the gentlemanly, soldier-like bearing of the men. All were neatly dressed, some of the delegations wearing white caps, dark coats, white trousers and gloves; others straw hats, white neckties, and boutonnieres. Not one intoxicated man was discernible in the long column, and at no point along the line of march was there any disturbance to cause the least ripple of excitement. Business men are unanimous in their praise of the manner in which the demonstration was conducted." The loss already caused by this dispute is enormous, and every day adds to the sad aggregate. The men express their confidence that the employers, having only small stocks on hand, will yield rather than see their business diverted.

The Value of a Son is Estimated at Five thousand dollars by a litigant named Haefer in the Superior Court in New York. Haefer seeks $5,000 damages from the defendant, a youth named Erscher, because the latter killed his son, Julius Haefer. On September 24th, 1881, Julius Haefer and young Erscher quarrelled, and the latter stabbed the former to the heart, killing him within few minutes. The Grand Jury having refused to indict Erscher, the suit was brought with the desire to punish him through its means. It is probable that if Haefer has the feelings parents generally have, he will consider five thousand dollars, even if he is successful, a poor compensation for the loss of his son, yet if we may judge by their actions, many parents do not realize their responsibility for the care of their children. The exactions they would make to gain five thousand dollars are far greater than they make to ensure the salvation of their children's souls (Psa. 78 : 5-7).

The Treasures Collected by a Mouse were Un-earthed a few days ago at Newton, Mass. In pulling down the piazza of an old hotel the nest of a mouse was found which contained over a quart of pins, hair-pins, and needles, a few small silver and copper coins, and a railroad ticket between Woburn and Boston. It was a strange collection, which must have been gathered with no little difficulty and labor. We do not know to what extent animals have the power of reasoning, but it is evident this little creature could not have been very largely gifted in that direction or it would not have taken so much pains to hoard articles it could not use. But then we may be told and very justly so, that men often do the same thing (Eccles. 1 : 8).

A New Weed is Causing Trouble Among the agriculturists of the Eastern States. A communication to an agricultural journal states that farmers and dairymen are disturbed by the presence of a new weed, known as "Long John," believed to have been brought in Western grass-seed. It grows three feet high, has the appearance of a species of mustard, and blossoms with a small yellow flower. Cattle are extremely fond of it, eating it in preference to grass. The milk from cows feeding upon it is rendered worthless, the butter made therefrom being worse than rancid and utterly valueless for anything but common use. The managers of cheese factories are careful lest a batch of this milk shall spoil the whole make of cheese. A shipment of butter made in New York by one farmer was returned by the retail dealers as worthless. If it is not possible to extirpate this weed the loss is likely to be serious. But the process of extirpation is difficult, as it is in other departments. Only at the first day will it be known how much harm has been done and how much good rendered worthless by the weeds of literature and of the platform, in the world and in the church (Eccles. 9 : 18).

A Captain's Presentiments of Death Received a tragic fulfilment a few days ago. On June 17th the ship Freeman Clarke arrived at the port of New York from Calcutta under the command of the mate, the captain having been murdered at sea. The mate stated that early on the morning of May 7th, as the vessel was proceeding under full sail and with beautiful weather, two Malay Chinese, belonging to the crew, arose, and after murdering the captain, one of them assaulted the mate. After his they were disabled, and while the second officer and the carpenter were in the cabin members of the crew dispatched the two Chinamen and threw their bodies overboard. The antipathy of the Chinamen to the captain was caused by his refusing them permission to smoke opium on board and taking from them their stock of the drug. After this they became like madmen and resolved on killing the captain. A few hours before the murder the mate was on deck when the captain came up. "You seem quite happy," the latter remarked. "Why shouldn't I be," said the mate; "I am nearly home, where I shall meet my wife. You know we were only married on my last voyage. But you are going to meet your father and mother, and you ought to be cheerful, too." "I know I had," said the Captain, "but somehow I can't. It's because I can't get rid of the notion that I shall never live to reach New York." He soon after went down to his cabin, to which the Chinese sailors followed and killed him. This is one of the remarkable cases in which a coming calamity seems to cast its shadow before it. The depression, however, seldom leads men to preparation for the great change. People who are postponing the consideration of their souls' eternal interests to a death-bed will find that depression, physical pain, and awe will hinder them in this serious matter (Isa. 55 : 6).

An Imposition was Unwittingly Aided by a son of the sufferers, recently. The Albany Times says that the son of wealthy parents in New Hampshire, who is attending school in Albany, was lately visited by two men, who produced a deed purporting to be signed by the boy's parents, and conveying valuable farming lands in Pennsylvania, and asked him to certify to the signatures, and thus save them the time and expense of a journey to New Hampshire to remedy the defect. The boy did as requested, and has since learned that the signatures were forgeries. The signatures were probably fair imitations of those of the boy's parents, but he should have applied to his parents for guidance. His experience in this case will doubtless cause him to be more careful before he testifies to the genuineness of anything all through his life. When good Christian men, deceived by plausible reasoning and the apparent confirmation of Scripture wrested from its true meaning, in-dorse doctrines and movements which their Father in Heaven does not bless, and the heresy gains strength thereby, then we are sure that they have trusted to their own wisdom and have not sought divine guidance (1 John 4 : 1).

A Rescue from a Shark is Described by the captain of a schooner from Jacksonville, Fla. He states that when his vessel was off Cape Hatteras a huge shark was seen astern. William Toby, the steward, went to the lee side to draw a bucket of water. One of the battens over the deck-load broke under Toby's feet, and the vessel giving a lurch, he was thrown into the water. The alarm was immediately given and the schooner was hove to. A yawl was immediately launched, and three men went to the rescue. Toby was weighted down by a heavy pair of sea-boots, and kicked vigorously in order to free himself, for the shark was darting at him, and encumbered with the boots he had little chance of escaping. But just then the yawl came up and Toby was seized and dragged into the boat. Had the boat reached him an instant later he would have fallen a victim to the monster fish. The escape was typical of that of men whom the great enemy of souls attempts to make his prey. Their efforts to escape are generally impeded by worldly encumbrances, their wealth, or their poverty, or their associations, or evil habits, and their case is hopeless until Jesus saves them (Heb. 2 : 14, 15).

That Small-pox Contagion may be Spread by the books of public libraries is a theory held by many medical men, and the subject has recently come under serious discussion by the directors of the Chicago Public Library. The librarian was directed to make a report on the subject, and in doing so he explained the precautions taken in Chicago to prevent contagion being spread by that means. He stated that care had been scrupulously taken to prevent books temporarily held by persons exposed to contagion from transmitting disease to other persons. If such books had been directly in contact with a person suffering with the malady, they were burned, and otherwise they were carefully fumigated before they were returned to the shelves of the Public Library. These precautions appear to have been successful, for not a single case of small-pox during the epidemic could be traced to the use of the books. It is a pity that no precaution can be devised to prevent bad books carrying their own moral contagion into the minds and hearts of the readers. Some of our public libraries contain books which are more to be dreaded than a volume reeking with small-pox contagion. These books are principally fiction, and they are more sought after than any other class of books, as Paul warned us they would be in the latter days (2 Tim. 4 : 3, 4).

PRAYING AND PLEADING.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us, do Thou it for Thy name's sake : for our backslidings are many ; we have sinned against Thee. O the hope of Israel, the saviour thereof in time of trouble, why shouldst Thou be as a stranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night ? Why shouldst Thou be as a man astonished, as a mighty man that cannot save ? yet Thou, O Lord, art in the midst of us, and we are called by Thy name ; leave us not."—Jeremiah 14 : 7, 8, 9.

A Nation in Dire Trouble—People who have Passed the Frontier of Hope—I. A Prayer for Backsliding Christians—Begin by Pleading Guilty—Admitting that there is no Excuse—Appealing for Mercy—Make a Plea out of God's Name—Of His Promise—On the Ground of Ownership—Of His Connection with His People—II. A Model Prayer for the Distressed Un-saved—Confessing Guilt—Without Extenuating—A Strong Plea—Relying on a Promise—Victims of a Satanic Delusion—A Picture of Infamy—Those for whom Mercy is Reserved.

THIS passionate appeal for mercy was forced from the people by extreme misery. There was a famine in the land until men fell in the streets of the city exhausted with hunger. Drought had long prevailed, and dearth of water was terribly felt. Meanwhile invasion kept them in perpetual fear, so that the prophet lamented, "If I go forth into the field, then behold the slain with the sword ! and if I enter into the city, then behold them that are sick with famine !" Such judgment had God inflicted on a guilty nation for her sin.

As the calamity, like a river of lava, burned its dreadful way, an eye witness, in his heart's anguish, describes a few common scenes which forcefully tell the tale of utter desolation. Princes and peasants are seized with a like consternation ; the prophet paints them both with their heads covered in token of a common grief. Here in the city the children are coming back from the place of pools and fountains with empty pitchers, for they find not a drop of water in the pits. Out yonder in the fields the ground is chapped and cleft by the scorching sun in the absence of dew or rain. The plough is of no use in that parched soil. Husbandmen are sitting down ashamed, confounded, utterly dejected ; it is vain for them to lift the hand of labor. Down in the valleys the dumb cattle express their feeling with throes of anguish. What a dreadful thing for a country to be placed as it were at the oven's mouth, and to become so completely burned up, that even the wild beasts can discover no pasture, and their eyes fail because there is no grass.

Nothing could help the people. Grim death stared them in the face. None of their idol gods could cause rain, and without it they must all perish. Under such circumstances prayer to God was the last and only resource. Driven to their wits' end they now began to be wise. The prophet has expressed in admirable words the penitent confessions and the earnest supplications of those who were ready to perish. Our text is a most appropriate model of humble petitioning. I can easily imagine that all the Jews of the land were willing enough to adopt this form of prayer at such an extremity, and to follow it with a fervent "Amen." Theirs was prayer in terror, not prayer in penitence.

What a mercy it is that God does hear real prayer, even if it be presented to Him only because we are in distress. "Call upon me," saith the Lord, "in the day of trouble ; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me." When the prodigal went home to his father, his father did not say, "You have only come home because you were hungry. You seek a meal among my hired servants because you could not fill yourself with the husks wherewith the swine are fed." No, not so. Every word was welcome, every look was love. He "giveth liberally, and upbraideth not." He does not fling into the teeth of a sincere penitent any reproach concerning the past. There is no scowl on the heavenly Father's face, no scolding words are uttered by His lips. Nay ; but He opens wide His arms of love, and clasps His lost one to His heart. The Lord of mercy bids the poor and needy come to Him and welcome, though he may have been a rake and a profligate.

What a dreadful state, then, must those men be in to whose prayers the God of all grace has resolved to shut His ears. Thank God, my dear hearers, that you are still on praying ground and pleading terms with Him. How terrible the case of any who have passed

THE FRONTIER OF HOPE.

The case described in this chapter did not admit of pity or pardon. No chastisement could condone crimes which had been so repeated and gloried in. The Lord Himself bade Jeremiah not to pray for these people. If you read the sequel you will find that God declared that though Moses and Samuel stood before Him, though the mightiest of intercessors and the best and most honored of saints were to join in supplication, yet He would not hear them, for His mind was made up to ease Him of His adversaries. Their hour of doom was come, the scaffold was ready, the executioner was at hand. Take heed, ye that trifle with mercy, lest God should put by the silver sceptre and draw the sword out of its sheath. Take heed, ye that scorn the mercy-seat, lest it turn into a burning throne of wrath, and you "perish from the way while His wrath is kindled but a little."

That is not the condition of things with us at this time, blessed be His name; and so I may invite you to notice the text as an excellent example to God's own people who are in a wandering state; and afterwards I shall use it as an instructive example for sinners conscious of their sins, who would fain come to God and find mercy.

I. First, then, I speak to the church of God at large wherever it has backslidden, and to each believer in particular who may have departed from the living God in any measure or degree.

Would you take with you words and turn unto the Lord? You cannot have better words than those now before you. Begin by pleading guilty. It is hard to bring men to this, yet there is no forgiveness apart from it. "O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us, do Thou it for Thy name's sake, for our backslidings are many. We have sinned against Thee." The sin-stricken soul has no defence, nor even an excuse, to offer on its own behalf. The penitent cries, Guilty; ay, guilty; for there is no denying it. Our iniquities testify against us. If there were not witnesses of our sin, our sins themselves bear witness against us. Oh that every child of God felt this if he has in the least gone aside from the paths of holiness! It is not only that Thou seest us, O our God; or that our brother Christians may have seen our faults, or even that some scoffers in the world have spied them out, and may be all too ready to bear witness against us; but our sins themselves have gone before us to the judgment-seat, and testify against us. Therefore, O my brother, come with me; take the sinner's place; be abashed as an erring child; and come before the great Father and say, "Our iniquities testify against us."

While there is no denying it, let us admit that there is no excusing it, "for our backslidings are many." If we could have excused ourselves for our first faults by offering a degree of extenuation for the fickleness of our youth, yet what are we to say of the transgressions of our riper years? If you, my brethren, could say, "Lord when we began to be believers we were ignorant and feeble, and we were readily carried away by temptation," you cannot make that apology now when years have given you stability, experience has brought you knowledge, and the favor and protection of God have ripened your character, or should have done so. "Our backslidings are many."

I feel as if I could not preach about this, for it touches my heart, and makes me feel ready to weep. Much rather should I like every one to say to himself, "What have I done? What have I left undone? How far have I declined from the ways of the Lord?" Turn over the records of your life, brother Christian. What have you done for Christ? What have you done for the truth, for the souls of men, for the spread of your Redeemer's kingdom? Alas, may you not so have lived as even to have disparaged the truth, and done injury to the cause which is so dear to you? "Our backslidings are many." We cannot count them; their number is as great as their guilt. It is well for us to feel that extenuation and apology and excuse are out of the question.

Ay, and not only is it past denying and past excusing, but also it is past computing. We cannot measure how great have been our transgressions, as that next sentence may well imply: "We have sinned against Thee." It looks, at first sight, as if that were the smaller sentence of the three; but let me read it again, and throw the emphasis where it ought to be; and then you will see that it is the heaviest clause in the indictment. "We have sinned against Thee." That is what David always lays the emphasis upon when he makes his confession—"Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight." This is the prodigal's confession: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee." Oh, brothers and sisters, to have sinned against our Father and His infinite love, against our Saviour and His precious blood, against the Holy Ghost and all His gentle strivings and His sweet comfortings and blessed teachings—this is to have sinned with a vengeance. What shall we say of ourselves? Do not such sins strike us dumb?

Next to this plea of guilty, we find that the culprits do most vehemently

APPEAL TO GOD FOR MERCY.

Please observe carefully how they order their cause before Him; and with what arguments, as Job hath it, they fill their mouths. They dare not plead before God that if He will have mercy upon them they will do better; for their many backslidings render such a promise hopeless. Brothers, are you not sick of promising that you will from this time forward amend your lives? I hardly think that we are convinced of our sinfulness if we flatter ourselves that we shall do better in the future. Canst thou again trust that broken bone which has let thee fall so many times? Canst thou again trust that tongue of thine when already thou hast been unable to rule it? Canst thou trust that flaming member which has been ready to set on fire the course of nature? What, trust thy heart again? Go, confide in the wind or the treacherous sea; but trust not thy treacherous resolution.

"If I could only have my life over again," says one, "I should do better." My brother, I should not like to have my life over again for fear I should do worse; and worse I should do, unless I had more grace. Ah, brothers, it never does to say to God, "Lord, forgive the backslidings of the past, for I shall do better by-and-by." Suppose you do. There is no merit in that; but it is a wild supposition; for you will do nothing of the kind. "Ay, but," you say, "I am now more resolved than I was. I am older and wiser now, and I feel quite safe because my resolution is so strong." This is fine talk for one who is no better than a reed shaken of the wind. We know not what spirit we are of. We are worse than we think we are.

Child of God, it is well for you in prayer before the Lord to get rid of every sort of excuse, apology or palliation. Let your self-impeachment stand in the forefront of your petition—"O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us, do Thou it for Thy name's sake; for our backslidings are many; we have sinned against Thee." But still for they make a plea out of God's name. From the badness of the rebellious subjects to the goodness of the righteous Sovereign is a rapid but reasonable transition. A weighty motive is suggested that may dispose God to be merciful; but that motive is drawn exclusively from Himself: "Though our iniquities testify against us, do Thou it for Thy name's sake." Oh the majesty of the name of the Lord! The fame thereof is wonderful throughout all generations. So David said, "For Thy name's sake, O Lord, pardon mine iniquity, for it is great." Come, then, desponding brothers. Here is a prayer which will avail for us when the night is darkest, and not a star is to be seen. The distracted nation is drawn into closer fellowship as the story of the past suggests a plea for her present distress.

Nor is this all: the covenant of grace promise a glorious future, and this promise is pleaded at the Lord is called "the hope of Israel." It is well to draw upon the bank of hope as well as up on the bank of experience. When thy cup is full of sorrow, and thy face is covered with shame and not a ray of light falls on thy dreary path, remember that there is a history full of grace behind us, and a prophecy full of glory before us; and it all wrapped up in the name of Him who is the hope of every contrite heart. But take good heed: your hope is not a vague hope. See to it that you believe in God firmly, and that you lay hold upon an actual promise of His word or some statute of His kingdom very tightly; for then you may hope to your heart's content. Beloved, a hope so grounded shall never fail you.

Then, next, she does not mention the name, but it is implied in the words. She says, "Whouldest thou be as a stranger in the land?"—on who is merely travelling through the country and takes little interest in its trouble because he is not a citizen—one who merely puts up for a night in the house, and therefore does not enter into the cares and trials of the family. She does as good as call him master, lord of the house, and his ownership is pleaded in the suit. Jesus, Thou art head of the family. Thou art the Lord, the husband. Wilt Thou act as if Thou wert a mere lodger or a stranger? Tell Him that your house is His—that the church is His—that He is the head of it and plead with Him that He will not lay aside His position, or neglect that condescending responsibility which He voluntarily took upon Himself when He became the head of His church, and undertook on her behalf to be her Redeemer. Plead with Him thus, for His name's sake, and you will win a gracious reply.

Then the argument ventures a little farther, and the plea is this, "Thou, O Lord, art in the midst of us, and we are called by Thy name." God's presence with His church and His connection with it becomes a plea. Have I not thus pleaded some times for this church when I have thought over its sins and its wanderings? I have said: And ye, Lord, Thou art in the midst of us. We do have Thy presence at Thy table and in the prayer-meeting. Thou art with this people right blessedly and we are called by Thy name; and if Thou should leave us, the ungodly world will say, "In that edifice was once assembled a church of God, but has become deserted. There in former times Gospel ministry flourished, but it has failed." Never it should be so said, Thy name will be dishonored.

Some of you who are trying to serve God have floated into lately, and you are in great trouble. Now, if you can somehow implicate God in what you are doing you will greatly strengthen your cause. Are you His servant, acting in His name, and entangle with difficulties that arise out of conscientiously following His command and trusting in His promise? Then you may say to him, "Do it for Thy name's sake." Though our iniquities have been many—though we have not served Thee as we ought to do—though we have backslidden often yet, Lord, do not punish Thyself on account of us. Do not put Thy name to dishonor because of our folly. Do not put Thy Gospel to the rout because we are so unbelieving; but do, for Thine own honor's sake, now interpose and deliver Thy servants in this their time of need.

II. Having thus tried to put before you, though very feebly, the good ground on which your feet may stand while you are wrestling with God, I want for a very few minutes to speak with those poor troubled hearts that do not yet know the Lord, or fear that they do not.

To my text as a whole they have no title; but from the matter of it we may draw some valuable suggestions for their use. Are there not among us many, who though strangers to the fellowship of the saints, are and desirous to find peace with God? Are there not many who would fain obtain salvation from the God of grace? You say, "I want peace." Then

I pray you, take heed that you do not put up with a false peace, or calm your conscience with anything less than true reconciliation with God. Better be always restless than find rest in a delusion. Begin and continue in the way of truth, for this will endure to the end, while all that is false will burst like a bubble.

Begin first by confessing your guilt. Come, my dear hearer, there can be no benefit in trying to conceal anything, therefore acknowledge your transgression. God can see it all; but there will be great benefit in your seeing it and confessing it before Him. Do not try to patch up a righteousness of your own. Jesus Christ is never sweet to any but to sinners. You have to prove that you are a sinner, not a saint; for Jesus gave Himself for our sins, not for our merits. Remember, when Christ comes to fill us, the first thing we need to know is our own emptiness. Do not, therefore, go upon the tack of trying to make any kind of defence; but acknowledge your sins, and say, "My iniquities testify against me."

Some of you could not make out a plea of righteousness if you were to try; your life-long actions would confound you if you attempted it. When people come in here who never heard the Gospel before, they are often brought speedily to receive Christ because, when God blesses the word to such, it is not difficult to convince them of sin. They are so plainly guilty that they do not dream of disguising it. They never attempt to mend their old clothes, for they are too far gone, and only fit for the dunghill. They would only make greater rents by patching up such old and rotten materials. Come, oh ye poor ragged sinners, in all your rended garments, in all your loathsomeness and sin, and say each one, "Lord, I own that my transgressions testify against me; it is not the first time that I have been anxious, or the first time that I have promised better things, but I have been a deceiver until now. My backslidings are many. I am an old sinner, and a hardened sinner. I have sinned against convictions, sinned against a tender conscience, sinned against the restraints of Thy Spirit."

Ah, my hearer,

YOU ARE A BAD FELLOW;

and I want you to own it. I want you to stand in the dock like a felon and plead, "Guilty," but be sure you do not add, "Only there are extenuating circumstances." There are no such circumstances in your case. You are thoroughly unworthy, and deserve to be sent to hell. If you had died in your sins twenty years ago, and had been condemned without mercy, your wickedness would have abundantly vindicated the sentence of the Judge. Do you kick against that? I hope not: it will be your wisdom to admit your terrible desert of punishment. I beseech you, put your confession into words and state truthfully what you have done. The sense of your wickedness will grow more keen when you recall your follies.

Remember, too, the forms in which you have sinned against God. You have violated the laws which regulate your life. You have set at naught those counsels which make for your physical health and your moral welfare. It is bad enough to have sinned against a mother's tears and a father's prayers. It is bad enough to have sinned against your own body, and to have disregarded your wife and your children. That is sad enough and horrible enough. Many have gone deep enough in that direction to crimson their cheeks with shame. But you have despised the God that made you; you have dishonored your Creator. You have lived to gratify your own lusts; you have delighted in defying His laws. "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib;" alas, dumb driven cattle have been more dutiful than you.

The Lord raised you up from fever, He sheltered you in storm, He rescued you from shipwreck, He has delivered you many times from going down into the pit by sudden death, yet have you been unmindful of Him and unthankful to Him. You have doated on the idols that provoked Him. Feel this! Own this! Mourn this! Come before the Lord in penitent contrition. But mind you are sincere. Think not that the language of a litany will avail you if you falsely say, "Lord, have mercy upon us miserable sinners," when you are not miserable, and do not believe that you are sinners at all. Rather may God the Holy Ghost work such deep conviction in your spirit that the language of my text may seem too feeble for you; may you be compelled to cry out, "O God, no speech can tell the depth of my guilt. Forgive me, for Thy mercy sake."

Shall I leave you there sitting down in abject despair? Doubtless in such depths we learn that salvation is of the Lord. Be sure of this—can exonerate you. Apologies drawn from your constitution or your circumstances will only aggravate your crimes. Your only ground for hope must be based on His grace. Call now upon His name. "For Thy name's sake." You big sinner say, "Lord, if Thou wilt save me, it will be a great instance of Thy power." "Well," said one the other day, "it is of no use your trying to convert me. If I ever shall be converted it will need God Himself to do it, for I am such a tough fellow." Yes, yes, and the Lord delights to let men see what He can do: He proves that He is omnipotent in the moral world as well as in the physical world, and as able to subdue freewill as to stay the raging of the wild winds that sweep the sea.

If the Lord were to forgive a dozen ordinary sinners it would not so much display His mercy among men as in saving one unusually vile transgressor. Plead this. There may be somebody listening to this discourse whom this word exactly suits.

A great point is to be able to lay hold upon a promise, a promise in the Book. I recollect when seeking the Lord the sweetness of that saying to my heart—"Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." I found liberty when I could plead that. I said, "Lord, as far as I know what it means, I do call upon Thy name. I have no other name to call upon, and Thou hast said that whosoever doth call upon Thy name shall be saved. Now for Thy word's sake, do not draw back. I know Thou canst not lie. Fulfil Thy promise even to me."

Brethren, we cannot say to a man when we have made him a promise, "I promised to do this for you, but you are such a bad fellow." That would be no excuse for our breaking our promise. You must honor your promise even if you feel ashamed of the person to whom it was made. The Lord in mercy having made a promise never quotes our character as a reason why He should break it. He knew all about you when He made the promise, and so He is not surprised. He knows more about you now than you know about yourself. He knows that you are a thousand times worse than you think you are. He has a much deeper sense of your guilt than you have. Still, for all that, He is ready to pardon. Plead His promise with Him and He will stand to His word.

Do any of you doubt the possibility of your obtaining mercy of the Lord, because of the depths of your iniquity, or the ruinous consequences it has already wrought? Believe me, you are victims of a delusion of Satan. The Lord God merciful and gracious passes by iniquity, transgression, and sin. There are some parts of the book of Jeremiah that I should not like to read to you. I can hardly think that they were meant to be read in public, they are intended rather for our private meditations.

There is, however,

which I will merely hint at, though it has often excited my profound astonishment. It runs something like this, "They say if a man put away his wife, and she go from him and be another man's and play the harlot, shall he take her to himself again? Shall not that land be greatly polluted? Yet return unto me, saith the Lord." Do you see the drift of this striking illustration? Here is a woman kindly treated in every way who wilfully leaves her husband. She has not been led astray by a profligate, but she has wantonly left her husband of her own wicked self. She has defiled her name and her honor, and to crown her infamy then she has even left her paramour, and she has gone on the streets and become utterly vile. Shall her first husband take her back again after her multiplied and manifest impurities? Would it not pollute the land? Everybody will say, "Why, this is an offence against morality. She has dishonored herself, she has dishonored her husband, she has dishonored her country." "Yet," says God, "return unto me." Is not this beyond the manner of man? So does the mercy of the Lord transcend even the statutes of the law.

You will see the force of this more clearly if you compare the third chapter of Jeremiah with the twenty-fourth chapter of Deuteronomy. The parable is startling. God is represented as dealing with an idolatrous nation as it would be an abomination before His own eyes for any man to deal with an unchaste wife. Such delight hath Jehovah in mercy that He dispenses it at the risk of public odium. He knew that the self-righteous would cavil, and that even elder brothers would be angry, but He dared all that.

Henceforth let there be no demur on your part. "Yet return again unto me, saith the Lord." If there be any obloquy it must rest on His name whose holiness cannot be sullied. The elders in our Saviour's day who sat in Moses's seat thought it an open scandal that He received publicans and harlots. I am not surprised that when He gave welcome to such fallen ones they were glad to come; but I am beyond measure astonished at those of you who put aside the only Gospel that can do you good. Why argue instead of accepting the Lord's open invitation? Every evangelist who preaches pardon and peace by the blood of the Lamb braves the ethics of the age; the new teaching is that people must reap the consequences of their actions; there is no hope of ever undoing anything that a man does, and therefore there can be no Gospel to the guilty. Yes, I know that this is what the reign of law seems to demand; but, for all that, the Lord would sooner that men should accuse Him of weakening the principles of morality than refuse a poor sinner who comes to Him in Christ Jesus.

I know that, if we receive certain persons into the church, the mere moralists cry out "How can they associate with such people?" Yet come along, come along, ye chief of sinners. The vilest are welcome to Christ. You that are worse than the worst—you who have leaped over the hedge, and have got upon the wild commons of outrageous sin, may come to Jesus. Do you sing—

"Depths of mercy, can there be Mercy still reserved for me?"

It is reserved for you. You are the person for whom it is reserved. This deep consciousness of sin, this guilt of yours which you feel and own, points you out as the one to whom I am to say, Return unto the Lord, for He will have mercy upon you. Amen.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

Miss Eva Booth.

MISS EVA BOOTH.

MISS EVA BOOTH, whose portrait appears on this page, is about fifteen years old, and is the sixth member of General Booth's family converted in early childhood. She frequently accompanies her sister Emma in rendering duets and other sacred songs at services of the Salvation Army, with the happiest effect. Her voice is rich and full, and its tones are full of tenderest pathos, and very penetrating. In singing, her enunciation is so distinct that the words are as clearly heard by the congregation as the tune; and in this respect she is qualified to take her place among the sweet singers in Israel, who by means of music wedded to holy words seek to commend the Gospel to the unsaved multitudes.

In former years, when Mrs. Booth was frequently absent from home, engaged in evangelistic work in different parts of the country, ill-natured critics, who sometimes promote the religious welfare neither of their own children nor of others, said, that it would be better for her if she were at home, looking after her children. The groundless nature of such an objection is clearly shown in the fact that so many of her sons and daughters have not only given themselves to Christ at an early age, but several of them are already occupying prominent positions of usefulness in the kingdom of Christ. While the mother was engaged in work for her Saviour He took care that her children did not suffer by her absence.

MR. HERBERT HOWARD BOOTH.

MR. HERBERT HOWARD BOOTH is a son of the Rev. W. Booth, the General of the Salvation Army, whose portrait and life, with those of his wife, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 16th. He was born at Penzance, England, in 1862. His conversion took place in early years. He has frequently described it and attributes the great change to the blessing of God on a remarkable dream which he had when he was only seven years old, and which left an indelible impression on his mind and finally led him to cry to God for salvation.

"One evening," he relates, "when I was seven years old, a little past seven o'clock I had to leave the nice lighted room, kiss mamma, and go to bed. I did not like to go to bed, as very few little boys do. So I went upstairs as slowly as I could, and played about in the nursery, hoping that nurse would not notice the time. But, at last, she found that it was late. I was put to bed at once, tucked up, kissed, good-night said, and left all in the dark by myself. I felt very frightened in the dark, so tucked my head under the clothes, so that I could not hear anything, and went to sleep.

"I slept until I thought I saw a large flat plain, which had at one end a beautiful golden gate and high walls. All was silent for a little while. Then I thought I heard the sound of distant music and singing, which came nearer and nearer, until I saw a great crowd of people. They marched across the plain, when all at once the golden gates flew open, and I saw a beautiful place like a lovely garden, with green trees, and blue rivers, and waterfalls. All the people went in one by one, until I thought I heard the voice of some one I knew, and when I looked I saw papa and mamma both going in. Then came my little brothers and sisters. They all looked so happy, and when they were all in, and the big golden gates shut, I remembered that I was not in.

"Just at that moment, I saw a great, big trap-door open from the ground, and a great stream of smoke flew up into the air. I watched outside, and as I looked I saw a great, big thing, with its long fingers, great green eyes and great ugly teeth, come up, dragging a big chain after it.

"It looked around! I held my breath, in the hope that it would not see me. I thought of all the naughty things I had ever done, of the stories I had told, of the sugar and butter I had stolen. I cried in awful fear, and just then I saw that nasty thing cast its eye upon me, and move toward me.

"Nearer! Nearer! Nearer! it came, until it stood over me, and shook its chain. Then it reached out its hand, and touched me with its long finger. I screamed at the top of my voice, and woke up to find it was all a dream. Mamma came in to know what was the matter with me, and I told her all. By her wish I knelt down, and prayed, child as I was, for salvation, and, although I did many naughty things after that time, yet I have always tried to fight against them, and have always felt that Jesus was helping me."

He first spoke in public when fourteen years old—standing opposite a liquor store in Hackney, and has continued ever since, more or less frequently, to take part in the Salvation Army's work. While attending school at Coventry and Nottingham he availed himself of every opportunity to take part in the work of the Army, and while living at Bristol for a short time, he searched the town until he found the Circus, completed arrangements for the opening of it by the Army, thus becoming a sort of parent to the corps established in that city, and in the neighborhood. But while walking about street after street looking for vacant buildings in the rain, he got a wetting which ended in rheumatic fever, from the after effects of which he still continues to suffer.

Miss Emma Booth.

After travelling the country for some time for special occasions, he went with his eldest sister to Paris, and remained there for about nine months of the first year, rendering invaluable service in connection with the singing and the keeping of order.

He has made music his specialty, and plays the violin, cornet, concertina, guitar, and bass viol, besides being an adept at solo-singing, and occasionally plays on the piano and harmonium, though these latter instruments, not being portable, are rarely used by the Army. The great musical events of the recent congress have been the songs composed and sung by him to two music-hall tunes, which he had adapted for the Army.

Though devotedly fond of music, Mr. Booth regards it as wholly subservient to the cause of Christ. In a recent address published in the War Cry to the Salvation Army, especially to the bands of the different corps, he says:

"I trust that every player of every instrument of the Salvation Army feels and realises that he is actually praising God when he plays that instrument. If you cannot do this, my brothers and sisters, put it away till you can. If you cannot play your music as David played his, then play none at all; but if so, then sing unto Him a new song, play skilfully with a loud noise. "To bring the real music of Heaven to earth, and set it proclaiming, throughout its length and breadth, 'glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good will to men,' is our intention, is our determination."

MISS EMMA BOOTH.

MISS EMMA BOOTH, Commandante of the Women's Training Barracks, has been less known, perhaps, than any of the elder members of General Booth's family. This is partly owing to her delicate health, and partly to the retiring and less public duties she has performed.

From her youth she was much distinguished for a spirit of devotion to God and duty, and for intense hatred to anything bordering on deception, the influence of the Holy Ghost upon her heart being very deep. After the work of the Salvation Army was organized, Mrs. Booth's frequent absences from home rendered Miss Emma Booth's position as an elder daughter one of serious responsibility and the younger children, her brothers and sisters, came at length to regard her as a second mother. She was thus prematurely matured for her years, but right wisely and well did she perform the duties devolving upon her.

Miss Emma has become known to many as the singer of army songs with her sister, Eva, in the larger meetings of the Army. She rarely speaks in public, but when she does it is with a fervor that gives to the listener some idea of her incomparable power in close personal dealing with the conscience and heart.

As an instance of her close communion with God, she had a remarkable answer to prayer given to her in reference to the Clapton Congress Hall. Before General Booth purchased the building for $75,000, or had even thought of doing so, Miss Emma went over the building and knelt down in one of the rooms, asking God whether they should entertain the project of purchasing it. She rose from her knees strongly impressed with the conviction that they would obtain it, and that it would become a source for the diffusion of great blessing.

Two years ago she consented to take charge of the Women's Training Home, and since then over one hundred officers have gone out from the Home. How truly it is a home, and how perfectly maternal is the influence wielded by Miss E. Booth over her cadets, only those who have benefited by her tuition can fully tell. As to the earnest spirit in which the work is done, the following extract from an address, issued at Christmas last, affords evidence:

"I thank the Lord, with you, for all He has enabled you to do, this year, toward bringing light, righteousness, and peace into this dark world of ours, and I want this Christmas time to be a fresh starting point, when you may each commence again with more whole-heartedness of purpose and more unflinching efforts to be and do all He expects you to be and do.

"I write to you not as one who from afar looks down upon your toils; but with a heart full of sympathy for you each in all you do and suffer for Jesus' sake. I want, so far as it is possible, to share with you in it all, knowing no choicer joy than to be your friend in the fight."

ESTHER WILMOT'S IRRETRIEVABLE MISTAKE.

ONE lovely summer evening, about an hour before sunset, a man of some thirty-five years of age was sauntering along the beach on the outskirts of a quiet little village which lay basking in the sunlight at the foot of the mountains. A judge of physiognomy would not have been attracted to the man by his countenance. The eyes were too near together, and were too deeply set, and the brows were too lowering to convey the impression that he was a man to be respected or liked, though he might be feared. There was, too, in his gait, a slouching action which indicated a trait of character not numbered among the desirable characteristics; and the vicious manner in which he kicked, now and then, a pebble from his path, gave one the idea that he could be cruel on occasion.

This man was Frank Wilmot, the newly wedded husband of an orphan girl; and he was on his wedding trip. He and his bride were spending a week or two in the little village he had just left behind him before they returned to the city where they were to live their wedded life. It seemed strange, that on a night so lovely as that, Frank Wilmot should not have had his young wife with him, but he had left her behind with the remark that he was going to the nearest town and might not be home until late. This was the third time in ten days he had acted so strangely, and on both the previous occasions he had returned morose, sullen, his speech thick and smelling of liquor.

Esther Wilmot knew only too well how to interpret these signs in her husband. Reluctant as she was to think ill of a man whom only a few short days before she had solemnly promised to love, honor, and obey, there was no concealing, even from herself, the appalling fact that she had married a drunkard. She had married a gambler, too, but of that fact she was not yet aware. On this evening she sat alone, after her husband left her, wrapped in gloomy meditation. What ought she to do? That was her agonized cry, and at last she flung herself on her knees and prayed earnestly for wisdom.

When she arose her face wore a resolute look that

Frank had never seen there, and she hurriedly dressed and went out. She walked rapidly, for she had a purpose in view. Her steps, light and swift, soon brought her within sight of her husband still moodily sauntering along the beach. In a few minutes more she was at his side, and almost before he was aware of her presence, her hand was laid lovingly on his arm.

"Frank, dear," she said, "let me walk a little way with you. I am so lonely in that strange place, and I want to talk with you." Then, in tender, pleading words, such as a devoted woman knows so well how to use, she told him of her apprehensions, and how she had prayed that he might be kept from ill.

Suddenly he stopped in his walk, and dropping her arm, turned and faced her. He did not speak, but thinking he was about to abandon his projected excursion, Esther said: "O you will come back with me, Frank? I am so glad." But that was not Frank's intention. He simply told her he did not propose to be governed by a wife. Then, with brutal frankness, he told her that he had married her for her fortune, and that he proposed to enjoy himself in his own way. After a blow so cruel from the man she loved Esther could plead no longer, and turning homeward, she bent her steps back to the village weeping bitter tears.

Frank Wilmot kept his word. Having succeeded in possessing himself of Esther's fortune, knowing that she had no protector to enforce her rights, he plunged into a career of dissipation, and for weeks together, Esther never saw his face. Neglected, ill-treated, and penniless, she was forced to earn a living for herself, and through many a weary hour as she sat sewing for bread, she meditated on the folly of which she had been guilty in making a thoughtless marriage with a man who, as she knew before she married him, was not a Christian. She learned too late that the Apostle Paul's caution (2 Cor. 6: 14), like all other Scriptural admonitions, cannot be disregarded with impunity.

COBWEBS AND CABLES.

A Serial Story. By Hesba Stretton.

Near the End.

CANON PASCAL made no effort to find out Phebe's secret. His searching, kindly eyes met hers with the truthfulness of a frank and open nature that recognized a nature akin to its own, and Phebe never shrank from his gaze.

"Felix and Alice are growing more and more deeply in love with each other," he said to her; "Felicitia even felt something of their happiness when she was here last, and she will not withhold her full approbation much longer."

"And you," answered Phebe, with an eager flush on her face, "you do not repent of giving Alice to the son of a man who might have been a convict?"

"I believe Alice would marry Felix if his father had been a murderer," replied Canon Pascal; "it is too late to alter it now. Besides, I know Felix through and through, he is himself; he is no longer the son of any person, but a true man, one of the sons of God."

The strong and emphatic tone of Canon Pascal's words brought great consolation to Phebe's troubled mind. She might keep silence with a good conscience, for the duty of disclosing all to Canon Pascal arose simply from the possibility that his conduct would be altered by this further knowledge of Roland and Felicity.

"But this easy country life is not good for Felix," she said in a more cheerful tone, "he needs a difficult parish to develop his energies. It is not among your people he will become a second Felix Merle."

"Patience! Phebe," he answered, "there is a probability in the future, a bare probability, and dimly distant, which may change all that. He may have as much to do as Felix Merle by-and-by."

Phebe returned to her work in London with a somewhat lighter heart. Yet the work was painful to her; work which a few months before would have been a delight. For Felicity, yielding to the urgent entreaties of Felix and Hilda, had consented to sit for her portrait. She was engaged in no writing, and had ample leisure. Until now she had resisted all importunity, and no likeness of her existed. She disliked photographs, having had only one taken for Roland alone when they were married, and she could never bring herself to sit for an artist comparatively a stranger to her. It was opposed to her reserved and somewhat haughty temperament that any eye should scan too freely and too curiously the lineaments of her beautiful face, with its singularly expressive individuality. But now that Phebe's skill had been so highly cultivated, and commanded an increasing reputation, she could no longer oppose her children's reiterated entreaties.

Felicity was groping blindly for the reason of the change in Phebe's feeling toward her, conscious as she was of some vague, mysterious barrier that had arisen between her, and the tender, simple soul which had been always full of lowly sympathy for her. But Phebe silently shrank from her in a terror mingled with profound, unutterable pity. For here was the secret misery of a solitary human spirit, icebound in a self-chosen isolation, which was an utter mystery to her.

All the old love and reverence, amounting almost to adoration, which she had offered up as incense to some being far above her had died away; gone also was the child-like simplicity with which she could always talk to Felicity. She could read the pride and sadness of the lovely face before her with a clear understanding now, but the lines which reproduced it on her canvas were harder and sterner than they would have been if she had known less of Felicity's heart. The painting grew into a likeness, but it was a painful one, full of hidden sadness, bitterness, and infelicity. Felix and Hilda gazed at it in silence, almost as solemn and mournful as if they were looking on the face of their dead mother. She herself turned from it with a feeling of dread.

"How much do you know of me?" she cried; "how deep can you look into my heart, Phebe?" Phebe glanced from her to the finished portrait, and only answered by tears.

Felicity had followed the urgent advice of her physicians in giving up writing for a season. There was no longer any necessity for her work, as some time since the money which Roland Sefton had fraudulently appropriated, had been paid back with full interest, and she began to feel justified in accepting the income from her marriage settlement. During the winter and spring she spent her days much as other women of her class and station, in a monotonous round of shopping, driving in the parks, visiting and being visited, partly for Hilda's sake, and partly driven to it for want of occupation; but short as the time was which she gave to this life, she grew inexpressibly weary of it. Early in May she turned into Phebe's studio, which she had seldom entered since her portrait was finished. This portrait was in the Academy Exhibition, and she was constantly receiving empty compliments about it.

"Dear Phebe!" she explained, "I have tried fashionable life to see how much it is worth, and oh! it is altogether hollow and inane. I did not expect much from it, but it is utter weariness to me."

"And you will go back to your writing?" said Phebe.

Felicity hesitated for a moment. There was a worn and harassed expression on her pale face, as if she had not slept or rested well for a long time, which touched Phebe's heart.

"Not yet," she answered; "I am going a journey. I shall start for Switzerland to-night."

"To Switzerland! To-night!" echoed Phebe. "Oh, no! you must not, you cannot. And alone? How can you think of going alone?"

"I went alone once," she answered, smiling with her lips, though her dark eyes grew no brighter, "and I can go again. I shall manage very well. I fancied you would not care to go with me," she added, sighing.

"But I must go with you!" cried Phebe; "did I not promise long ago? Only don't go to-night, stay a day or two."

"No, no," she said with feverish impatience, "I have made all my arrangements. Nobody must know, and Hilda is gone down into Essex for a week, and my cousins fancy I am going to the sea-side for a few days' rest. I must start to-night, in less than four hours, Phebe. You cannot be ready in time?"

But she spoke wistfully, as if it would be pleasant to hear Phebe say she would go with her. For a few minutes Phebe was lost in bewildered thought. Felicity had told her some months ago that she must go to Engelberg before she could give her consent to Felix marrying Alice, but it had escaped her memory, pushed out by more immediate and more present cares. And now she could not tell what Jean Merle would have her do. To discover suddenly that he was alive, and in England, nay, at Riversborough itself, under their old roof, would be too great a shock for Felicity. Phebe dared not tell her. Yet, to let her start off alone on this fruitless errand, to find only an empty hut at Engelberg, with no trace of its occupant left behind, was heartless, and might prove equally injurious to Felicity. There was no time to communicate with Riversborough, she must come to a decision for herself, and at once. The white, worn face, with its air of sad determination, filled her with a deep and eager pity.

"Oh! I will go with you," she cried. "I could never bear you to go alone. But is there nothing you could tell me? Only trust me. What trouble carries you there? Why must you go to Engelberg before Felix marries?"

She had caught Felicity's small cold hand between her own, and looked up beseechingly into her face. Oh! if she would but now, at last, throw off the burden which had so long bowed her down, and tell her secret, she could let her know that this painful pilgrimage was utterly needless. But the sweet, sad, proud lips were closed, and the dark eyes, looking down steadily into Phebe's, betrayed no wavering of her determined reticence.

"You shall come with me as far as Lucerne, dear Phebe," she answered, stooping down to kiss her uplifted face, "but I must go alone to Engelberg."

There was barely time for Phebe to make any arrangements, and there was not a moment for deliberation. She wrote a few hurried words to Jean Merle, imploring him to follow them at once, and promising to detain Felicity on their way, if possible. But Felicity's own preparations were complete, and her route marked out, with the times of steamers and trains set down. Through Paris, Mulhausen, and Basle, she hastened on to Lucerne. Now she had set out on this dreary and dolorous path there could be no rest for her until she reached the end. Phebe recognised this as soon as they had started. It would be impossible to detain Felicity on the way.

But Jean Merle could not be far behind them, and a few hours would bring him to them after they had reached Lucerne. Felicity was very silent as they travelled on by the swiftest trains, and Phebe was glad of it. For what could she say to her? She was herself lost in a whirl of bewilderment, and of mingled hope and fear.

Could it possibly be that Felicity would learn that Jean Merle was still living, and the mode and manner of his life through this long separation, and yet stand aloof from him, afar off, as one on whom he had no claim for pity and love? Yet if she could relent toward him, how must it be in the future? It could never be that she would own the wrong she had committed openly in the face of the world. What was to happen now? Phebe was hardly less feverishly agitated than Felicity herself. It was evening when they arrived at Lucerne, and Felicity was forced to rest until the morning. They sat together in a small balcony opening out of her chamber, which overlooked the lake, where the moonbeams were playing in glistening curves over the quiet ripples of the water. All the mountains round it looked black in the dim light, and the rugged summit of Pilatus, still slightly sprinkled with snow, frowned down upon them; but southward, behind the dark range of lower hills, there stood out against the almost black-blue of the sky a broken line of pale, mysterious peaks, which might have been merely pallid clouds lying along the horizon, but for their steadfast, unaltering immobility. They were the Engelberg Alps, with the snowy Titlis gleaming highest among them, and Felicity's face, wan and pallid as themselves, was set toward them.

"You will let me come with you to-morrow?" said Phebe, in a tone of painful entreaty.

"No, no," she answered. "I could not bear to have even you at Engelberg with me. I must visit that grave alone. And yet I know you love me, dear Phebe."

"Dearly," she sobbed.

"Yes, you love me dearly," she repeated sorrowfully, "but not as you once did; even your heart is changed toward me. If you went with me to-morrow I might lose all the love that is left. I cannot afford to lose that, my dear."

"You could never lose it!" answered Phebe. "I love you differently? Yes, but not less. I love you now as Christ loves us all, more for God's sake than our own; and that is the deepest, most faithful love. That can never be worn out or repulsed. As Christ has loved me, so I love you, my Felicity."

Her voice had fallen into an almost inaudible whisper as she knelt down beside her, pressing her lips upon the thin cold hands lying listlessly on Felicity's lap. It had been as an impulsive girl, worshipping her from a lowly inferiority, that Phebe had been used long ago to kiss Felicity's hand. But this was the humility of a great love, willing to help, and seeking to save her. Felicity felt it through every fibre of her sensitive nature. For an instant she thought it might be possible that Phebe had caught some glimmer of the truth. With her weary and dim eyes lifted up to the pale crests of the mountains, beneath which lay the miserable secret of her life, she hesitated as to whether she could tell Phebe all. But the effort to admit any human soul into the inner recesses of her own was too great for her.

"Christ loves me, you say," she murmured, "I don't know; I never felt it. But I have felt sure of your love; and next to Felix and Hilda you have stood nearest to me. Love me always, and in spite of all, my dear."

She lifted up Phebe's bowed head and kissed her lips with a long and lingering kiss. Then Phebe knew that she was bent upon going alone, and immediately, to Engelberg.

The icy air of the morning, blowing down from the mountains where the winter's snow was but partially melted, made Felicity shiver; though her mind was too busy to notice why. Phebe had seen that she was warmly clad, and had come down to the boat with her to start her on this last day's journey; but Felicity had scarcely opened her pale lips to say good-by.

Phebe stood on the quay, watching the boat as long as the white steam from the funnel was in sight, and then she turned away, blind to all the scenery about her, in the heaviness of heart she felt for the sorrowful soul going out on so sad and vain a quest. There had been no time for Jean Merle to overtake them, and now Felicity was gone when a few words from her would have stopped her. But Phebe had not dared to utter them.

Felicità too had not seen either the sunlit hills ing about her, or Phebe watching her departure. e had no thought for anything but what there ight be lying before her, in that lonely mountain llage, to which, after fourteen years, her reluc- nt feet were turned. Possibly she might find no ace of the man who had been so long dead to her d to all the world, and thus be baffled and de- ated, yet relieved, at the first stage of her search. or she did not desire to find him. Her heart ould be lightened of its miserable load, if she ould discover that Jean Merle was dead, and ured in the same quiet cemetery where the gran- e cross marked the grave of Roland Sefton. hat was a thing to be hoped for.

If Jean Merle was living still, and living there, hat should she say to him. Wild hopes and de- res would be awakened within him if he found er seeking after him. Nay, it might possibly be at he would insist upon making their mutual sin own to the world, by claiming to return to her d her children. It seemed a desperate thing to ave done; and for the first time since she left ondon she repented of having done it. Was she ot sowing the wind to reap the whirlwind? here was still time for her to retrace her steps nd go back home, the home she owed altogether herself; yet one which this man, whom she had ot seen for so long a time, had a right to enter as he master of it. What fatal impulse had driven er to leave it on so wild and fruitless an errand?

Yet she felt she could no longer live without nowing the fate of Jean Merle. Her heart had een gnawing itself for months past with vague morses and self-accusations, slumbering often, ut now aroused into an activity that could not be id to rest. This morning, for the first time, be- eath all her perplexity, and fear, and hope to find im dead, there came to her a strange, undefined, arcely conscious tenderness toward the miserable an, whom she had last seen standing in her pres- ence, an uncouth, ragged, weather-beaten peasant. 'his man had been her husband, the father of her hildren, and a deep, keen pain was stirring in her oul, partly of the old love, for she had once in a measure loved him, and partly of the pity she felt or him, as she began to realize the difference here had existed between her lot and his.

She scarcely felt how worn out she was, how angerously fatigued, with this rapid travelling, and he resistless current of agitation which had pos- sessed her. As she journeyed onward she was alto- gether unconscious of the roads she traversed, only rousing herself when any change of conveyance ade it necessary. Her brain was busy over the pinion, more than once expressed by Phebe, that very man could live down the evil consequences of his sin, if he had courage and faith enough. 'If God forgives us, man will forgive us," said Phebe.

CHRIST AND THE CHILDREN.

S.S. Lesson for July 2, Mark 10 : 13-16. Golden Text, Matt. 18 : 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Lord Jesus had just been answering a question of the Pharisees about divorce which had opened the way for Him to speak in the strongest erms about the holiness of marriage. "What herefore God hath joined together, let not man ut asunder." In the ordinance of marriage, in amily and social life, God has made blessed and beautiful provision for the denial of self, and one feels how terribly little understood is the true spirit of Christianity, when one hears of cases of divorce on the ground of incompatibility of disposition or of temper. God has given us to one another that on each side we may learn to bear lovingly one with the other; where one is overtaken in a fault, that that one should be restored by the other in the spirit of meekness (Gal. 6 : 1).

THE PURPOSE OF OUR LORD

is frustrated if the development of self is so great that there is found no willingness to bear one with the other. If God has joined together a husband and wife, there is power in God to maintain and increase unity between them, the enemy may at- tempt by every means in his power to destroy harmony, but he can only succeed when either party is living for self and not for God. O that Christians would learn to place marriage higher than they do, as a holy vocation to represent the oneness between Christ and His church by the grace which in Christ Jesus rises superior to the flesh.

How often have we heard a wife complain that her husband's disposition was such that she was a complete martyr, she could not do anything which pleased him, and her whole life was one series of vexations and disappointments. Had she understood the mind of God, she would have said with her Lord, in every fresh difficulty, "For this cause came I unto this hour, Father, glorify Thy name" (John 12 : 27, 28). Perhaps God may have seen in that wife's heart such a love of appreciation as would, if indulged, have had a most baneful effect upon her soul, and He may be making use of this discipline to mortify it. Where is the cure in such a case? Let that wife place all the matter in the hands of God, and seek to please Him, abandoning all desire to be appreciated by her husband; and he cannot but be conscious of the change, he will see that to do right has be- come the wife's motive, not to secure his approval, and he will not long be able to hold back a word of encouragement, almost in spite of himself. It is equally the case when a husband complains of his wife.

It is true there are often cases of extreme diffi- culty when a husband urges a wife to go into the world against her conscience, or insists on her ob- taining goods without paying for them, or brings the house into debt through his own heedless ex- travagance; or it may be, in a similar case, it is the wife who is in fault. What is then to be done? Let the one who believes in God put the case fully into His hands, refusing boldly to do that which is wrong, in complete confidence that He will make the way where there seems to be none. When there is a willingness to take up our cross and deal with God over the heads of persons and circumstances, all is easy. Self is the real enemy to be dealt with, and God alone is equal to it.

It was just then, when Jesus was speaking of marriage, that they brought young children to Him "that He should put His hands on them and pray" (Matt. 19 : 13), or "touch them." The "dis- ciples rebuked those that brought them," they drank so little into the spirit of their Master that they did not understand how He who did such mighty works, and who was followed by such multitudes, would think it worth while to stop and notice

A FEW HELPLESS INFANTS.

They had yet to learn, as many have to learn in our day, that the heart of a little child becomes more readily God's dwelling-place than that of one where self and the world have been at work to warp, to discolor, and to spoil. The child Samuel was a fitter vessel for the word of the living God than Eli, who, though a priest, was unfaithful as a father. Jeremiah, though a child, was chosen to bear witness for God at the risk of his life, in the midst of a generation whose heart was set against the Lord.

It is the weak ones, "them that have no strength," whom God uses, and with whom He communes. Abraham had to become a stranger and unknown in the land to which God called him, before he could become "the father of them that believe." Joseph had to become a slave, and even a prisoner, before God could call him to be ruler of Egypt. Moses had to leave his learning and be- come a shepherd, before God could make him the leader of His people; and says our Lord, "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18 : 3).

Thus when the disciples rebuked those that brought them, they showed how little His teaching had entered into their hearts. But He did not re- prove them, and only said, "Suffer the little chil- dren to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." Our beloved Lord did not say, "Force the little children to come un- to me, or, Drive them unto me, or, Make them come unto me;" those in the streets, and lanes of the city, in the highways and hedges, must be com- pelled (Luke 14 : 23), but the little children are only i.e., not hindered.

If a Christian parent reproveth a child for evil temper, and tells him to pray to Jesus that he may be pardoned and kept from naughty temper, and then that child sees the same parent himself angry and overcome by temper, the little mind will rea- son, "If it is naughty in me to be in a temper, it is naughty in father too, and if Jesus can forgive and keep me, why does not father get forgiven and kept," and the sense of sin is dulled in the child, and he is led to unbelief in the willingness and power of Jesus. He knows that in things temporal that which applies to him applies to father too, the fire warms father and him too, the carriage carries him and father too, why then should it be the Saviour who is to save him only and not father, and why should temper be wrong when father gets in a temper?

Again, a child is taught to deny himself and give some of his little savings to some work of missions, or some orphanage; his few pence cost him a great deal, but he sees father indulging in smoking, which cannot feed, or he would be fed that way; he sees mother indulging in a love for that which is taste- ful and elegant, and he feels that a wrong is done to him to expect him to give a portion so compara- tively large out of his little store, while father and mother only give that which they do not feel at all. Then he is told of how Jesus died for his sins, that if he repents and believes, his sins shall be forgiven him; but he never hears father or mother speak of their sins; his disobedience is noticed, re- buked and punished, but he sees them get out of temper without ever mentioning it at family prayer; he hears them very hard upon a servant and never acknowledging afterward that they have been in the wrong, although he is always expected to acknowledge when he is in the wrong, and thus an awful hindrance is put into the child's way, and he thinks, "Now that I am young I must do as I am told, but when I grow up I may do wrong with impunity," and thus the child's own parents hinder him from coming to Jesus.

If nothing stands in the way a child turns easily to Jesus; but a little child craves above all else that which is real and reliable, that which he can trust. When the parents' faith is real, the children manifest faith quite easily, and O how often their simple faith goes beyond that of their parents! They believe in God's almighty- ness with an unreserved simplicity which makes us smile, but which ought to make us blush.
